Mr. Kotwal says that the principle of Snowden's case would not be applicable by the facts of this case, since the question of discrimination which was in Snowden's case was in respect of an executive act of the Government. In the present case the question of discrimination has arisen in respect of a notification which, Mr. Kotwal says, amounts to a piece of subordination. Now, in our view, Mr. Kotwal is not right when he contends that the notification dated April 19, 1955, which was issued by Government under the Act is a piece of legislation. In Edward Mills Co. Ltd. v. The State of Ajmer,¹⁷ their Lordships of the Supreme Court were dealing with a notification issued under s. 27 of this very Act and they said that they did not think that in enacting s. 27 the Legislature had in any way stripped itself of its essential power to legislate or had assigned to the administrative authority anything but an accessory or subordinate power which was deemed necessary to carry out the purpose and the policy of the Act. Now, there is no doubt that the purpose and the policy of the Minimum Wages Act is to provide minimum rates of wages to certain employees. The impugned notification in this case, namely, the notification dated April 19, 1955, was in our view nothing more than an executive action taken by the State to carry out the purpose and the policy of the Act. We do not think that when the Legislature enacted sub-s. (2) of s. 10 of the Act it had any intention to strip itself of its power of legislation under the Act. It had no intention, in our view, to assign to the appropriate Government anything more than a mere executive power of taking an executive action of issuing notifications which was necessary to carry out the policy of the Act. Then again, in State of Bombay v. Narothamdas Jetthabhai,¹⁸ the validity of s. 4 of the Bombay City Municipal Corporation Act was challenged and it was held that all that was left to the discretion of the Provincial Government under the section was the determination of the conditions under which the Court should be invested with the enhanced jurisdiction. It was held that s. 4 did not involve any delegation of legislative power. It was only an instance of conditional legislation and was not ultra vires.

valid on this ground. In the present case also all that was left to the discretion of the Provincial Government under sub-s. (2) of s. 10 of the Act was to determine whether an administrative action in the form of issuing a notification should be taken by the State Government for the purpose of giving effect to the object of the Act, namely for the purpose of revising the rates of minimum wages. The power conferred upon the Government under sub-s. (2) of s. 10 did not involve any delegation of legislative powers. Mr. Kotwal contends that the notification should be looked upon as an instance of a conditional legislation. We are unable to accept this contention. Sub-section (2) of s. 10 itself, and not the notification, would amount to conditional legislation. In our view, the notification issued by Government under s. 10(2) is not a piece of legislation of any kind, neither delegated legislation nor subordinate legislation nor conditional legislation.

Mr. Kotwal has next referred us to art. 13 of the Constitution and has contended that under cl. (3) of art. 13, the notification dated April 19, 1955, issued by Government under s. 10(2), would be law and that, therefore, the question arising out of this notification is one of discrimination made by law and not one of discrimination made by an official or executive act of Government. Therefore, says Mr. Kotwal, the principle of Snowden's case would not apply to the facts of the present case, since in Snowden's case the question was one of discrimination made not by law but by an executive act of the State. We are unable to see much force in this contention. Article 13, cl. (3), provides:

"law" includes any Ordinance, order, bye-law, rule, regulation, notification, custom or usage having in the territory of India the force of law."

It is to be noted that art. 13, cl. (3) does not confer upon the order, rule, regulation, notification etc. the character identical with the character of the Act of the Legislature. All that it says is that the order, notification etc. shall have the same force, and shall be treated on the same footing, as the Act of the Legislature. It is significant to note that the Parliament did not use the words "law means and includes". It is implicit in the word 'includes' that but for the inclusion, the thing included would not have fallen in the same category under which it is included. It is clear that an order made by Government, as, for example, the notification dated April 19, 1955, is an executive act of the Government. It is not the act of the Legislature done in consequence of its legislative competence. Section 10, sub-s. (2) is a piece of conditional legislation. By enacting that section, the Legislature itself provided that upon the condition of a certain satisfaction being reached by Government, the Government may make a certain order. The order which the Government may make under that section is not a piece of legislation of any kind, since no legislative competence is conferred upon Government under the section. It is not even a conditional legislation. As I have said, the conditional legislation is contained in the section itself (s. 10, sub-s. (2)). The order or notification issued by the Government under that section is an executive act of the Government done in pursuance of the power conferred upon it by the conditional legislation enacted by the Legislature, and all that would follow from art. 13, cl. (3) is that the said order would have the same force as if it were the law of the land. While dealing with the question of discrimination introduced by an executive act of an authority, it is not invariably possible to rule out a probability that an element of intention or purpose might have entered into the discrimination. Such a probability must invariably stand ruled out in the case of an Act of the Legislature. This essential difference between the two kinds of acts—the executive act of the Government, albeit done in pursuance of the power given to it by a piece of conditional legislation, and the legislative act of the Legislature itself—must be borne in mind when the act is challenged on the ground of discrimination; or else the constitutional guarantee would be rendered illusory. If an administrative act of an executive Government is to enjoy the same immunity as the Act of the Legislature, in that the question of intention or purpose in respect of it cannot be gone into as it cannot be in the case of an Act of the Legislature, the constitutional guarantee of equal protection against executive orders which would have the force of law under art. 13, cl. (3), would be reduced to a rope of sands. Therefore, before the petitioners can successfully challenge the notification of Government dated April 19, 1955, they must establish that there was an intention or purpose on the part of Government to make a discrimination. In this connection, the petitioners have alleged in para. 14 of the petition:

"This action (meaning thereby the issue of a notification) of the Government was mala fide and dishonest. It was prompted by political considerations for the purpose of bettering the chances of the Congress party and for weakening their opponents."

This allegation raises a disputed question of fact and it cannot be decided without recording evidence. It is well-settled that a recourse to art. 226 is not a remedy for deciding such disputed questions of fact. A suit is a remedy and the petitioners have not chosen to adopt that remedy. The result, therefore, is that the petitioners have failed to establish that the discrimination introduced by the notification dated April 19, 1955, was intentional and purposeful and accordingly their challenge to the constitutionality of the notification must fail.

Mr. Kotwal has next attacked the constitutionality of the notification dated April 19, 1955, upon another ground, namely the ground that within the same industry—the Bidi making industry—one class of employees was treated differently from the other classes of employees. He has invited our attention to the notification issued by the Government of Bombay under cl. (a) of sub-s. (1) of s. 8 of the Act, creating various zones and laying down the rates of minimum wages in those zones. If we turn to this notification, it would appear that it refers to several categories of employees in the Bidi making industry, namely, Bidi-makers, wrappers, Taraiwallas, Bhattiwallas, tobacco mixers, distributors of leaves, etc. Different rates of wages were provided for in the case of these different categories of employees. If we turn to the notification dated April 19, 1955, it would appear that the revision of rates which was ordered by it was in respect of Bidi-makers only, i.e. in respect of only one category of employees out of the several categories referred to in the earlier notification. Mr. Kotwal says that what was done by the issue of the notification dated April 19, 1955, was that in the same industry, namely, the Bidi-making industry, the Government of Bombay treated one class of employees—the Bidi-makers—differently from the other classes of employees in the same industry. Upon this ground Mr. Kotwal says that the notification was ex facie discriminatory and that, therefore, it was not necessary for the petitioners to lead any proof about it. Now, it is to be noted that such an attack upon the constitutionality of the notification dated April 19, 1955, was not made by the petitioners in the petition. The notification was challenged as discriminatory on only two grounds by the petitioners and those grounds are found in para. 12 of the petition. It would be convenient to set out the contents of para. 12 at this stage. Paragraph 12 of the petition says:

"That the petitioners maintain that in issuing the notification dated 19-4-1955 the State Government had exercised its power under s. 3(3)(iv) in a manner which was capricious and arbitrary. There was no plausible and reasonable basis for laying down different rates fixed for the different localities referred to in the same notification.... If the rate fixed for these district places which were commercially much more important and had a much larger population than the small towns of Sangamner and Akola were fixed at Re. 1-10-0, Re. 1-14-0 and Rs. 2-0-0, there was no plausible or reasonable basis for fixing the rate for Sangamner and Akola at Rs. 2-2-0. "

Thus, the notification was challenged as being discriminatory upon only two grounds in the petition, namely, that different rates were laid down for different localities and that higher rates were provided for smaller places where the living was cheaper and lower rates were provided for bigger places where the living was more expensive. There was no allegation made in the petition that the notification was discriminatory, because within the same industry, namely, the Bidi-making industry, the notification purported to treat one class of employees, namely, the Bidi-makers, differently from the other classes of employees, namely, wrappers, Taraiwallas, Bhattiwalas and others. If such an allegation had been made by the petitioners in the petition, the State would have had an opportunity of meeting it. For instance, in that case, the State might have been in a position to show that in respect of the other categories of employees also in the Bidi-making industry notifications were issued corresponding to the notification issued in this case on April 19, 1955. We must not be taken to suggest that other notifications similar to the notification dated April 19, 1955, were in fact issued by the State of Bombay, revising the rates of minimum wages payable to the other categories of employees in the Bidi-making industry. What we wish to say is that if such a contention had been taken by the petitioners, the State of Bombay would have had an opportunity of meeting it. Such an opportunity to the State of Bombay has been denied by reason of the absence of such an allegation in the petition itself and we do not think that we can permit Mr. Kotwal to raise this allegation for the first time in an application under art. 226. Not only such a contention was not taken by the petitioners in the petition itself, but no reference whatsoever was made to it during the course of the initial exhaustive address of the learned advocate Mr. Kotwal. It was after the learned Advocate General had made a reply to all the contentions which were advanced by Mr. Kotwal that Mr. Kotwal for the first time in reply to the learned Advocate General's address attacked the notification as being discriminatory upon the ground that it introduced discrimination in respect of only one class of employees in the Bidi-making industry in Akola, Sangamner and places within 7 miles of their respective municipal jurisdictions. We could not permit Mr. Kotwal to raise such a contention at such an extremely late stage.

Lastly, Mr. Kotwal has contended that by virtue of the various notifications issued by the State of Bombay under sub-s. (2) of s. 26 of the Act between August 29, 1953, and June 30, 1955, it was provided that the provisions of the Act shall not apply to places situated within 7 miles of the municipal limits of Akola and Sangamner. So, says Mr. Kotwal, upon the date upon which the impugned notification was issued, namely on April 19, 1955, the Act was not applicable to the places situated within 7 miles of Akola and Sangamner and, therefore, the Government of the State of Bombay had no power to issue the notification, so far as the employees working in the Bidi making industry in places situated within 7 miles of Akola and Sangamner were concerned. Then Mr. Kotwal says that by the notifications dated June 30, 1955, and June 28, 1956, issued by the State under sub-s. (2) of s. 26 it was provided that the Act shall not apply to Sangamner and Akola as well and it was further provided that the duration of the non-application of the Act to these places would be up to December 31, 1956. The result of the notifications dated June 30, 1955, and June 28, 1956, was that the Act had become inapplicable to Sangamner, Akola and places within 7 miles of Sangamner and Akola up to December 31, 1956. In the meantime, on August 22, 1956, by a notification issued by the State of Bombay, the exemption which was granted to Sangamner and Akola from the operation of the Act up to December 31, 1956, was withdrawn with effect from September 1, 1956. In the light of these facts, Mr. Kotwal contends firstly that the Act must be deemed to have been repealed, so far as Sangamner, Akola and places within 7 miles thereof were concerned, by reason of the notifications dated June 30, 1955, and June 28, 1956. Secondly, Mr. Kotwal says that by reason of the notification dated August 22, 1956, the above repeal itself was repealed. Mr. Kotwal says that the repeal of the repeal would not result in the revival of the Act and he says that even if we hold that by reason of the repeal of the repeal the Act was revived, even so the revival of the Act would not result in the revival of the notification dated April 19, 1955. Mr. Kotwal contends that in any view of the matter, even if we were to hold that the Act itself was revived by the repeal of the repeal, it was obligatory upon the Government to make a fresh inquiry and issue a fresh notification under s. 10(2) consequent upon the result of that inquiry. It is clear from what has been stated above that the whole of Mr. Kotwal's contention in this context proceeds upon the assumption made by him that the Act was repealed, so far as Sangamner, Akola and places within 7 miles thereof were concerned, by virtue of the notifications issued by the State on June 30, 1955, and June 28, 1956. If this contention fails, then the whole argument of Mr. Kotwal on this point fails. Now, in this connection it is to be noted in the first place that none of the notifications issued between August 29, 1953, and June 30, 1955, and neither of the notifications dated June 30, 1955, and June 28, 1956, stated in terms that the Act was repealed by these notifications. To take one notification by way of an instance (all notifications were similarly worded), namely, the notification dated August 29, 1953, it stated:

"In exercise of the powers conferred by sub-section (2) of section 26 of the Minimum Wages Act, 1948 (XI of 1948), the Government of Bombay is pleased to direct that for the period from the 30th August, 1953 to the 31st December, 1953 (both days inclusive) the provisions of the said Act shall not apply to bidi-makers employed in any tobacco (including bidi-making) manufactory in any locality in this State except the following localities etc., etc."

It is clear, therefore, that what the Government did when it issued the various notifications was that it simply granted exemption to certain areas from the operation of the Act. The learned Advocate General contends—and in our view rightly—that the granting of an exemption from the operation of the Act is not, and cannot be, equivalent to a repeal of the Act. Granting of an exemption only meant that for certain reasons Government considered it fit to suspend the operation of the Act in respect of certain areas for a certain time. It may be noted that the exemption which was granted initially to the places situated within 7 miles of Sangamner and Akola from the operation of the Act was extended from time to time by various notifications. It could not be contended that the repeal was being extended from time to time. In our view, the very fact that the exemption from the operation of the Act was being extended to certain localities from time to time would show that the Act had not ceased to exist, but for certain reasons the Government had thought it appropriate to suspend its operation in certain areas. If we turn to s. 21 of the General Clause Act it says:

"Where, by any Central Act or Regulation, a power to issue notifications, orders, rules, or bye-laws is conferred, then that power includes a power, exercisable in the like manner and subject to the like sanction and conditions if any, to add to, to amend, vary or rescind any notifications, orders, rules or bye-laws so issued."

Under s. 26(2) of the Minimum Wages Act, power is given to the State Government to issue a notification. Under s. 21 of the General Clauses Act a statutory power is given to the State, in pursuance whereof the State may decide to issue a notification, an order or a rule saying that certain provisions of the Act or all the provisions of the Act shall not apply to certain industries situated within certain areas for a certain time. It was in pursuance of the statutory power that the Government in the first instance issued a notification saying that the Act shall not apply to certain areas, then extended the said exemption from time to time and ultimately rescinded or withdrew the exemption. From this it could not be contended that the Act had ceased to exist at any time or that it had been abrogated or repealed. On the contrary, the facts of this case would show that the existence of the Act was postulated. As the Act was never repealed and as it continued to exist all the while, the Government had power to issue the notification on April 19, 1955, and as soon as the exemption granted by the notifications dated June 30, 1955, and June 28, 1956, was withdrawn, the said notification could validly apply to the various localities referred to therein.

Mr. Kotwal has invited our attention to s. 6 of the General Clauses Act and contended that unless the repeal explicitly said so, it shall not revive anything which was not in force at the time at which the repeal took effect. It is scarcely necessary for us to deal with this contention of Mr. Kotwal, since we find ourselves wholly unable to agree with his argument that the granting of exemption amounted to a repeal of the Act from time to time. Lastly, Mr. Kotwal referred us to the latter part of s. 24 of the General Clauses Act, which says:

"When any Central Act or Regulation, which, by a notification under section 5 or 5A of the Scheduled Districts Act, 1874, or any like law, has been extended to any local area, has, by a subsequent notification, been withdrawn from and re-extended to such area or any part thereof, the provisions of such Act or Regulation shall be deemed to have been repealed and re-enacted in such area or part within the meaning of this section".

This is not a case where a Central Act has been extended to any area by a notification issued under s. 5 or s. 5A of the Scheduled Districts Act, 1874, or any law like the law contained in the Scheduled Districts Act, 1874. That being so, a reference to s. 24 of the General Clauses Act is futile in this case and it cannot assist Mr. Kotwal's clients.

In the result, we have come to the conclusion that the petitioners have failed to show that the requisite procedure under the Minimum Wages Act was not followed by the State of Bombay before revising the rates of minimum wages by issuing the notification dated April 19, 1955, that s. 3(3) (a) (iv) of the Act is discriminatory and violates the provisions of art. 14 of the Constitution, that the notification dated April 19, 1955, itself is discriminatory, and that by reason of the exemption granted to the various localities from the operation of the Act from time to time the Act itself was repealed from time to time. All these contentions of the petitioners having failed, the application is rejected.

On the question of costs, it may be noted that the learned Advocate General is appearing in this application for the Union of India, the State of Bombay and the Authority appointed under the Minimum Wages Act, 1948. Now, so far as his representation of the Union of India is concerned, he would not be entitled to any costs. Order XXVILA, r. 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:—

"Where under rule 2 Government is added as a defendant in a suit, the Attorney General, the Advocate-General, or the Government shall not be entitled to or liable for costs in the Court which ordered the addition unless the Court having regard to all the circumstances of the case for any special reason otherwise orders."

In this application the Act that was challenged was the Central Act and, therefore, the "Government" referred to in r. 3 would be the Union of India in this case. It is, therefore, clear that so far as the representation of the Union of India is concerned, the Advocate General will not be entitled to any costs. But he represents the State of Bombay also. In Dialdas Parmanand v. Talwalkar,¹⁹ and Parasram Damodhar v. State of Bombay,²⁰ the costs awarded to each party were Rs. 1,000. Having regard to the considerable effort put in by the learned Advocate General in this case which involved substantial questions of unusual complexity, we direct that the petitioners shall pay the costs to the tune of Rs. 1,000, so far as the costs of the Advocate General representing the State of Bombay are concerned. So far as the learned advocates appearing for respondents Nos. 2A and 2B are concerned, they will get their usual costs. The petitioners will bear their own costs.

In Civil Application No. 155 of 1958, stay is dissolved. No order as to costs.

We cannot part with the case without saying that the case was argued by the learned Advocate General and the learned advocate Mr. Kotwal with great ability and thoroughness and the Court appreciates the valuable help rendered by them in deciding the case.

No order as to costs of opponent No. 1.

TAMBE J. I entirely agree with the findings given by my learned brother at page 51 of his judgment. I also agree that the petition should be dismissed.

I, however find it difficult to accept the argument of the learned Advocate General that in order to establish infringement of art. 14 of the Constitution it would, as a general rule, be necessary to establish that the alleged discrimination had been intentional and purposeful. May be that in certain cases, e.g., where it is challenged that the discrimination has resulted on account of a decision of a Court or on account of action in a particular case taken by an officer of the executive, it may be necessary for the petitioner to establish that the decision of the Court or the action taken by the officer in dealing with a particular case was intentional or purposeful. Now, discrimination may arise not only on account of an erroneous decision or act of a Court or executive agency, but may also arise on account of a law enacted by the Legislature. If for establishing the infringement of art. 14 of the Constitution it is necessary as a general rule to prove that discrimination has been intentional or purposeful, then to discharge that burden in the case of challenge to a law it would well nigh be impossible and would, in my view, reduce the constitutional guarantee under art. 14 to a "rope of sand". Reliance is placed on the following observations made in *Snowden v. Hughes*¹ at pp. 506-507:

"The Constitution does not assure uniformity of decisions or immunity from merely erroneous action, whether by the Courts or the executive agencies of a State. See McGovern v. New York, 229 US 363, 370, 371; 57 L.Ed. 1223, 1231, 1232; 33 S.Ct. 876, 48 LRA (NS) 391. However, in forbidding a State to 'deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws', the Fourteenth Amendment does not permit a State to deny the equal protection of its laws because such denial is not wholesale. The talk in some of the cases about systematic discrimination is only a way of indicating that in order to give rise to a constitutional grievance a departure from a norm must be rooted in design and not derive merely from error or fallible judgment."

In my view, these observations do not take the case any further and are no authority for the proposition contended for. The decision in Snowden's case was referred to in the case of *Budhan Choudhary v. The State of Bihar*² and at page 1054 it is observed:—

"...It has, however, to be remembered that, in the language of Frankfurter, J., in Snowden v. Hughes, 'the Constitution does not assure uniformity of decisions or immunity from merely erroneous action, whether by the Courts or the executive agencies of a State'. The judicial decision must of necessity depend on the facts and circumstances of each particular case and what may superficially appear to be an unequal application of the law may not necessarily amount to a denial of equal protection of law unless there is shown to be present in it an element of intentional and purposeful discrimination."

But those observations have to be read in the context of the facts of that case. They were made in answer of the argument advanced that the discrimination might arise on account of erroneous decision of a Criminal Court. These observations also, therefore, in my opinion, are of no support to the contention raised. The principles deducible from the previous decisions given by their Lordships of the Supreme Court relating to art. 14 of the Constitution were summarised by their Lordships in *Ram Krishna Dalmia v. Tendolkar J.*³ and in the summary it has not been stated by their Lordships that, as a general rule, it is necessary for a petitioner to establish that the discrimination has been intentional or purposeful. Reliance, however, was placed on the following observations of their Lordships by the Advocate General in support of his contention (p. 207):—

"...As this Court has said in Matajog Dobey v. H. C. Bhari,⁴ 'a discretionary power is not necessarily a discriminatory power and that abuse of power is not to be easily assumed where the discretion is vested in the Government and not in a minor official.' We feel sure, however, that if this law is administered by the Government 'with an evil eye and an unequal hand' or for an oblique or unworthy purpose the arms of this Court will be long enough to reach it and to strike down such abuse with a heavy hand."

These observations also are of no avail to respondents Nos. 3 and 4 and do not support their contention that as a general rule it has to be shown that discrimination was intentional or purposeful.

Coming next to the question as to whether the notification of April 19, 1955, is purely an executive act or is law within the meaning of art. 13(3)(a) of the Constitution, with respect to the learned Advocate General, in my opinion, it is law within the meaning of art. 13(3)(a) of the Constitution. Section 10 of the Minimum Wages Act authorizes the State Government to issue a notification revising minimum wages after following certain procedure. That procedure has been followed by the State Government before issuing this notification. It is issued by the State Government in exercise of its powers conferred on it by the said s. 10. It owes its legal efficacy to that section and action can be taken against the employers for its infringement under s. 20 of the Minimum Wages Act. It has, therefore, the force of law within the meaning of art. 13(3)(a) of the Constitution. It was, therefore, not necessary for the petitioners to establish that the alleged discrimination on account of the notification was intentional or purposeful. It is sufficient for them to show that as a result of this notification discrimination in fact resulted. In my opinion, however, the petitioners have not been able to discharge this burden. I agree with my learned brother that the notification ex facie is not discriminatory. The burden was, therefore, on the petitioners to establish that the discrimination has resulted on account of the notification. The main ground on which it was claimed that the discrimination has resulted is that in bigger places, viz., Jalgaon, Dhulia, Dharwar, Hubli and Poona, some of which were formerly grouped with Akola and Sangamner, the rates have been reduced while in places which are smaller, viz., Akola and Sangamner and places within 7 miles round about, the rates have been increased. In my opinion, the smallness or bigness of the place cannot be the sole criterion in determining the minimum wages of workers in a particular industry. Various other factors will also have to be taken into consideration in determining the minimum wages. In the instant case, the wages have been revised by the State Government after consulting the Advisory Committee and following its unanimous advice. The petitioners were afforded an opportunity to place their case before the Advisory Committee. It is, therefore, not possible to assume that the State Government had revised the minimum wages arbitrarily without taking into consideration various relevant factors. In these circumstances, in my judgment, the petitioners have not been able to establish that they had been discriminated against. The petition, therefore, fails and should be dismissed with costs.

Petition dismissed.

*Before Mr. Justice Tambe and Mr. Justice Tarkunde.*VALLABHDAS NARAYANDAS v. MUNICIPAL COMMITTEE OF AKOLA*

C. P. and Berar Municipalities Act (II of 1922), Secs. 67(2), 71—Expression "system of assessment" in s. 67(2), meaning of—Expression whether means draft rules for assessment and collection of tax—Whether incumbent on municipal committee to include such draft rules in proposals made under s. 67(2) and publish them.

The expression "system of assessment" occurring in s. 67(2) of the C. P. and Berar Municipalities Act, 1922, means the principles underlying the ascertainment of the basis upon which a tax is proposed to be computed and it does not mean draft rules for the assessment and collection of tax. Therefore, under the Act it is not incumbent on a municipal committee to include in the proposals made by it under s. 67(2) of the Act, the draft rules for the assessment, collection and refund of the tax proposed and publish them for inviting objections thereto.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

M. N. Phadke and S. A. Sohoni, for the petitioners.

B. R. Mandlikar, for respondent No. 1.

N. L. Abhyankar, Special Government Pleader, for respondent No. 2.

TAMBE J. By this petition under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution of India, three inhabitants of the Akola town challenge the validity of the imposition of the octroi tax. Petitioners Nos. 1 and 2 are cloth merchants and petitioner No. 3 is an ordinary resident of Akola.

Section 66 of the C. P. and Berar Municipalities Act, 1922, Act No. II of 1922, hereinafter called the Act, empowers a municipal committee to impose certain taxes mentioned therein. The imposition, however, is to be subject to the provisions of other sections contained in Chapter IX which relates to the imposition, assessment and collection of taxes. We are here concerned with cl. (e) of sub-s. (1) of s. 66. Under that clause, a municipal committee is empowered to impose an octroi tax on animals or goods brought within the limits of the municipality for sale, consumption or use within those limits. Sub-section (1) of s. 67 provides that a committee may, at a special meeting, pass a resolution to propose the imposition of any tax under s. 66. Purporting to act under this sub-section, the municipal committee, Akola, passed a resolution on November 11, 1957, to the effect that in pursuance of the power vested in it under s. 66(1)(e), octroi tax should be imposed on animals and goods brought within the limits of the municipality of Akola for sale, consumption or use within those limits. It also by the said resolution passed proposals for levying the said octroi tax and further resolved that the said proposals (referred to as rules in the resolution) be forwarded to the Government for preliminary publication as required by s. 67(2) of the Act. The committee also passed a further resolution that draft rules for the assessment, collection and refund of the octroi tax be also forwarded to the State Government for necessary action. The State Government published the said proposals of the municipal committee in the Government Gazette of January 16, 1958, under notification No. VMA(M) 5457-I-A. This notification is purported to have been issued under sub-s. (2) of s. 67 of the Act for the information of all persons likely to be affected thereby and it is mentioned therein that any person desiring to raise any objections to the proposed tax or desiring to make any suggestions should lodge his objections or suggestions with the municipal committee of Akola within 30 days of the publication of this notification in the Gazette. This notification is hereinafter referred to as notification I-A.

*Decided, November 18, 1958. Special Civil Application No. 201 of 1958.

In the same Gazette, rules referred to as draft rules for assessment, collection and refund of octroi tax were also published under notification No. VMA(M) 5457-II-A. The notification purports to emanate from the Government; and it is stated therein that any person desirous of raising any objections or suggestions to the rules should lodge his objections or suggestions with the Secretary to the Government of Bombay, Local Self-Government and Public Health Department, within 30 days of the publication of the notice. This notification is hereinafter referred to as notification II-A.

It appears that to the proposals contained in notification I-A certain objections were lodged by the inhabitants of Akola, with the municipal committee, Akola. These objections were first considered by the President and then the report of the President as well as the objections were considered at a special meeting of the municipal committee convened and held on March 3, 1958. The municipal committee thereafter modified its original proposals in certain respects and sent the modified proposals along with its original proposals, objections received thereto from the inhabitants and its decisions on these objections to the Government as required by sub-s. (4) of s. 67. The date on which these papers were forwarded to the State Government is not known. The three petitioners at this stage made an application under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution to this Court on April 14, 1958, praying therein that the entire proceeding of the municipal committee and the resolution passed by it on March 3, 1958, should be quashed; a mandate be issued against the State Government prohibiting it from sanctioning the proposals sent to it by the municipal committee for the imposition of octroi tax, and from notifying the imposition of octroi tax or taking action under s. 67(7) and 67(8) of the Act. They also by a separate application prayed for an interim injunction against the State Government prohibiting it from sanctioning the proposals of the municipal committee and issuing notification for the imposition of the tax. These petitions came up for hearing before this Court on April 18, 1958. This Court by its order dated April 18, 1958, ordered rule to issue on both these petitions. As summer holidays intervened rule issued on the application for interim injunction was made returnable on June 16, 1958. It appears that the case was not taken up on June 16, 1958, but was taken up on June 23, 1958. In between, on June 17, 1958, appearance was put in on behalf of the State by the learned Additional Special Government Pleader. We are informed that his instructions were to oppose the application for interim injunction. On June 23, 1958, when this application was heard, this Court granted interim injunction. It appears that the State Government had already on June 19, 1958, issued notification under s. 67 of the Act in exercise of the powers conferred on it by sub-ss. (5) and (7) of s. 67 sanctioning the imposition of octroi tax; and published it in Gazette Extraordinary of June 19, 1958. It appears that the State Government had not instructed its counsel about the issue of the notification and therefore information about it was not given to this Court by the Government Pleader appearing for the State when the order was made on June 23, 1958. It was later brought to the notice of this Court on June 23, 1958, after the order was made.

On learning about the publication of this notification an application was made on behalf of the petitioners to amend their petition. It was granted and the additional relief now claimed by the petitioners is for quashing the aforesaid notification of the Government dated June 19, 1958, also.

The contentions raised by Mr. M. N. Phadke, learned counsel for the petitioners, in brief, are: (i) that the imposition of octroi tax is bad on account of non-observance or contravention of the mandatory provisions of sub-ss. (2), (3), (4) and (6) of s. 67 of the Act; (ii) that as two of the members of the municipal committee viz. G. M. Savarkar and H. P. Gole, were not served with notice convening the special meeting on March 3, 1958, the resolution passed on March 3, 1958, by the municipal committee was, therefore, bad in law and (iii) the conduct of the Government in issuing the notification dated June 19, 1958, during the pendency of the petition was not bona fide and the notification is, therefore, liable to be quashed.

Turning now to the contention raised as regards non-compliance with the provisions of sub-s. (2) of s. 67, Mr. Phadke contends that even though the proposals of the municipal committee for the imposition of octroi tax and the draft rules for assessment, collection and refund of octroi tax were published in the Official Gazette the draft rules were not published within the municipal limits of the town of Akola as was required under r. 1 of the Rules framed under s. 67(2). The draft rules formed an integral part of the proposals of the municipal committee within the meaning of s. 67(2) of the Act, and failure to publish these draft rules within the limits of the town of Akola amounts to a breach of a mandatory provision of that section vitiating the imposition of octroi tax. It is indeed true that draft rules for assessment, collection and refund of octroi tax published in Notification II-A were not published in any of the local papers at Akola. In fact, there had been no other publication of it save and except that in the Gazette. The proposals contained in Notification I-A were published in the form of pamphlets distributed throughout the town of Akola. They were also published in a local fortnightly paper called 'Jana Sewak'.

If the aforesaid contention of Mr. Phadke is correct, then certainly the imposition of octroi tax is bad in law. The petitioners and other inhabitants of Akola had been denied the statutory right of an opportunity to lodge their objections to these draft rules with the municipal committee. It is, therefore, necessary to consider whether it was incumbent on the municipal committee to include these draft rules in the proposals made by it under sub-s. (2) of s. 67 and publish them for inviting objections thereto from the inhabitants of the Akola municipal committee. Sub-section (2) of s. 67 reads as follows:

"When such a resolution has been passed, the committee shall publish in accordance with rules made under this Act, a notice defining the class of persons or description of property proposed to be taxed, the amount or rate of the tax to be imposed and the system of assessment to be adopted."

It is the argument of Mr. Phadke that in the instant case the municipal committee has published the description of property proposed to be taxed, the amount or rate of the tax proposed to be imposed thereon, but has not published the system of assessment it proposed to adopt in the imposition of the tax. According to Mr. Phadke the system of assessment is contained in the draft rules and, therefore, it was incumbent on the municipal committee to publish them for inviting objections thereto.

Now, the word "assessment" is understood in various senses. In its comprehensive sense it means the method prescribed for making an assessment of a tax, including the steps taken for ascertainment of the basis upon which the tax is to be computed; ascertainment of the amount of tax payable by a tax-payer; and the actual demand of the tax from that tax-payer or the procedure followed for imposing the liability of the tax on the tax-payer. Any one of the aforesaid three steps by itself is also termed as assessment. If the term "assessment" occurring in sub-s. (2) of s. 67 is understood in its comprehensive sense then certainly the rules published in Notification II-A would fall within the meaning of "system of assessment". In our opinion, however, the word "assessment" is not used in its comprehensive sense in sub-s. (2) but is used only in the sense of ascertainment of the basis upon which the tax is to be computed.

We find it difficult to give a comprehensive meaning to the word "assessment" used in this sub-section because in s. 71 of the Act we find that the State Government is empowered to make rules regulating the assessment of taxes and for preventing evasion of assessment. It is difficult to assume that the Legislature had intended to confer concurrent powers both on the municipal committee and the Government and thereby create a conflict between the two authorities. Obviously, therefore, the Legislature intended to confer certain powers on the municipal committee relating to the assessment of tax and it intended to confer certain other powers on the State Government relating to it.

It is no doubt true that normally the presumption is that the same word used in the Act has to be given the same meaning but that presumption is a very weak presumption. Craies at page 159 (Craies on Statute Law, 5th edn.) observed:

"The presumption that the same words are used in the same meaning is however very slight and it is proper, if sufficient reason can be assigned, to construe a word in one part of an Act in a different sense from that which it bears in another part of an Act."

Similar are also the observations in Maxwell at page 322 (Maxwell on Interpretation of Statutes, 10th edn.):

"But the presumption is not of much weight. The same word may be used in different senses in the same statute and even in the same section."

This Chapter, i.e. Chapter IX which relates to imposition, assessment and collection of taxes is sub-divided into four parts; first part relates to the imposition of taxes, s. 67 falls within that part. Second part relates to assessment of taxes, s. 71 falls within this part. Third part relates to collection of taxes and s. 76 falls within this part and the fourth part relates to appeals and also refund of taxes, s. 85 falls under this part. As already stated, s. 71 empowers the State Government to make rules regulating assessment of taxes and for preventing evasion of assessment. Section 76 empowers the State Government to make rules regulating the collection of taxes, and preventing evasion of payment etc. and s. 85 empowers the State Government to make rules regulating the refund of taxes. The sub-division of this Chapter into these parts and the powers conferred on the State Government by the aforesaid sections clearly indicate that the intention of the Legislature was to confer on the municipal committee only the power of imposition of a tax and to confer other powers relating thereto on the State Government. It necessarily follows that the expression "system of assessment" used by the Legislature in sub-s. (2) of s. 67 connotes only to the stage of imposition of the tax and not the other stages of assessment as a whole.

Second reason why we feel that a restricted meaning has to be given to the word "assessment" used in sub-s. (2) is the use of the word "defining" in the sub-section which governs the clause "system of assessment to be adopted". Sub-section (2), does not require the municipal committee to publish all the procedure in details regarding the imposition of a tax. What it requires the municipal committee to do, is to define the class of persons or description of property proposed to be taxed, the amount or rate of the tax to be imposed and the system of assessment to be adopted. Now, the word "define" means to describe accurately. This would not normally mean stating elaborately the entire system of assessment in all its details.

The scheme of s. 67 appears to be that when a municipal committee resolves to impose a tax, it should publish its proposals for imposition of that tax, so that the inhabitants of the municipal committee should have an opportunity to place their objections to the imposition of the proposed tax before the municipal committee for its consideration. The municipal committee has to consider these objections. If, thereafter the municipal committee does not consider it necessary to alter its original proposals in substance it has to send its proposals with the objections received, its decision thereon and the modifications, if any, made by it in its original proposals for the consideration of the State Government. In the event the municipal committee decides to alter its original proposals in substance it has to go over the procedure once again by republishing its altered proposals for inviting objections thereto. When the proposals in their final form are received by the State Government it may on consideration of the matter sanction them or refuse to sanction them or sanction them with modifications affecting the substance. Here again if the State Government desires to modify the proposals of the municipal committee so as to affect their substance it has to send them back to the municipal committee for its acceptance. Thus, the right which is conferred on the inhabitants of the municipal committee by s. 67 is only the right to submit their objections to the proposed tax. Now, to afford an adequate opportunity to the inhabitants of the municipal committee for raising objections to the proposed tax the whole procedure of assessment of the tax need not be made known to them. It is sufficient if the inhabitants know the basic principles underlying the imposition of the proposed tax. And they, in our opinion, are that the inhabitants must know what is going to be taxed, the rate at which it is going to be taxed and the basis on which the proposed rate is going to be computed on a tax-payer.

Mr. Phadke placed reliance on r. 1 framed under s. 67(2) of the Act in support of his contention that the expression "system of assessment" is used in its comprehensive sense. The material part of the rule reads as follows:

"A notice under section 67(2) of the intention of the municipal committee to impose a tax... shall be forwarded to the State Government through the Deputy Commissioner for publication in the Madhya Pradesh Gazette. The notice under section 67(2) shall be accompanied by draft rules for the assessment and collection of the tax. After its publication in the gazette, the notice shall be published by affixing copies thereof to a notice-board at the municipal office and at conspicuous places in the town, and shall also be published in the local papers, if any. As an alternative to its publication in local papers, the committee may circulate the notice in print in vernacular within the municipal limits. Proclamation shall also be made by beat of drum throughout the municipality notifying the intention of the committee and calling the attention of the inhabitants to the notice in question and to the term of thirty days laid down in the law as that within which objections to the proposed imposition or increase must be submitted to the committee."

Laying emphasis on the words "shall publish in accordance with rules made under sub-section (2) of section 67" and "the notice under section 67(2) shall be accompanied by draft rules for the assessment and collection of the tax", Mr. Phadke contends that what is meant by the expression "system of assessment" in sub-s. (2) of s. 67 is these rules for the assessment and collection of the tax. In our view, on the language of the rule itself it is clear that the draft rules for the assessment and collection of the tax is something distinct and separate from the proposals of the committee. It is true that this rule requires publication in Gazette of the draft rules for the assessment and collection of the tax along with the proposals of the municipal committee, but that does not mean that these draft rules form part of the proposals of the municipal committee for the imposition of the tax. It will be further noted that on the language of the rule these draft rules are required to be published only in the Gazette. They are not required to be published in any other manner, while the proposals of the municipal committee have to be further published in other manner as stated in r. 1. This also indicates that these draft rules for the assessment and collection of the tax do not form part of the proposals of the municipal committee.

For reasons stated above, in our opinion, the expression "system of assessment" occurring in sub-s. (2) of s. 67 means the principles underlying the ascertainment of the basis upon which a tax is proposed to be computed.

Now, these principles are bound to vary in each case. For example, in the case of octroi tax imposed on animals all that is required to be stated is at what rate it is to be taxed. There is no further principle involved as regards the ascertainment of the basis upon which the proposed tax is to be computed. The tax is to be imposed on an animal at the proposed rate and that is all. But such would not be the case for example in imposition of a house-tax. The municipal committee undoubtedly would then be required to publish the principles which it proposes to adopt for ascertaining the basis upon which a house-tax is to be computed.

It is next necessary to see whether in the instant case there has been any failure on the part of the municipal committee to publish principles which it proposed to adopt in ascertaining the basis upon which the octroi tax was to be computed on any article or any animal.

Turning to the Notification I-A, which is published in the Gazette as well as in the local newspapers and pamphlets, it indicates the articles which are proposed to be taxed. A list of articles exempt from the octroi tax is given in cl. (2). There is an elaborate schedule containing a list of articles proposed to be taxed. In the schedule against each item is given the rate at which it is proposed to be taxed and it also gives the basis on which the tax would be computed. In certain cases the tax is computed per cart-load drawn by two animals; in certain other cases the tax is proposed to be computed on head-load, per number, animal load, motor truck-load, wagon load and in certain cases the tax is proposed to be computed at ad valorem rate. Then the municipal committee has given details as to what a maund is equal to and has also given details as to how in weightment a fraction of a maund would be computed for purposes of the tax. Looking to the notification and the details mentioned therein, in our opinion, there had been no failure on the part of the municipal committee to publish any detail which it was required to publish under sub-s. (2) of s. 67 of the Act. It has given the description of the property proposed to be taxed, rate of the proposed tax and the principles for ascertainment of the basis upon which the tax would be computed.

Mr. Phadke, however, contends that the details given in Notification I-A relating to the principles for ascertainment of the basis for the computation of tax are not full and complete. Rules 6(b), 8, 11, 26, 26A and 27 appearing in Notification II-A also relate to the same topic and should have been published in the Notification I-A. Failure on the part of the municipal committee has resulted in the denial of an opportunity to the inhabitants to raise objections to these rules. The imposition of tax is, therefore, bad in law.

Rule 6(b) provides for preparation of a table of current prices of articles liable to duty ad valorem. It is to be prepared on the basis of local inquiries and the invoices received during the week, and is to be corrected every week according to the fluctuation in prices so ascertained. Under r. 8, a tax-payer in anticipation of the arrival of dutiable articles exceeding Rs. 20 in value is permitted to approach the taxing authorities, and on the basis of the invoices satisfy them regarding the value of the articles and on that basis the officials charge the tax. If, however, there is any dispute between the two, then the matter is settled by the secretary. The difficulty would arise where the prices mentioned in the invoices are substantially at variance with the prices mentioned in the table. Rule 11 provides that in a case when an invoice of articles imported is produced by the importer of such article, the rates given in the invoice shall be compared with the rates shown in the table of current prices, or, in the absence of rates having been stated in the table, with the rates prevailing in the market situated within the limits of the municipality; if the invoice rate is found less by more than 12½ per cent., duty shall be assessed and collected according to the market rate as stated in the table or as ascertained from the condition in the market. These rules, in our opinion, only relate to the working out of the basic principle of computation of the tax on the value of the articles. No principle as such is laid down in rr. 6(b), 8 and 11. These rules also provide against evasion of the tax by an importer. It would be seen that under s. 71 of the Act the State Government is empowered to make rules not only for the assessment of tax, i.e. for ascertaining the tax payable by a tax-payer but also for preventing evasion of assessment, i.e. for preventing evasion of ascertaining the proper amount of tax payable by him.

Turning now to the provisions of rr. 26, 26A and 27, in our opinion, they hardly have any relevance to the principle underlying the ascertainment of the basis on which a tax is to be computed. Rules 26 and 26A relate to the procedure relating to articles which are imported within the limits of Akola town but which are intended to be immediately exported, and r. 27 relates to the detention of goods in a bonded warehouse when they are intended to be kept within the municipal limits for a temporary period. In our opinion, therefore, in the rules published in Notification II-A, there is no rule which can be said to be forming part of the system of assessment within the meaning of sub-s. (2) of s. 67 of the Act. In our opinion, therefore, the petitioners have not been able to show that there had been any non-compliance with the provisions of sub-s. (2) or sub-s. (3) of s. 67.

Turning now to the contention raised on behalf of the petitioners as to the contravention of sub-s. (4) of s. 67, it provides:

"The committee shall take the proposal and all objections received thereon into consideration at a special meeting, and may modify the proposals so as not to affect the substance, and may then forward them to the State Government along with all objections received, its decisions thereon and its reasons therefor. If the committee decides to modify the proposals so as to affect their substance, it shall publish them again in the manner prescribed in sub-section (3)."

It is the contention of Mr. Phadke that in the final proposals submitted to the State Government the municipal committee had made substantial modifications in respect of items 23, 38 and 48 in the schedule appearing in Notification I-A. These changes amount to modification of the original proposals affecting the substance. The municipal committee, therefore, was bound to follow the procedure once over again, i.e. republish its modified proposals, inviting the attention of the inhabitants of the municipality before finally submitting them to the State Government. In our opinion, this contention is also without substance. The modifications suggested in the final proposals only relate to corrections of printing mistakes or omissions. We will illustrate this by reference to the entries. Entry No. 23 relates to "Tea, coffee, cocoa etc". It is stated that goods liable to octroi duty. In printing, the rate at which the tax was proposed to be had remained to be mentioned. It appears that the Brooke Bond Company, a well-known company dealing in tea, noticing this omission, made inquiries as regards the amount of tax proposed to be imposed on it and thereafter noting this mistake the municipal committee in its proposals of March 3, 1958, corrected it by stating that the proposed tax was at 75 nP. per maund. Now, anybody who would be misled by this schedule in the Notification I-A could not be under any mistake. No tax was proposed to be imposed on tea, coffee etc. It is obvious that the omission to mention the rate of tax was due to some mistake. It is contended that this mistake led the inhabitants to believe that no tax was proposed to be levied on this item. We are informed that this proposal of the municipal committee has not been accepted by the Government. It is that tea and coffee have become taxable under a residuary clause. This was the position under Notification I-A as it stood. In our opinion, the petitioners have not been able to establish that there was any non-compliance with the provisions of sub-s. (4) of s. 67 of the Act.

Turning to the non-compliance with sub-s. (6) of s. 67, it provides that any modification affecting the substance shall be made under sub-s. (5), (which relates to granting of sanction by the Government to the final proposal of the municipal committee) unless and until the modification has been approved by the committee at a special meeting. We had asked Mr. Phadke to show modifications effected by the sanction of the State Government which would result in substantially affecting the proposals of the municipal committee. However, were not shown any items. This contention, therefore, must fail.

As regards the next contention relating to non-service of notice of the meeting of March 3, 1958, on two of the members of the committee, viz. G. M. Savarkar and H. P. Gole, controversy on facts is raised by the municipal committee. It is the contention of the municipal committee that G. M. Savarkar was not at the station. Notice was, therefore, handed over to his brother who has taken to give it to G. M. Savarkar on his return. An affidavit of G. M. Savarkar's brother to that effect is filed in this Court by the municipal committee.

so advised, by a regular suit.

This brings us to the last contention raised by Mr. Phadke on behalf of the petitioners and that is as regards lack of bona fides of the State Government in issuing the notification of June 19, 1958. Mr. Phadke contends that the State Government full well knew that a petition had been filed in this Court. It was served with the notice of the petitioners' application for grant of interim injunction. It was the desire of the State Government to shut out an inquiry by this Court as regards the illegalities alleged to have been committed by the municipal committee and it is with this view that the notification had been issued. The case of the Government, as stated in the return, is that notice of stay was not served on the Secretary, Local Self-Government, at any time. A copy of the stay application was received only in the office of the Special Government Pleader on May 9, 1958, it was forwarded by the Special Government Pleader to the Collector, Akola, on May 16, 1958. He sent his report to the Special Government Pleader on May 24, 1958, and by a further letter dated June 7, 1958, instructed the Special Government Pleader to oppose the stay application. It is further averred by the State Government that it was not served with the copy of the application on merits and it did not know what the contentions of the petitioners were. The Government thus denied that it acted in any mala fide way in issuing the notification on June 19, 1958. In short, the case of the Government is that it did not know what the grievance of the petitioners was as the petition on merits was not served on it. The stay application also was not served on the Secretary of the Department concerned. The matter remained only between the Special Government Pleader and the Collector, Akola, and the Government acting in its usual course, after considering the objections of the inhabitants on June 13, 1958, issued the notification. Now, it is difficult to believe that the Secretary of the Department did not know of the application for interim injunction made by the petitioners in this Court or rule issued by this Court on April 18, 1958. Admittedly, the Special Government Pleader had written to the Collector, Akola, on May 9, 1958. He had instructed the Special Government Pleader on June 7, 1958, to oppose the application. It is difficult to assume that the Collector of Akola had instructed the Special Government Pleader to oppose the application without any instructions from the Government. There is also no substance in the contention raised on behalf of the Government that the Secretary, Local Self-Government, was not served with the notice. Provisions of law do not require service on the Secretary. On the other hand, provisions of O. XXVII, r. 4, of the Civil Procedure Code clearly show that the Government Pleader in any Court is the agent of the Government for the purpose of receiving processes against the Government issued by such Court. The Special Government Pleader was duly served with notice. These facts, however, are not sufficient to hold that the Government in issuing the notification was acting mala fide or was actuated with the motive of shutting out an inquiry at the hands of this Court into the irregularities alleged to have been committed by the municipal committee.

The learned Special Government Pleader has not pressed before us the objection raised about the presumption of conclusiveness of the notification under sub-s. (8) of s. 67 of the Act.

We may, however, observe that in our experience, at any rate, in my experience, this is a first time when the State Government, departing from a healthy practice, has issued a notification likely to affect the merits of this case, after rule had been issued and served on the Government Pleader. We hope not to come across any such instance in future.

DATTATRAYA SHRIPATI MOHITE v. SHANKAR ISHWARA MOHITE.

Admission—Evidentiary value of,—Admission by party to suit concerning subject-matter in dispute—Whether Court entitled to consider such admission in subsequent proceeding concerning same subject-matter.

An admission on a question of fact made by a party in the course of a proceeding can be regarded as a good piece of evidence relying on which the opposing party may contend that the claim made in the subsequent proceeding is unjustifiable. Therefore, the Court is entitled to consider admissions solemnly made by a party concerning the subject-matter in dispute in the course of a proceeding in adjudging upon the truth or otherwise of the claim made by that party in a subsequent proceeding concerning the same subject-matter.

*Ramabai Shrinivas v. Government of Bombay*¹, explained.

The following genealogy explains the relationship between the parties to the suit:—

Ishwara and Ganu were two sons of Natha Mohite. Shankar and Dadu (defendants Nos. 1 and 2) were the sons of Ishwara and Dattatraya (plaintiff) was the grandson of Ganu. Ishwara died in 1901 leaving him surviving his wife Gangabai and the defendants. Defendant No. 1 was at the date of Ishwara's death about 7 years of age and defendant No. 2 was about 10 years of age. The dispute in this litigation arose in respect of four lands. All these lands were held as Kotkari Inam lands of the ancient Kadim grants in the Jahagir of Sarlaskar Bahadur of the former Kolhapur State. Of these lands, Ishwara during his lifetime was the Navavala. On the death of Ishwara in 1901, an heirship enquiry was commenced. That enquiry was concluded some time in the year 1908. During the enquiry Gangabai, widow of Ishwara, continued to remain in possession of the lands and let them out to her tenants. In 1909 the order passed by the authorities declaring that Shripati—son of Ganu—was the Navavala was given effect to, and Shripati was put in possession of all the lands held by Ishwara. Thereafter the defendants filed suit No. 10 of 1912 against Shripati, Mahadu Natha and Rama Natha for setting aside the order passed in the heirship enquiry and claiming possession of lands other than inam lands held by Ishwara. The trial Judge held that defendants Nos. 1 and 2—sons of Ishwara—were the lawful heirs of Ishwara and were entitled to all his properties except the Inam lands and the income accruing therefrom for performance of Government service. In 1918, defendant No. 2, who is the elder of the two defendants, submitted an application for reviewing the order passed in the heirship enquiry. That application was rejected on May 18, 1918. Thereafter Shripati died, and another heirship enquiry was started which remained pending till sometime in 1936. During the enquiry the plaintiff—son of Shripati—remained in possession of the Inam lands and he performed the service for holding these lands. The enquiry officer recognised the claim of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff was declared the Navavala. On May 13, 1939, defendant No. 2 executed a Kabulayat in favour of the plaintiff under which he purported to enter into possession of the Inam lands as a tenant of the plaintiff. Thereafter on May 25, 1939, defendant No. 1 obtained a lease of the Inam lands for ten years from the plaintiff. Thereafter, the plaintiff challenged the lease, dated May 25, 1939, in Suit No. 3 of 1941 on the plea that it was procured from him by practising fraud. In that suit, defendant No. 1 denied the allegations set up by the plaintiff and claimed that he was a tenant of the lands, and that he was paying rent to the plaintiff. That suit was dismissed. Record of Rights was introduced in the area in which the lands were situate some time about the year 1947 and the lands were entered in the name of the plaintiff. The plaintiff paid the assessment of the lands year after year and the same was accepted by the revenue authorities. The plaintiff then filed Suit No. 565 of 1948 against the defendants for a decree for rent due by defendant No. 1 under the rent note, dated May 25, 1939. In that suit defendant No. 1 contended that the lease dated May 25, 1939, was extended by mutual agreement for a period of five years and that he was accordingly entitled to remain in possession of the lands as a tenant. Defendant No. 1 admitted in that suit that he was in possession as a tenant. The suit filed by the plaintiff was decreed on November 29, 1949. In the meanwhile the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act was made applicable to the area in which the lands were situate, and the plaintiff filed Tenancy Application No. 25 of 1950 in the Court of the Mamlatdar for an order for possession of the lands on the expiry of the period of the lease. In that application, defendant No. 1 contended that he was a protected tenant and that he was not liable to be evicted. That contention of defendant No. 1 was negatived and an order for possession was passed against the defendants. In pursuance of this order of the Mamlatdar, possession of the Inam lands was delivered to the plaintiff on September 23, 1950, and June 3, 1951. Against the order passed by the Mamlatdar the defendants preferred an appeal to the Prant Officer and that appeal was dismissed in 1951 and the defendants acquiesced in that order. In the meanwhile the defendants attempted to trespass upon the land in the possession of the plaintiff. On August 23, 1951, the police officer in charge of the police station within the jurisdiction of which the lands were situate started proceedings under s. 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code apprehending breach of the public peace. Thereafter the plaintiff filed the present suit for a declaration that the rent which was collected by the Receiver who was appointed in the proceedings under s. 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code was payable to him. The defendants resisted the claim of the plaintiff to that amount and contended that the plaintiff was not in possession and was not entitled to the injunction claimed by him. The plaintiff then amended the plaint and asked for relief for possession of the lands from the defendants in the event of the Court holding that he was at the date of the suit not in possession of the suit lands. To the claim made by the plaintiff for a declaration of title and for an injunction and alternatively for possession, the defendants raised diverse contentions. They denied that the plaintiff had title to the suit property. They contended that they were in possession of the suit property in their own right and not as tenants under rent note, dated May 25, 1939; that the plaintiff was not in possession of the suit lands within twelve years prior to the date of the suit; that their father Ishwara was the Navavala of the suit lands and that the orders declaring the plaintiff's father and after his death the plaintiff as the Navavala of the suit lands were illegal and were obtained fraudulently and the same were not binding on the defendants; that certain other persons were necessary parties to the suit, and the claim made by the plaintiff could not be decreed unless those persons were impleaded; that the plaintiff had no title to the suit property either derivatively or by adverse possession and that the lands being Rayatawa lands at the date of institution of the suit the plaintiff's suit was liable to be dismissed.

The trial Judge decided all the issues against the plaintiff and in favour of the defendants. He, therefore, dismissed the plaintiff's suit.

The plaintiff appealed.

SHAH J. [His Lordship after stating the facts of the case and dealing with points not material to this report, proceeded:] We have referred to the diverse admissions made by the defendants from time to time since the year 1939 of the title of the plaintiff to the suit lands. The learned trial Judge ignored these admissions somewhat lightly purporting to rely upon the judgment of Beaumont C.J. in Ramabai Shrinivas v. Government of Bombay.¹ In the view of the learned trial Judge, it was decided in Ramabai's case that admissions made by a person concerning the subject-matter in dispute in the course of a proceeding, cannot have any evidentiary value in adjudging upon the truth or otherwise of the claim made by that person in a subsequent proceeding concerning the same subject-matter. It must at once be observed that Beaumont C.J. has not laid down any such proposition. We may take this opportunity of stating that the observations made in this case are often misunderstood. Beaumont C.J. merely laid down that an admission made by a party in a pleading in a civil proceeding will be regarded as binding upon him in that proceeding and he will not be permitted to go back upon it in the course of that proceeding: but the admission cannot be regarded as conclusive and binding upon him in any other proceeding and it is open to him to show that that admission made in the earlier proceeding was in fact not true. The observation on which reliance was placed by the learned trial Judge is contained in the following paragraph (p. 234):

"...The learned Judge, in the case of defendants Nos. 2 and 3, held that Government were bound by an admission in their written statement filed in the original suit of 1913 in which the costs were incurred, and that by that admission Government had acknowledged that the lands had been assigned as reward for services; but the learned Judge's view on that point is clearly wrong. A party is not bound by an admission in his pleading except for the purposes of the suit in which the pleading is delivered. It frequently happens that a party is prepared in a particular suit to deal with the case on a particular ground and to make an admission, but that admission is not binding in any other suit, and certainly not for all time. Government may have known much less about the position in 1913 than they know now. If they had pleaded erroneously in the suit of 1913 and had discovered the error in time, they could have amended the pleading, and it would be a strange thing to hold that, after the suit had been disposed of, and the chance to amend the pleading had gone, Government were bound for all time by their admission."

It is difficult to hold that by these observations the learned Chief Justice intended to lay down the proposition that an admission on a question of fact made by a party in the course of a proceeding has in another proceeding no value whatever and cannot be regarded as a good piece of evidence relying on which the opposing party may contend that the claim made in the subsequent proceeding is unjustifiable. In our view, Ramabai's case is not an authority in support of the view that the Court is not even entitled to consider admissions solemnly made by a party in the course of proceedings in other suits relating to the same subject-matter. We are unable to agree with the observation made by the learned trial Judge in paras. 35, 36 and 44 of his judgment that the admissions made by defendants Nos. 1 and 2, in the proceedings in Suit No. 565 of 1948 and the revenue proceedings and in the earlier Suit No. 3 of 1941 have no evidentiary value.

[The rest of the judgment is not material to this report.]

THE PETLAD TOWN MUNICIPALITY v. THE PETLAD KESHAV
MILLS CO. LTD.*

Bombay District Municipal Act (Bom. III of 1901), Secs. 59, 60, 46, 167-A, 180-A—Bombay Merged States (Laws) Act (Bom. IV of 1950)—Baroda State (Application of Laws) Order, 1949—Whether municipality by framing rules can grant remission of any tax specified in s. 59—Person entitled to refund of part of tax paid to municipality—Municipality admitting its liability to refund but not making the refund—Suit for recovery of such refund whether governed by s. 167-A—Indian Limitation Act (IX of 1908), art. 62.

Under ss. 59, 60 and 46 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, a municipality has power to provide by rules a scheme for granting remissions in the matter of recovery of any of the taxes specified in s. 59 of the Act including a terminal tax.

Failure by a municipality governed under the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, to refund an amount of tax, while accepting liability to refund the same, cannot be said to be an "act done in pursuance or execution or intended execution" of the Act. Therefore, where the plaintiff was in the first instance bound to pay a tax to a municipality and had in fact paid the same, but under the law prevailing the plaintiff was entitled to refund of a percentage of the tax paid and the municipality while admitting liability did not refund the same, a suit filed by the plaintiff for refund of tax would not be governed by s. 167-A of the Act, but by art. 62 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

SHAH J. This is an appeal against the decree passed by the Civil Judge, Senior Division, at Nadiad, decreeing against the Petlad Town Municipality, a municipality governed by the Bombay District Municipal Act III of 1901, a sum of Rs. 13,397-9-9 and proportionate costs of the suit and future interest from the date of the suit till satisfaction.

The facts which give rise to this appeal may be briefly stated. The town of Petlad was originally within the jurisdiction of the former Baroda State. The Keshav Mills Co. Ltd. is a limited liability company which was registered under the Companies Act of the Baroda State, and owns a factory in the town of Petlad for manufacture of cotton textile and yarn. For its manufacturing business the company had to import machinery, raw materials and other goods from outside the limits of the municipality, and had to export the manufactured goods. The company applied to the former Baroda State Government for remission in the matter of levy of taxes such as income-tax, excess profit tax, and octroi and the terminal taxes. From time to time remissions were given to the company. Finally in the year 1946 the Baroda State Government granted remissions which were to endure for a period of 15 years in the matter of recovery of taxes including the octroi duty and the terminal tax levied by the Petlad Municipality. The Baroda State Government from time to time directed the municipality, in exercise of its authority under s. 59 (Tha) of the Baroda State Municipal Act of Samvat Year 1962, to give remission to the company in the levy of octroi duty and the terminal tax. The municipality, in exercise of its powers under s. 46 of that Act, framed rules in conformity with the directions given by the State authorities. By Act XII of 1949 the Baroda Act of S. Y. 1962 was repealed, and a new Act called the A Class Municipalities Act was enacted, and under that Act also the State Government reserved to itself the power to grant remission in the matter of recovery of municipal taxes and to issue directions in that behalf to the municipalities concerned. Provision was also made for framing rules by the municipalities for granting remissions in the levy of taxes, and the notifications issued under the Act of S.Y. 1962 were directed to be continued in operation as if they were made under Act XII of 1949. On July 30, 1949, the Baroda State (Application of Laws) Order, 1949, was issued under the Extra Provincial Jurisdiction Act, 1947. By that Order, the Bombay District Municipal Act III of 1901 was applied to the area of the former Baroda State: and by the operation of that Order the Baroda Act XII of 1949 stood repealed. The provisions of the Baroda State (Application of Laws) Order, 1949, were repealed and re-enacted by Bombay Act IV of 1950 called the Bombay Merged States (Laws) Act, 1950, and by Schedule 1 to that Act Bombay Act III of 1901 was extended to the area of the former Baroda State with the addition of s. 180A which was added thereto by an amendment to the Act. It appears that the Petlad Municipality gave remissions consistently with the directions issued by the Baroda State Government under Baroda Act 1 of S.Y. 1962 in the matter of levy of the terminal tax payable by the company. After the Baroda State merged with the Indian Union and Bombay Act III of 1901 was made applicable to that area, disputes arose as to the liability of the municipality to refund a percentage of the tax collected by it. It may be observed that the scheme for giving remission adopted by the municipality under the rules framed by it was that in the first instance the entire amount of tax payable was collected from the company and at the end of the year the municipality made up accounts and refunded the excess amount collected consistently with the remission or concession declared by the State authorities. As the municipality after the merger of the Baroda State did not refund the excess amount of terminal tax collected by it, by letter, dated February 3, 1950, the company called upon the Chief Officer of the municipality to refund Rs. 3,445-4-0 due by the municipality for the period between August 1, 1948, and July 31, 1949. To this letter a reply was sent by the municipality on March 15, 1950, informing the company that the request made for refund of the terminal tax was placed before the General Body of the municipality and it was resolved that the tax be refunded. The resolution which was moved and the amendment thereto were set out in the letter. The company was also intimated that it was decided to refund to the "industries," amounts as may be decided by the Sub-Committee, but it was "specially so resolved" that the opinion of the Legal Remembrancer be obtained and the amount may be refunded to the "industries" on condition that if the final decision in the matter was against the "industries" the "industries" will repay to the municipality the amounts refunded. It appears that thereafter the excess tax collected for the years 1946-47 and 1947-48 was refunded to the company.

On November 7, 1950, a letter was addressed by the company to the Chief Officer of the municipality stating that terminal tax for the period between August 1, 1949, and July 31, 1950, amounting to Rs. 9,265-9-0 was paid and according to the resolution of the Department of Commerce and Industries an amount of Rs. 3,706-4-0 being 40 per cent. of the tax paid by the company was refundable, and a request was then made for payment of that amount. That request was repeated by letter, dated August 4, 1951, and also by letters dated August 13 and 23, 1951. A resolution was passed by the municipality on September 29, 1951, whereby it was resolved to refund to the mills and factories the amounts remitted to them from the terminal tax both for the period prior to the date on which the Baroda State merged with the Indian Union and for the period subsequent to the merger. It appears that on October 16, 1951, a voucher was made out for refund of the taxes for the years 1948-49 and 1949-50 and even cheques were drawn on October 22, 1951, in that behalf but were not delivered to the company. Thereafter by letter, exh. 95, dated October 2, 1951, the company demanded refund of Rs. 1,906-1-0 being 40 per cent. of the terminal tax paid for the period between August 1, 1950, and March 31, 1951. This request was repeated by letters, exhs. 103, 104 and 105, respectively dated October 6, October 25, and December 12, 1951. By letter, exh. 96, dated August 25, 1952, the company again demanded refund of Rs. 3,323-1-0 being 45 per cent. of the total amount of terminal tax paid for the period between April 1, 1951, and March 31, 1952. By letter, exh. 97, dated December 17, 1952, a demand was made for refund of Rs. 1,946-4-0 being 45 per cent. of the terminal tax paid for the period between April 1, 1952, and October 21, 1952. This request was not complied with by the municipality. It may be observed that the company restricted its claim for refund of the terminal tax up to October 21, 1952, because by a notification issued by the Government of Bombay, dated October 22, 1952, the remissions which were directed by the former Baroda State Government to be given were cancelled. By letter, dated December 26, 1952, the company again wrote to the municipality stating that the terminal tax for the period between August 1, 1948, and July 31, 1950, in spite of the General Board Resolution had not been refunded. The company informed the municipality that it "was being put in difficulty and monetary loss" on account of the default of the municipality in complying with the resolution and the orders passed by the Government. A reminder was sent on January 9, 1953. By letter, dated January 24, 1953, the company was informed by the municipality that the matter was under consideration of the municipality and "clarification" will be made thereon. Thereafter on February 1, 1953, the municipality resolved that if the Government of the State of Bombay gave to the municipality as "help" an amount equal to the amount refundable to the industries, then the said amount should be "paid off to the industries." It was further resolved to take steps to get "help" immediately from the Government and to send the bills for the amount of refund for every year to the Government together with the demand. The Government of Bombay declined to comply with the request made by the municipality. The company after serving a notice commenced suit No. 24 of 1953 on July 30, 1953, against the municipality for a decree for Rs. 14,324-14-0 and Rs. 1,072-8-0 as interest as damages. It was the company's case that it was entitled to receive from the municipality Rs. 3,445-4-0 for the period between August 1, 1948 and July 31, 1949, Rs. 3,706-4-0 for the period between August 1, 1949 and July 31, 1950, Rs. 1,906-1-0 for the period between August 1, 1950 and March 31, 1951, Rs. 3,321-1-0 for the period between April 1, 1951 and March 31, 1952, and Rs. 1,946-4-0 for the period between April 1, 1952 and October 21, 1952, aggregating in all to Rs. 14,324-14-0, by virtue of the orders passed by the former Baroda State Government and the rules framed by the municipality in the matter of refund of terminal taxes and the provisions of s. 180A added to the Bombay District Municipal Act III of 1901 when the Bombay Merged States (Laws) Act was enacted. It was submitted by the company that the cause of action arose in favour of the company for the first time when the municipality by resolution, dated February 1, 1953, resolved that the amount will be paid to the company only in the event of the Government of Bombay paying the sum to the municipality.

The claim of the company was resisted by the municipality on diverse grounds. It was contended that the State of Bombay was a necessary party to the suit, that no concession in respect of terminal taxes was granted by the former Baroda State, that in any event the municipality was not bound to grant remissions according to the orders relied upon by the company, that the concessions in any event became ineffective on July 30, 1949, when the Baroda State (Application of Laws) Order was enacted and the concessions could not be continued under s. 180A of Bombay Act III of 1901, that the company was not entitled to claim interest by way of damages, and that no claim to recover the amount of remission or concession could be made in the suit as framed, and in any event the municipality was not liable to pay the amount claimed because the company was in a "prosperous condition". It was also contended that the suit was barred by the law of limitation. Finally it was contended that the defendant-municipality was entitled to deduct the collection charges out of the amount claimed.

The learned trial Judge substantially negatived all the contentions raised by the defendant except two: (i) relating to the claim made by the company about the award of interest by way of damages and (ii) regarding collection charges for the taxes; and he passed a decree for Rs. 13,397-9-9 in favour of the plaintiff company.

In this appeal, Mr. Kotwal on behalf of the municipality has raised three contentions: (i) that the municipality is not liable, since the date on which the Baroda State (Application of Laws) Order, 1949, was issued, to give effect to the remissions granted by the former Baroda State because there is no provision in the Bombay District Municipal Act under which such remissions could be directed to be given by the State to the municipality; (ii) that enforcement of the claim made by the plaintiff company is barred by s. 167A of the Bombay District Municipal Act; and (iii) that unless the municipality received the amount from the Government of Bombay it was under no obligation to pay the same to the plaintiff company; in other words, the liability of the municipality was conditional upon the amount being received from the Government of Bombay which was primarily liable to pay the same. We will deal with these contentions seriatim.

The Baroda Municipal Act of S.Y. 1962 was substantially based upon Bombay Act III of 1901. A large majority of the provisions of the former Act were identical with the provisions of Act III of 1901. But by s. 59 (Tha) of the Baroda Municipal Act (for which there is no parallel provision in Act III of 1901) it was provided that "For the development of Trade and Industry, if the Government deems fit to grant exemption or any other concession, (1) to any factory in respect of any of these taxes, or (2) in respect of the levy of octroi or other tax on goods manufactured in any factory in the State and imported or exported at any place in the State, the Huzur shall pass proper order, after considering the opinion of the municipality, and the municipality shall abide by it."

Evidently by this clause authority was reserved to the Ruler of the Baroda State to grant exemption to certain tax payers in the matter of levy of petroi duty and other taxes and the municipality was bound to comply with the direction given by the State authorities. It is in pursuance of this authority that the former Baroda State granted concessions or remissions to the plaintiff company in the levy of terminal tax. The municipality under s. 46 framed the Terminal Tax Rules prescribing the rates of terminal tax, and the terms on which exemption was to be given. Rule No. 7 thereof provided:

"The concessions given to industries for the development of trade will continue for this tax also."

The procedure for giving the concession was then set out in the rule. It was stated:

"...the merchants and factory owners of Petlad who are given exemption of octroi or who are given concession of paying a fixed amount should pay the amount of terminal tax and take receipts thereof and produce the same in the municipality at the end of the year and the municipality after just deducting 5 per cent. charges of the Railways company for collecting the terminal tax or octroi, refund the balance to the factory owners; and no factory owner is to be given a free pass."

That pursuant to this direction remission of terminal tax was given up to the year 1947-48 is undisputed. The dispute between the parties has arisen in respect of the concession claimed to be due since and after the year 1948-49. As we have already observed, on July 30, 1949, the Baroda (Application of Laws) Order, 1949 was passed and thereby Bombay Act III of 1901 was applied and Baroda Act XII of 1949 which had repealed the Baroda Act of S.Y. 1962 was itself repealed. At the time when the Bombay Merged State (Laws) Act, 1950, was passed, s. 180A was added to Bombay Act III of 1901. It was provided by sub-s. (1) of that section:

"Notwithstanding anything contained in the foregoing provisions of this Act, such rules, by-laws, or orders made, issued or sanctioned by or in respect of any of the municipalities whether constituted under the A Class Municipalities Act (Baroda No. XII of 1949) or the B Class Municipalities Act (Baroda No. XIV of 1949) of the former Baroda State (hereinafter called "the said Municipalities" and "the said Baroda Municipalities Acts" respectively) as were in force immediately before the 30th day of July 1949 under the said Baroda Municipalities Acts, shall in so far as they are consistent with the provisions of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901 (Bom. III of 1901), be deemed to have been made, issued, or sanctioned by or in respect of the said municipalities under the appropriate provisions of the said Act on the said date and continue in force until altered, repealed or amended by a competent authority."

By Bombay Act IV of 1950, Bombay Act III of 1901 was applied to municipalities in the merged areas, by including that Act in the first schedule with the addition of s. 180-A as stated by us earlier. It is evident, therefore, that all rules, bye-laws and orders made, issued or sanctioned by or in respect of any of the municipalities constituted under the Baroda Acts were to be deemed to have been made, issued or sanctioned by or in respect of the said municipalities under the appropriate provisions of Bombay Act III of 1901 as from July 30, 1949. By statute, therefore, the orders issued by the Baroda State to the municipalities were to be deemed to continue under the appropriate provisions of Bombay Act III of 1901. If, therefore, under Bombay Act III of 1901 a remission could be granted in the matter of levy of terminal tax, the order passed by the former Baroda State must be deemed to be continued by the Bombay Merged States (Laws) Act, 1950, read with Bombay Act III of 1901.

Mr. Kotwal on behalf of the municipality contended that there was no provision in Bombay Act III of 1901 under which a remission of the nature granted to the company could be claimed. We are unable to accept that contention. Under s. 59 of Bombay Act III of 1901, a municipality is entitled to select for imposition, subject to general or special orders of the State Government, any of the taxes specified therein: and terminal tax is one of the taxes which may be imposed by a municipality under s. 59. By s. 60 it is provided that the municipality before imposing a tax shall observe certain preliminary procedure, viz., that it shall resolve to select for the purpose one or other of the taxes specified in s. 59 and prepare rules for the purpose of cl. (i) of s. 46 prescribing the tax selected and shall by such resolution and in such rules specify inter alia the class or classes of persons or of property, or of both, which the municipality desires to make liable. Section 46(i) provides that the municipality shall make and from time to time alter or rescind rules, prescribing, subject to the provisions of Chapter VII, the taxes to be levied in the municipal district for municipal purposes, the grounds on which exemptions are to be recognised, the conditions on which and the extent to which remissions may be granted and the system on which refunds are to be allowed and paid. It is clear, therefore, from ss. 59, 60 and 46 that the municipality was competent to select for imposition a tax called the terminal tax on goods imported into or exported from the municipal limit and also to prescribe by rules framed in that behalf the exemptions which may be recognised and the conditions on which and the extent to which remissions may be granted. The power of the municipality to provide by rules a scheme for granting remissions in the matter of recovery of any of the taxes specified in s. 59 including the terminal tax will sustain the remission granted by r. 7 which we have already referred to as appropriately granted under ss. 59, 60 and 46 of the Act.

But Mr. Kotwal contends that there is no provision in Act III of 1901 whereby the State Authority is competent to direct the municipality to grant remission to any class of tax-payers. It is urged that a municipality may by resolution grant a remission to any class of tax-payers but the municipality cannot be compelled by the State Authorities to grant such a remission. Mr. S. M. Shah, who appears on behalf of the company, invited our attention to the opening words of s. 59 of the Act which contemplate that the imposition of a tax may be subject to any general or special orders which the State Government may make in that behalf, and contended that orders which could be passed by the former Baroda State may appropriately be passed under the head of "special orders" contemplated by s. 59. But we do not think it necessary to decide the question whether it is open to the State to direct by general or special order grant of remission in the matter of levy of a tax by exercising authority under s. 59, because, in our view, the municipality of Petlad has in fact framed rules which grant remissions in the matter of levy of the terminal tax to the cotton textile mills within its area. Whether the rule has been made because the municipality was ordered by the Baroda State Authorities or by a resolution passed in the unfettered discretion of the members of the municipality, is not germane in discussing the question about the obligation of the municipality to refund a percentage of the tax. The rule is a statutory rule which the municipality has framed and that rule is within the competence of the municipality. That being so, it must be held that the remission was granted by the municipality under the rules made under the appropriate provisions of the Bombay District Municipal Act III of 1901.

Incidentally it was sought to be urged by Mr. Kotwal that taxation of trade and industry was not within the competence of the municipality and, therefore, the granting of remissions of a tax with the object of protecting trade and industry was not within the competence of the municipality. But the terminal tax is one of the taxes which is within the competence of a District Municipality to impose, and that tax has been selected for imposition by the Petlad Municipality, and there is no dispute that it has lawfully been imposed and levied. If the municipality may competently levy the terminal tax, we fail to appreciate why the municipality may not make rules for granting remissions or exemptions to certain classes of tax-payers in the levy and collection of that tax. When the municipality is framing rules for granting remission in the recovery of a certain tax which is imposed upon the citizens generally or a certain class of tax-payers, it is not seeking to legislate in the matter of the object for which the remission is given. We are, therefore, unable to accept the argument of Mr. Kotwal that the municipality was incompetent to grant remission of a percentage of the terminal tax merely because the object of the remission was to protect or benefit trade and industry. The remissions granted by the municipality must, therefore, be regarded as validly continued after July 30, 1949, and the plaintiff-company is entitled to the remissions.

The contention that the company's claim is barred by the law of limitation has, in our judgment, no substance. The taxes in respect of which refund is claimed related to the period between August 1, 1948, and October 21, 1952. It is urged that a suit for recovery of tax, which the municipality under the Act or the Rules was obliged to refund, may lie within the period and subject to the conditions prescribed by s. 167-A of Bombay Act III of 1901, and not otherwise, and the present suit by the company being beyond the period prescribed thereby, is barred. Section 167-A(1) of the Bombay District Municipal Act, in so far as it is material, provides:

"No suit shall lie against a municipality... in respect of any act done in pursuance or execution or intended execution of this Act, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of this Act—

(a) unless it is commenced within six months next after the accrual of the cause of action; and

(b) until the expiration of one month after notice in writing has been, in the case of a municipality, delivered or left at the municipal office...."

If the cause of action has accrued to the plaintiff-company more than six months before the date of the suit, and the suit is in respect of any act done in pursuance or execution or intended execution of the Act, the suit may be liable to be dismissed as barred by s. 167-A. But, in our judgment, s. 167-A has no application to the claim made by the company. The municipality had never before the suit was filed denied liability to pay the amount claimed by the plaintiff company. As we have pointed out earlier, from time to time demands were made by the company for the amounts payable and the municipality did not deny liability to satisfy the claim. In resolution after resolution formally discussed and put to vote before the meetings of the General Board of the municipality, the liability of the municipality to refund the amount of terminal tax to the company was accepted and acknowledged, but the liability was not discharged by payment. It was only on February 1, 1953, that the municipality resolved that the amount will be paid on the same being received from the Government; but even by that resolution the liability was not denied. In our judgment, failure, while accepting liability, to satisfy the same cannot be said to be an "act done in pursuance or execution or intended execution" of the Bombay District Municipal Act III of 1901.

It was held by a division bench of this Court in Ranchordas Moorarji v. The Municipal Commissioner for the City of Bombay,¹ that a suit for refund of taxes which had been paid and which the plaintiff was entitled under the rules to a refund of was not governed by s. 527 of the City of Bombay Municipal Act III of 1888. In that case, a tax-payer of the Bombay Municipality sued to recover certain town duty which he had paid on importing grain and sugar but which under s. 195 of Act III of 1888 he was entitled to have refunded on exporting the commodity. The tax-payer applied for refund in October 1899, but his claim was rejected on February 21, 1900. A suit was then filed on August 21, 1900. It was contended by the municipality that the suit was barred as it did not comply with the requirements of s. 527 of Act III of 1888 which prescribed that one month's notice shall be given of any suit intended to be commenced in respect of any act in pursuance or execution or intended execution of the Act, and the action shall be commenced within ninety days from the date of the act or omission complained of. The Court held that s. 527 did not apply and that no notice of the suit to the defendant-municipality was necessary. It was observed that the defendant—Commissioner of the municipality—could not claim that his conduct had any relation to the execution of the Act if he knowingly and intentionally acted in contravention of its provisions, and to the claim made by the plaintiff s. 527 was no bar.

In Ranchordas's case, after paying the tax in the first instance the plaintiff had a right to obtain a refund and when the municipality while admitting liability did not refund the tax, it was held that the suit was not governed by s. 527 of Act III of 1888. In the present case, when the plaintiff-company was in the first instance bound to pay the tax, and in fact paid the same, but under the law prevailing it was entitled to refund of a percentage of the tax paid, and the municipality while admitting liability did not refund the same, it must, on the authority of Ranchordas's case, be held that the suit was not governed by s. 167-A of the Bombay District Municipal Act III of 1901.

Mr. Kotwal sought to place strong reliance upon a judgment of this Court in the Municipality of Chopda v. Motilal.² In that case, the Municipality of Chopda had levied under s. 59 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, a tax called the "cotton manufacturing tax", and a dispute as to the legality of that tax. This Court held that a substantial part of the tax was not leviable by the municipality as the levy thereof was in excess of the ceiling provided by art. 276 of the Constitution. But the Court in the plaintiff's suit for refund of the tax already paid by him was governed by s. 167-A of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901. In that case, the municipality was not leviable, but the municipality in execution or intended execution of the Act purported to levy it, and the plaintiff sought refund of it. It was held that the suit for recovery of the tax was governed by s. 167-A of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901. In the present case, there is no dispute that the tax is leviable by the municipality and there is no illegality in the levy thereof. The plaintiff-company claimed a part of the tax paid by it, relying upon the remission given by the Baroda State and continued under the provisions of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901. In failing to refund the tax, the municipality is entitled under the Rules, the municipality is not doing an "act in pursuance or execution or intended execution of the Act. We are, therefore, of the view that the present case is governed by s. 167-A of the Bombay District Municipal Act but by the no limitation provided in that behalf by the Limitation Act. I am of the view that if the suit does not fall within the scope of s. 167-A, it is barred by art. 62 of the Limitation Act.

Mr. Kotwal contended that even if the suit was governed by s. 167-A of the Bombay District Municipal Act, the claim made by the plaintiff for the amount which fell due for the period from July 31, 1949 to July 31, 1950, is barred by limitation. But, in our view, the contention also cannot be sustained. As we have already pointed out, the municipality had not only passed resolutions but had also informed the plaintiff-company that the liability to refund the tax was accepted. For instance, on January 24, 1953, the municipality had informed the plaintiff-company that the matter was under consideration and "proper clarification" will be given. It also appears from the resolution, dated September 29, 1951, passed by the President of the municipality, that the liability to refund the tax claimed by the plaintiff company was accepted. These resolutions, in our view, amounted to clear acknowledgment of liability, and the plaintiff company was by virtue of the acknowledgment of liability in respect of the amounts which fell due for the period between July 31, 1949 and July 31, 1950.

There is also, in our judgment, no substance in the submission that the municipality is not liable to provide funds for granting remission is of the State unless the amount to be refunded is received from the State Government. It is true that it was under the direction of the State Government that the municipality refunded a certain percentage of the tax paid by the tax-payers within the area of the Petlad Municipality. But the fact that the Baroda State did reimburse to the municipality the amount refunded to the tax-payers does not make the municipality liable to refund the tax by the plaintiff by way of remission was by the rules imposed by the Government and not upon the Government. Whatever arrangements have existed between the municipality and the State Government do not affect the incidence of liability. The liability remained the liability of the municipality, and the fact that the Baroda Government chose to make good the amount paid by the municipality to the tax-payers from the municipality to the State Government. We are unable to agree with the contention of Mr. Kotwal that the municipality was not liable to be sued by the plaintiff company for the amount of remission claimed by the company unless the municipality obtained the same from the Government of Bombay.

On the view taken by us, the appeal must fail and is dismissed.

CRIMINAL APPELLATE.

Before Mr. Justice Shah and Mr. Justice V. S. Desai.

STATE v. IBRAHIM NABIJI.*

Foreigners Act (XXXI of 1946), Secs. 2(a), 3, 14, 12—Foreigners Orders, 1948, Rule 7—Foreigners Laws (Amendment) Act (XI of 1957)—Citizenship Act (No. LVII of 1955), Sec. 9(2)—Citizenship Rules, 1956, Rule 30—British subject claiming that he was not foreigner in India before passing of Act XI of 1957—Such person entering India in 1956 and continuing to stay in India beyond period of stay specified in visa—Notice issued by Superintendent of Police directing person to leave India within specified time—Person claiming status of citizen of India—Validity of notice issued by Superintendent of Police.

Persons who, before the date on which the Foreigners Laws (Amendment) Act, 1957, was enacted, were entitled as British subjects to claim that they were not foreigners in India, must since the date on which the Act came into force establish that they hold the status of a citizen of India before they can resist enforcement of an order validly passed against them in exercise of the authority conferred under s. 3 of the Foreigners Act, 1946.

Prima facie, when a person enters India under a passport issued by a foreign country and under a visa obtained by him on an application submitted by him claiming that he was a national of a foreign country and that he desired to visit India for a limited period, it may be assumed that he is not a citizen of India. If after entering India such a person claims the status of a citizen by virtue of r. 30 of the Citizenship Rules of 1956 issued under the Citizenship Act, 1955, the question whether, when or how he has acquired the citizenship of another country, must be determined, for purposes of s. 9(2) of the Citizenship Act, 1955, by the Central Government.

By virtue of Notification issued by the Government of India on October 17, 1955, (No. 949/46/68/409-A) power under s. 3(2)(c) of the Foreigners Act, 1946, may be deemed to be conferred upon the State Governments in respect of foreigners and enemy foreigners. But in the absence of any order issued by the Central Government or competently by the State Government which has delegated the authority under s. 3(2)(c) of the Act upon the Superintendent of Police, an order passed by a Superintendent of Police requiring a person who is a foreigner within the Act as amended under the Foreigners Law (Amendment) Act, 1957, to leave India, must be regarded as unauthorised, and failure to carry out the requisition contained in that order cannot be penalised under s. 14 of the Foreigners Act.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

Y. V. Chandrachud, Government Pleader, for the State in all appeals.

C. S. Trivedi, (appointed) for the accused in all the appeals.

SHAH J. The Superintendent of Police, District Kaira, served a notice dated August 20, 1957, upon the respondent Ibrahim Nabiji, that the respondent who was a foreigner as defined under s. 2(a) of the Foreigners Act, 1946, as amended by the Foreigners Laws (Amendment) Act, 1957, having entered India on January 31, 1956, through the Barmer Check Post on a Pakistan Passport No. 3748944 dated December 3, 1955, bearing an Indian Visa No. 5993 dated January 27, 1956, valid for stay in India till April 30, 1956, was unauthorisedly staying in India since May 1, 1956, and that he do leave India within one month from the date of receipt of the notice, and that failing compliance he will be prosecuted and deported under the Foreigners Act, 1946. The respondent failed to carry out the direction contained in the notice. The Sub-Inspector of Police, Petlad, then filed a complaint in the Court of the Judicial Magistrate, F.C., Petlad, against the respondent on October 23, 1957, charging

*Decided, December 9, 1958. Criminal Appeal No. 895 of 1958 (with Criminal Appeals Nos. 923, 984, 985, 1002, 1004-06 and 1020 to 1022 of 1958), against the order of acquittal him with having committed an offence under s. 14 of the Foreigners Act, 1946. It was alleged in the complaint that the respondent was a foreigner within the meaning of the Foreigners Laws (Amendment) Act, 1957, and had not obtained under r. 7 of the Foreigners Orders, 1948, the necessary residential permit and had thereby infringed the provisions of s. 14 of the Foreigners Act.

Before the Judicial Magistrate, the respondent claimed that he was a citizen of India. He admitted that he had gone to Pakistan in 1951 but he contended that he had not accepted the citizenship of Pakistan. He submitted that even though in his passport his domicile was shown as "Pakistan", that statement was untrue. The learned Judicial Magistrate acquitted the respondent. In his view as the respondent was born in the territory of India and there was no evidence to show that he had renounced his citizenship of India, or that he had voluntarily acquired by naturalisation, registration or otherwise, at any time between January 26, 1950, and December 30, 1955, citizenship of Pakistan, by virtue of the presumption contained in art. 10 of the Constitution, the respondent must be deemed to be a citizen of India. The learned Magistrate observed that the respondent by "physically migrating to Pakistan", did not lose his Indian citizenship and the respondent was, therefore, not a foreigner and had not infringed the provisions of s. 14 of the Foreigners Act, 1946. Against the order of acquittal passed by the Judicial Magistrate the State has appealed to this Court.

Before us the arguments advanced on behalf of the State have traversed a very much wider ground. The learned Government Pleader contended that the respondent, who had come armed with a passport of a foreign country describing him as a national of that country, and had obtained a visa which limited the duration of his stay to the period specified therein, by overstaying the period prescribed by the visa, had infringed the provisions of s. 14 of the Foreigners Act. It was also contended that as the respondent had failed to obtain a permit as he was by law required to obtain, he had infringed r. 7 framed under the Foreigners Act and on that account also he had violated the provisions of s. 14 of the Foreigners Act. Finally it was urged that even if the respondent was not initially a foreigner within the meaning of the Foreigners Act since the date on which the Foreigners Laws (Amendment) Act, 1957, was brought into operation the respondent became a foreigner and was bound to comply with the directions issued by the Superintendent of Police and the respondent, by failing to carry out the directions, committed an offence punishable under s. 14 of the Foreigners Act.

In order to appreciate these contentions, it is necessary to refer to certain provisions of the Foreigners Act as amended from time to time and the rules framed thereunder. The expression "foreigner" was defined by s. 2(a) of the Foreigners Act, XXXI of 1946, as modified by Act XXXVIII of 1947 as follows:

"Foreigner" means a person who—

(i) is not a natural-born British subject as defined in sub-sections (1) and (2) of section 1 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, (4 and 5 Geo. 5, C. 17), or

(ii) has not been granted a certificate of naturalisation as a British subject under any law for the time being in force in India, or

(iii) is not a ruler or subject of an acceding State, or provided that any British subject who, under any law for the time being in force in India, ceased to be a British subject shall thereupon be deemed to be a foreigner;"

By this definition it is evident that all natural-born British subjects and persons who had obtained certificates of naturalisation as British subjects under any law for the time being in force in India were not foreigners within the meaning of the Act. The respondent was born in India and under the Foreigners Act XXXI of 1946, being a natural-born British subject he was not a foreigner. The definition of the word "foreigner" was amended by the Adaptation of Laws Order, 1950, when the Constitution of India came into operation and cls. (iii) and (iv) and the proviso of the original definition were deleted and substituted by a new clause in the following words: "is not a citizen of India". Even after this amendment natural-born British subjects and persons holding certificates of naturalization as British subjects under any law for the time being in force, could not be regarded as foreigners. By s. 3 of the Foreigners Act, authority was conferred upon the Central Government to make orders, either generally or with respect to all foreigners or with respect to any particular foreigner or any prescribed class or description of foreigner, for prohibiting, regulating or restricting the entry of foreigners into India or their departure therefrom or their presence or continued presence therein. In exercise of that authority, the Government of India issued the Foreigners Order, 1948, and by r. 7 thereof it was provided:

"Restriction on sojourn in India.—Every foreigner who enters India on the authority of a visa issued in pursuance of the Indian Passport Act, 1920 (XXXIV of 1920), shall obtain from the Registration Officer having jurisdiction either at the place at which the said foreigner enters India or if he has entered India otherwise than on the authority of a transit visa or as tourist, as defined in the Registration of Foreigners Rules 1939 at the place at which he resides in India a permit indicating the period during which he is authorised to remain in India and shall, unless the period indicated in the permit is extended by the Central Government, depart from India before the expiry of the said period...."

By s. 14 of the Foreigners Act, persons contravening the provisions of the Act or of any order made thereunder, or any direction given in pursuance of the Act or such order, were liable to be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to five years.

Evidently, under the Foreigners Act as originally enacted and even after it was amended by the Adaptation of Laws Order, 1950, the respondent could not be deemed to be a foreigner. Rule 7, which we have already referred to, places restriction on sojourn in India by foreigners who enter India on the authority of a visa issued under the Indian Passport Act, 1920, and requires them to obtain from the Registration Officer having jurisdiction either at the place at which the said foreigners enter India or if they had entered India otherwise than on the authority of a transit visa or as tourists, a residential permit. But the respondent was not a foreigner, and by failing to obtain a permit from the Registration Officer or overstaying the period prescribed by the permit, if one was obtained, the respondent could not be deemed to have infringed r. 7, because one of the conditions precedent to the application of that rule is that the person sojourning must be a foreigner. Even if a natural-born British subject entered India under a visa, he was under no obligation to obtain a permit from the Registration Officer. Nor was he required to leave the country within the period prescribed by the permit granted to him. In any event, if he failed to comply with the provisions of r. 7, he could not be penalised under s. 14 of the Foreigners Act. But since the year 1957, the position is fundamentally altered. Section 2, cl. (a) of the Foreigners Act, 1946, has been amended by Act XI of 1957, and a foreigner is defined as a person who is not a citizen of India.

It is evident that persons who, before the date on which Act No. XI of 1957 was enacted, were entitled as British subjects to claim that they were not foreigners in India, must, since the date on which the Act came into force, be deemed to be foreigners if they are not citizens of India.

The notice served upon the respondent expressly refers to the status of the respondent as a foreigner by virtue of the provisions of s. 2(a) of the Foreigners Act, 1946, as amended by the Foreigners Laws (Amendment) Act, 1957. The circumstance that the respondent being originally a British subject was not a foreigner, within the meaning of that expression as used in the Foreigners Act, 1946, before it was amended, will not come to his aid. Since the amendment of the Act he has to establish that he holds the status of a citizen of India before he can resist enforcement of an order in exercise of the authority conferred under s. 3 of the Prima facie, when a person enters India under a passport of a foreign country and under a visa obtained by him on an application by him claiming that he was a national of a foreign country, and desired to visit India for a limited period, it may be assumed that he is a citizen of India. If after entering India such a person claims to be a citizen, by virtue of r. 30 of the Citizenship Rules of 1956 or the Citizenship Act, LVII of 1955, the question whether, when or where he acquired the citizenship of another country, must be determined, under s. 9(2), by the Central Government.

In the present case, the respondent did claim that he is a citizen of India, and but for a defect in the notice which we will presently address, we have remanded this case to the trial Court giving an opportunity to the respondent to obtain an adjudication from a competent authority as to whether he had acquired the citizenship of another country. We think, that, it is necessary in this case to pursue that course. As has already been observed, the Superintendent of Police has issued the order directing the respondent to leave India, whereas under s. 3 of the Foreigners Act, power to make an order against an individual or against a class of persons, is conferred upon the Central Government. It is true that under s. 3 of the Foreigners Act the power to make orders under s. 3 may be conferred upon a subordinate authority subject to such conditions as may be prescribed by the Government, and the learned Government Pleader has in this case relied upon a Notification issued by the Government of India on C.O. No. 949/46/68/409-A, whereby power has been conferred under cl. (c) of the Foreigners Act, 1946, in respect of foreigners and persons, upon the State Governments amongst others of Bombay. In this case, however, the notification the power may be deemed to be conferred upon the Superintendent of Police; but the learned Government Pleader has not been able to draw attention to any order issued by the Central Government or the State Government which has delegated the authority under cl. (c), of the Foreigners Act upon the Superintendent of Police. The order passed by the Superintendent of Police on August 20, 1957, cannot be regarded as unauthorised, and failure to carry out the requirement of that order cannot, in our judgment, be penalised under s. 14 of the Foreigners Act.

We are, therefore, of the view that the respondent has not contravened the provisions of the Foreigners Act. At the date when he entered India he was a foreigner and was by law not required to obtain a permit; and the period prescribed by the visa, also he did not infringe r. 7 of the Foreigners Order. He cannot be held otherwise guilty of infringement of the provisions of s. 14 because there is no lawful direction issued against him under s. 3, sub-s. (2), cl. (c), of the Foreigners Act to leave India. The respondent is a foreigner under the Foreigners Act as amended by the Foreigners Laws (Amendment) Act, 1957.

On that view of the case, the order passed by the learned Government Pleader must be confirmed and the appeal dismissed.

STATE v. CHUNILAL VALLABHJI GANDHI.*

Bombay Drugs Rules, 1946—Drugs Act (XXIII of 1940), Secs. 33(1), 18(c)—The Drugs (Amendment) Act (XI of 1955), Sec. 15—General Clauses Act (X of 1897), Secs. 24, 3(19)—Whether Bombay Drugs Rules, 1946, stood repealed on amendment of s. 33(1) of Drugs Act by Act XI of 1955.

The Bombay Drugs Rules, 1946, did not stand repealed on the amendment of s. 33(1) of the Drugs Act, 1940, by the Drugs (Amendment) Act, 1955, but must be deemed to have been re-enacted and to have remained in force under the amended s. 33(1) of the Act by virtue of s. 24 of the General Clauses Act, 1897, till they were repealed by fresh rules framed by the Central Government in 1957.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

M. J. Gordhandas, for the appellant-accused.

V. H. Gumaste, Assistant Government Pleader, for the State.

SHAH J. The appellant was convicted by the Presidency Magistrate, 27th Court, Mulund, Bombay, of an offence under s. 18(c) read with s. 27 of the Drugs Act, 1940, and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 250 and in default of payment of fine to suffer simple imprisonment for one month. Against the order of conviction and sentence this appeal has been preferred.

C. N. Patel, Drugs Inspector, received information on October 19, 1956, that the appellant, who was trading in the name of Vivigan Products Corporation at Kandivli, was manufacturing drugs without obtaining a licence under the Drugs Act, 1940. Patel then lodged a complaint with the Kandivli Police Station against the appellant for contravention of s. 18(c) of the Drugs Act. The police officer in charge of the station raided the place occupied by the appellant and attached under a panchnama certain articles found on the premises. At that time the son and daughters of the appellant were also found present and taking part in processing Vivigan Ointment and Menthostrine Pain Balm. The appellant was arrested on October 20, 1956, and on February 22, 1957, a charge-sheet was filed against the appellant, his son and his two daughters for offences under ss. 18(a)(i), 18(a)(ii) and 18(c) read with s. 27 of the Drugs Act, 1940, as amended by s. 12 of the Drugs Act, 1955. With the charge-sheet was lodged in Court a complaint addressed to the Magistrate and signed by Patel. The Presidency Magistrate, 27th Court, took cognizance of the offences and framed a charge against the appellant, his son and two daughters on the assumption that the offences were to be tried in the manner of a warrant case under the procedure prescribed by s. 251-A of the Criminal Procedure Code as amended by Act 26 of 1955. After the evidence of the witnesses for the prosecution was recorded, the Prosecutor appearing on behalf of the State applied that as the procedure followed by the Magistrate was inappropriate a new charge be framed against the accused. The learned Magistrate acceded to the request. He held that the procedure prescribed by s. 251-A was inappropriate in view of the provision contained in s. 32 of the Drugs Act. The learned Magistrate then considered the evidence led by the prosecution ignoring the charge which was initially framed, and held that, a prima facie case was made out against the appellant and that no case was made out against the other three accused. He, therefore, framed a fresh charge for the offence under s. 18(c) read with s. 27 of the Drugs Act, and proceeded to try the appellant.

The learned Magistrate held that the Vivigan Ointment and Menthostrine Pain Balm were "drugs" within the meaning of the Drugs Act, 1940, and that the prosecution initiated against the appellant was not "bad" even though under s. 33 of the Act no rules were framed by the Central Government at the date of the offence under the Drugs Act as amended by Act XI of 1955. On the view taken by him, the learned Magistrate convicted the appellant and sentenced him as stated earlier.

*Decided, December 12, 1958. Criminal Appeal No. 1060 of 1958, against the order of conviction and sentence passed by R. S.

Dhurandhar, Presidency Magistrate, 27th Court, Mulund, Bombay, in Case No. 1209/P of 1958.

In this appeal Mr. Gordhandas, who appears on behalf of the appellant, has raised four contentions: (i) that the trial Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the proceeding against the accused because it was not instituted by an Inspector under the Drugs Act; (ii) that even though under s. 18(c) of the Drugs Act the manufacture for sale, or sale, or stocking or exhibiting for sale or distribution of any drugs, except under, and in accordance with the conditions of, a licence issued for such purpose was penalised, no rules having been framed for the issue of a licence under the Drugs Act, 1940, as amended by Act XI of 1955, the appellant could not be convicted of manufacturing for sale a drug without a licence; (iii) that there was no evidence on the record to show that Vivigan Ointment was a "drug" within the meaning of the Drugs Act, 1940; and (iv) that the charge framed against the appellant was vague. In our view, there is no substance in any of these contentions.

As we have already observed, C. N. Patel filed an information before the police at Kandivli and obtained the assistance of the Sub-Inspector in charge of that police station for raiding the premises occupied by the appellant. On the record there is a complaint addressed to the Presidency Magistrate, at Borivli, by C. N. Patel, who has described himself as a Drugs Inspector appointed under s. 21 of the Drugs Act, complaining that the appellant had contravened the provisions of ss. 18(a)(i), 18(a)(iii) and 18(c) of the Drugs Act and had thereby rendered himself liable for punishment under s. 27 of the Act as amended by s. 12 of India Act XI of 1955, and praying that process be issued against the appellant and others and that they be dealt with according to law. This complaint, it is not disputed, was filed with the charge-sheet lodged in Court by the police. Section 32 of the Drugs Act, in so far as it is material, provides by the first sub-section: "No prosecution under this Chapter (Chap. IV) shall be instituted except by an Inspector." Mr. Gordhandas submits that in this case prosecution was not instituted by an Inspector and that the Presidency Magistrate had no jurisdiction to entertain the proceeding and to issue process against the appellant, and that the proceeding having been in its inception entertained without jurisdiction, the conviction of the appellant cannot be sustained. We are unable to hold that the prosecution in this case was not instituted by an Inspector. There was before the learned Presidency Magistrate a complaint by an Inspector under the Drugs Act charging the appellant with having committed offences under ss. 18(a)(i), 18(a)(iii) and 18(c) of the Drugs Act. That complaint having been filed in Court, it cannot be said that the prosecution against the appellant was not instituted by an Inspector. It is true that the complaint was accompanied by a charge-sheet filed by the police, but, that charge-sheet may be regarded as superfluous. As a complaint was filed by an Inspector under the Drugs Act, the prosecution was competently entertained by the Presidency Magistrate, and the fact that the complaint was accompanied by a charge-sheet under the signature of the Inspector of Police did not render the prosecution instituted otherwise than by an Inspector.

By s. 33(1) of the Drugs Act before it was amended by Act XI of 1955 it was provided that the State Government may, after consultation with the Board and after previous publication by notification in the Official Gazette, make rules for giving effect to the provisions of Chap. IV, and by sub-s. (2)(e) of s. 33 provision was made prescribing the forms of licences for manufacture, sale or distribution of drugs. It appears that the Central Government had framed certain model rules under the Drugs Act which were called "the (Central) Drugs Rules, 1945," and those rules were bodily adopted by the State of Bombay in 1946 and published as "the Bombay Drugs Rules, 1946". It was provided that r. 2 and Parts V to XII of the Drugs Rules, 1945, including the connected forms and Schedule, shall apply to the State of Bombay as ed to be references to the State Government. Evidently the rules must be regarded as framed by the State Government and not by the Central Government.

Section 33 of the Drugs Act, 1940, was amended by s. 15 of India Act XI of 1955, and the first sub-section of s. 15, in so far as it is material, provides that the Central Government may, after consultation with the Board and after previous publication by notification in the Official Gazette, make rules for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of Chap. IV. There is no dispute that after India Act XI of 1955 was enacted, the Central Government did not immediately frame rules in exercise of the powers conferred by s. 33 of the Drugs Act, 1940, as amended by Act XI of 1955. Mr. Gordhandas contends that on the amendment of the Drugs Act, 1940, by Act XI of 1955, the rules framed by the Bombay Government called the Bombay Drugs Rules, 1946, stood repealed; and no fresh rules having been framed by the Central Government, there was no authority which was competent in that behalf to issue a licence, and if there was no authority competent to issue a licence, the appellant could not be regarded as having infringed the provisions of s. 18(c) of the Drugs Act which penalised the manufacture for sale, or sale, or stocking or exhibiting for sale or distribution of any drug except under and in accordance with the conditions of a licence. It is urged that s. 18(c) postulates the existence of a licensing authority which can competently grant a licence, and if there be no licensing authority, the manufacture for sale, or sale, or stocking or exhibiting for sale or distribution of any drug without a licence cannot be regarded as effectively penalised by the provisions of s. 18(c). We do not think that it is necessary in this appeal to deal with this argument because, in our judgment, the contention that on the enactment of Act XI of 1955, which amended s. 33(1) of the Drugs Act, 1940, the rules framed by the State of Bombay stood repealed cannot be accepted.

Section 24 of the General Clauses Act X of 1897, in so far as it is material, provides:

"Where any Central Act...is, after the commencement of this Act, repealed and re-enacted with or without modification, then, unless it is otherwise expressly provided, any appointment, notification, order, scheme, rule, form or bye-law, made or issued under the repealed Act...shall, so far as it is not inconsistent with the provisions re-enacted, continue in force, and be deemed to have been made or issued under the provisions so re-enacted, unless and until it is superseded by any appointment, notification, order, scheme, rule, form or bye-law made or issued under the provisions so re-enacted..."

The rules which were framed by the State of Bombay in 1946 were repealed by fresh rules framed by the Central Government in 1957, and the question arises whether since the amendment of s. 33(1) the rules framed by the Bombay Government must be deemed to have remained in force till they were repealed or superseded.

Section 3(19) of the General Clauses Act X of 1897 defines "enactment" as inclusive of

"...a Regulation...and any Regulation of the Bengal, Madras or Bombay Code, and ...any provision contained in any Act or in any such Regulation as aforesaid;"

By this definition even a part of an Act is deemed to be an enactment within the meaning of the General Clauses Act. When, therefore, the Legislature has provided that rules framed under an enactment, which is repealed and re-enacted with or without modification, shall, unless they are inconsistent with the provisions of the re-enactment, continue in force and be deemed to have been made or issued under the provisions so re-enacted, it must mean that the rules framed by the Bombay State must be deemed to have been re-enacted under the amended s. 33(1) of the Drugs Act. It is undisputed that under the Bombay Drugs Rules, 1946, provision is made in Chaps. VI and VII for granting licences committed by the appellant no lawfully constituted licensing authority.

We are also unable to agree with the contention that Vivigan Ointment is not a drug within the meaning of the Drugs Act. The prosecution examined one H. H. Banerji, Director of the Central Drug Laboratory, Calcutta. Banerji produced before the Court the formula submitted by the appellant to the Drug Controller in 1954 and renewed in the year 1955. Every drug set out in the formula is an allopathic drug. It may be that some of these drugs may also be used in the Ayurvedic or Unani systems of medicine. But the definition of the word "drug" in s. 3(b) of the Drugs Act is inclusive of "all medicines for internal or external use of human beings or animals and all substances intended to be used for or in the treatment, mitigation or prevention of disease in human beings or animals other than medicines and substances exclusively used or prepared for use in accordance with the Ayurvedic or Unani systems of medicine."

Mr. Gordhandas has fairly, and in our judgment rightly, conceded that the medicines and substances set out in the formula submitted by the appellant to the Director of the Central Drug Laboratory are not exclusively used or prepared for use in accordance with the Ayurvedic or Unani systems of medicine. The medicines or substances which are set out in the formula must accordingly be regarded as drugs within the meaning of the Drugs Act, 1940, as amended by Act XI of 1955.

The appellant had addressed a letter, dated March 16, 1956, to the Drugs Controller for the State of Bombay, on which reliance was placed by Mr. Gordhandas. It was contended by Mr. Gordhandas that it was the case of the appellant that Vivigan Ointment was an exclusively Ayurvedic medicine or a preparation according to the Ayurvedic system of medicine. There is, however, on the record no evidence whatever to support that contention; and the letter on which reliance has been placed is so obscure that it is difficult to make out its purport. The appellant is stated to have written to the Drugs Controller that he was "very much annoyed" and was "compelled to divert" all his activities towards Unani and Ayurvedics which he believed were "very much desired and encouraged by the leaders of the nation, shifting the same to some other State, perhaps to Calcutta." It is difficult to understand what was intended to be conveyed by this statement. In any event, our attention has not been invited to any evidence on the record of the case which supports the view that the medicines or substances which are used for the preparation of Vivigan Ointment and Menthocraine Pain Balm are exclusively used or prepared for use in accordance with the Ayurvedic or Unani systems of medicine.

In our view, there is no substance in the contention that the charge was in any manner vague.

We are of the view that the trial Magistrate was right in convicting the appellant for the offence under s. 18(c) read with s. 27 of the Drugs Act. The sentence imposed upon the appellant cannot be regarded as severe. We, therefore, confirm the order of conviction and sentence passed against the appellant and dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

The Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands (Amendment) Act, 1956, is covered by Entry 18 in List II of the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution of India and is a legislation with reference to "land" and, therefore, the State Legislature was competent to enact the Act.

It was an Act further to amend the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948 (Bom. LXVII of 1948) (hereinafter called the "1948 Act").

The petitioners are citizens of India and landholders within the meaning of the 1948 Act holding several acres of land within the State of Bombay out of which a few acres are under their own cultivation, the bulk of the lands being under the cultivation of tenants—except in the case of the petitioners in petition No. 58 of 1958 where the whole of the lands are under the cultivation of tenants.

The 1948 Act had been passed by the State Legislature as a measure of agrarian reform on December 28, 1948, with a view to amend the law relating to tenancies of agricultural lands and to make certain other provisions in regard to those lands and the objectives sought to be achieved were thus set out in the second paragraph of the preamble:—

"AND WHEREAS on account of the neglect of a landholder or disputes between a landholder and his tenants, the cultivation of his estate has seriously suffered, or for the purpose of improving the economic and social conditions of peasants or ensuring the full and efficient use of land for agricultural purposes, it is expedient to assume management of estates held by landholders and to regulate and impose restrictions on the transfer of agricultural lands, dwelling houses, sites and lands appurtenant thereto belonging to or occupied by agriculturists, agricultural labourers and artisans in the Province of Bombay and to make provisions for certain other purposes hereinafter appearing..."

Section 2(8) of the said Act defined "Land" to mean:

"(a) land which is used for agricultural purposes, and includes the sites of farm buildings appurtenant to such land; and used for agricultural purposes, and

(b) ...

(i) the sites of dwelling houses occupied by agriculturists, agricultural labourers or artisans and land appurtenant to such dwelling houses.

(ii) ..."

"Landholder" was defined in s. 2(9) of the said Act to mean:—

"a zamindar, jagirdar, saranjamdar, inamdar, talukdar, malik or a khot or any person not hereinbefore specified who is a holder of land or who is interested in land, and whom the State Government has declared on account of the extent and the value of the land or his interests therein to be a land-holder for the purposes of this Act."

Under s. 2(21) of the said Act the words and expressions used in the Act but not defined were to have the meaning assigned to them in the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879, and the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, as the case may be.

With a view to achieve the objective of establishing a socialistic pattern of society in the State within the meaning of arts. 38 and 39 of the Constitution, a further measure of agrarian reform was enacted by the State Legislature being the impugned Act, hereinbefore referred to, which was designed to bring about such distribution of the ownership and control of agricultural lands as best to subserve the common good thus eliminating concentration of wealth and means of production to the common detriment. The said Act received the assent of the President on March 16, 1956, was published in the Bombay Government Gazette on March 29, 1956, and came into force throughout the State on August 1, 1956.

In about November, 1956, certain landholders from Kolhapur and Sholapur districts in the State of Bombay filed petitions in the Bombay High Court under art. 226 of the Constitution challenging the constitutionality of the impugned Act on various grounds. A division bench of the Bombay High Court pronounced its judgment on February 21, 1957,† dismissing those petitions with costs except in regard to a declaration as regards the invalidity of s. 88D of the Act. The petitioners herein thereupon filed these petitions under art. 32 of the Constitution challenging the vires of the impugned Act and praying for a writ of mandamus against the State of Bombay ordering them to forbear from enforcing or taking any steps in enforcement of the Act, costs and further reliefs.

Petition No. 13 of 1957 appears to have been filed on December 3, 1956, but effective steps therein were taken only when an application for stay with a prayer for an ex parte order being C.M.P. No. 359 of 1957 was filed herein on March 21, 1957. Petitions Nos. 38 to 41 of 1957 were filed on March 21, 1957, and Petition No. 55 of 1958 was filed on March 19, 1958.

All these petitions followed a common pattern and the main grounds of attack were: that the State Legislature was not competent to pass the said Act, the topic of legislation not being covered by any entry in the State List; that the said Act was beyond the ambit of art. 31-A of the Constitution and was, therefore, vulnerable as infringing the fundamental rights enshrined in arts. 14, 19 and 31 thereof; that the provisions of the said Act in fact infringed the fundamental rights of the petitioners conferred upon them by arts. 14, 19 and 31 of the Constitution; that the said Act was a piece of colourable legislation and in any event a part of the provisions thereof suffered from the vice of excessive delegation of legislative power. The answer of the State was that the impugned Act was covered by Entry No. 18 in List II of the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution, that it was a piece of legislation for the extinguishment or modification of rights in relation to estates within the definition thereof in art. 31-A of the Constitution and that, therefore, it was not open to challenge under arts. 14, 19 and 31 thereof and that it was neither a piece of colourable legislation nor did any part thereof come within the mischief of excessive delegation.

As to the legislative competence of the State Legislature to pass the impugned Act the question lies within a very narrow compass. As already stated, the impugned Act was a further measure of agrarian reform enacted with a view to further amend the 1948 Act and the object of the enactment was to bring about such distribution of the ownership and control of agricultural lands as best to subserve the common good. This object was sought to be achieved by fixing ceiling areas of lands which could be held by a person and by prescribing what was an economic holding. It sought to equitably distribute the lands between the landholders and the tenants, and except in those cases where the landholder wanted the land for cultivating the same personally for which due provision was made in the Act, transferred by way of compulsory purchase all the other lands to tenants in possession of the same with effect from April 1, 1957, which was called the "tillers day". Provision was also made for disposal of balance of lands after purchase by tenants and the basic idea underlying the provisions of the impugned Act was to prevent the concentration of agricultural lands in the hands of landholders to the common detriment. The tiller or the cultivator was brought into direct contact with the State eliminating thereby the landholders who were in the position of intermediaries. The enactment thus affected the relation between landlord and tenant, provided for the transfer and alienation of agricultural lands, aimed at land improvement and was broadly stated a legislation in regard to the rights in or over land: categories specifically referred to in Entry 18 in List II of the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution, which specifies the head of legislation as "land, that is to say, rights in or over land, land tenures including the relation of landlord and tenant, and the collection of rents; transfer and alienation of agricultural land; land improvement and agricultural loans; colonization".

It is well settled that these heads of legislation should not be construed in a narrow and pedantic sense but should be given a large and liberal interpretation. As was observed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in *British Coal Corporation v. The King*¹ :—

"...indeed, in interpreting a constituent or organic statute such as the Act, that construction most beneficial to the widest possible amplitude of its power must be adopted."

The Federal Court also in *The United Provinces v. Atiq Begum*² pointed out that none of the items in the Lists is to be read in a narrow or restricted sense and that each general word should be held to extend to all ancillary or subsidiary matters which can fairly and reasonably be said to be comprehended in it. This Court in *Navinchandra Mafatlal v. The Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay City*³ also expressed the same opinion and stated (p. 836):—

"...The cardinal rule of interpretation, however, is that words should be read in their ordinary, natural and grammatical meaning subject to this rider that in construing words in a constitutional enactment conferring legislative power the most liberal construction should be put upon words so that the same may have effect in their widest amplitude." (See also Thakur Amar Singhji v. State of Rajasthan).

Having regard to the principle of construction enunciated above it is clear that the impugned Act is covered by Entry 18 in List II of the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution and is a legislation with reference to "land" and this plea of legislative incompetence of the State Legislature to enact the impugned Act, therefore, fails.

If, then, the State Legislature was competent to enact the impugned Act, is the Act ultra vires the Constitution as infringing any of the fundamental rights conferred upon the petitioners? In the course of the arguments before us learned counsel for the petitioners confined their attack only to the constitutionality of ss. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 17-A, 31-A to 31-D and 32 to 32-R of the impugned Act as violative of the fundamental right guaranteed under art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution. The first question to consider in this context however is whether the impugned Act is protected by art. 31-A of the Constitution because, if it is so protected, no challenge on the score of the provisions thereof violating arts. 14, 19 and 31 of the Constitution would be available to the petitioners.

The relevant portions of art. 31-A which fall to be considered here read as follows:—

"(1) Notwithstanding anything contained in article 13, no law providing for—

(a) the acquisition by the State of any estate or of any rights therein or the extinguishment or modification of any such rights...shall be deemed to be void on the ground that it is inconsistent with, or takes away or abridges any of the rights conferred by article 14, article 19 or article 31.

Provided that where such law is a law made by the Legislature of a State, the provisions of this article shall not apply thereto unless such law, having been reserved for the consideration of the President, has received his assent...

(2) In this article,—

(a) the expression 'estate' shall, in relation to any local area, have the same meaning as that expression or its local equivalent has in the existing law relating to land tenures in force in that area, and shall also include any jagir, inam, or muafi or other similar grant and in the States of Madras and Travancore-Cochin any janmam rights.

(b) the expression 'rights' in relation to an estate, shall include any rights vesting in a proprietor, sub-proprietor, under-proprietor, tenure-holder, raiyat, under-raiyat or other intermediary and any rights or privileges in respect of land revenue."

The question which we have to address ourselves initially is whether the lands held by the petitioners, who are admittedly landholders within the definition of the term contained in s. 2(9) of the 1948 Act, are "estates" within the meaning of art. 31-A of the Constitution.

Before we launch upon that enquiry it would perhaps be of help to note how the various land tenures originated. Baden-Powell in his Land-Systems of British India (1892 Ed.) Vol. 1 dealing with the general view of land tenures traced the origin and growth of different tenures in the manner following at pp. 97-99 (Chap. IV):—

"4. Effects of Land-Revenue Administration and Revenue-farming. Then again, the greater Oriental governments which preceded ours, have always, in one form or another, derived the bulk of their State-revenues and Royal property from the land. In one system known to us, 'Royal lands' were allotted in the principal villages, and this fact may have suggested to the Mughals their plan of allotting special farms and villages to furnish the privy purse, and has had other survivals. But, speaking generally, the universal plan of taking revenue was by taking a share of the actual grain heap on the threshing-floor from each holding. Afterwards this was commuted for a money payment levied on each estate or each field as the case might be... To collect this revenue, the ruler appointed or recognized not only a headman and accountant in each village, but also a hierarchy of graded officials in districts and minor divisions of territory formed for administrative purposes. These officers were often remunerated by holdings of land, and a class of land-tenures will be found in some parts of India owning its origin to these hereditary official holdings. Not only so, but during the decline which Oriental governments have usually undergone, the Revenue officials have been commonly found to merge in, or be superseded, by revenue-farmers—persons who contracted for a certain sum of revenue to be paid into the Treasury from a given area, as representing the State dues exigible from the land-holdings within that area. Such revenue-farmers, or officials, whatever their origin, have always tended to absorb the interests of the land-holders and to become in time the virtual landlords over them.

Nor is it only that landlord tenures arise in this way. No sooner does the superior right take shape than we find many curious new tenures created by the landlord or arising out of his attempts to conciliate or provide for certain eminent claims in the grade below him.

a. 5. Effects of Assignment or Remission of Land-Revenue. Yet another class of tenures arises in connection with the State Revenue-administration; and that is when the ruler either excuses an existing land-holder from paying his revenue, either wholly or in part; or 'alienates' or assigns the revenue of a certain estate or tract of country in favour of some chief, or other person of importance, or to provide funds for some special objects, or to serve as a recompense for services to be rendered.

At first such grants are carefully regulated, are for life only, and strictly kept to their purpose, and to the amount fixed. But as matters go on, and the ruler is a bad or unscrupulous one, his treasury is empty, and he makes such grants to avoid the difficulty of finding a cash salary. The grants become permanent and hereditary; they are also issued by officials who have no right to make them; and not only do they then result in landlord tenures and other curious rights, but are a burden to after times, and have furnished a most troublesome legacy to our own Government when it found the revenues eaten up by grantees whose titles were invalid, and whose pretensions, though grown old in times of disorder, were inadmissible.

Such grants may have begun with no title to the land but only a right to the revenue, but want of supervision and control has resulted in the grantee seizing the landed right also."

Here we find the distinction between the State owned lands which are unalienated where the tenures arise out of the exigencies of revenue collection and alienated lands the revenue whereof is remitted either wholly or in part or in other words "alienated" or assigned to grantees for various purposes.

Various land tenures thus developed and series of proprietorships came into existence. The main tenures which the British found when they came into power comprised: (1) the Khas or tenure by Government; (2) the Raiyatwari tenure; (3) the Zamindari or landlord tenure and (4) the Taluqdari or double tenure.

It is interesting to note in this connection that in the table compiled by Baden-Powell in Vol. III of his Book at p. 142 giving some idea of the distribution of the different classes of landed estates in Madras the different classes of landed estates described therein included not only Zamindaris but also "estates" held by Raiyats paying diverse sums as and by way of land revenue.

So far as the area within the State of Bombay was concerned the position is thus summed up in Dandekar's Law of Land Tenures, Vol. I, at p. 12:—

Section III. Classification of land according to the interest of the holder:

"Land is either Government land or not Government land; that is, it is either unalienated or alienated. The expression for unalienated land is khalsa or ryatawari in some parts as opposed to dumala or inam lands, that is, alienated lands. In Gujrat Government lands are called 'sarkari' as opposed to 'baharkali' lands meaning alienated lands—lands the produce of which had not to be brought to the common threshing ground. In some parts of Gujrat there are, 'talpad' (Government) lands as opposed to 'Wanta' lands. In old Regulations two kinds of land have been referred to, namely, malguzary, land and lakhiraj land. The former meant land paying assessment to Government, whereas, the latter meant land free from payment of assessment. Khalsa land in the permanent occupation of holders was denominated, before the survey-settlements, in the different parts of the Presidency by the expressions mirasi, dhara, suti and muli. Government arable land not in the permanent occupation of an occupant was and is described by the name sher. In alienated villages, lands corresponding to Government 'sher' lands are denominated by the expressions 'sher' 'Khas Kamath' and 'Ghar Khedu'. Lands in leasehold or farmed villages are called khoti lands. Lands which are given under leases and the assessment of which is regulated by the terms thereof are called kauli lands."

It will be observed that Mirasi, Dhara, Suti and Muli were all tenures in regard to unalienated lands, the tenure-holders being permanent holders of land having hereditary interests in their holdings. The Khoti tenures in the Konkan and the Bhagdari and Narvadari tenures in some parts of Gujrat were also tenures in regard to unalienated lands, the revenue being assessed on those lands on entire villages and not on specific pieces of land either in lump or on the basis of a fixed Bighoti assessment on each field and the tenure-holders being responsible for the payment of the sum in certain specified modes. The general prevailing tenure, however, was the Raiyatwari tenure where the Raiyat or the tenant had the right of an occupant in his holding. The right of an occupant was a heritable right and on the death of a registered occupant the name of his heir was entered in his place. All these were land tenures in respect of unalienated lands and the Bombay Survey and Settlement Act (Bom. I of 1865) passed in 1865 applied generally to the same. There were, of course, certain Acts which dealt with specific tenures mentioned above, e.g., Bhagdari and Narvadari Tenures Act (Bom. V of 1862), and Khoti Settlement Act (Bom. I of 1880); but by and large they were tenures in regard to unalienated lands and were governed by the Bombay Survey and Settlement Act, 1865. In 1879 the State Legislature enacted the Bombay Land Revenue Code (Bom. V of 1879) with a view to consolidate and amend the law relating to Revenue Officers, to the assessment and recovery of land revenue and to other matters connected with land revenue administration. This Act extended to the whole of the State of Bombay excluding the City of Bombay and certain other areas therein mentioned. We shall have occasion to refer to certain provisions of this Act hereafter.

Turning now to alienated lands in which category were comprised lands not belonging to government and lands not paying revenue to government which were exceptions to the principles of State proprietorship and of liability of landholders to pay land revenue to government we find that the alienations were classified as: (1) political tenures such as Jagirs and Saranjams; (2) Service Inams; (3) Personal Inams and (4) Religious endowments. The principal alienations were Inams, Jagirs or Saranjams and *Watan*s. Each of them was considered as a tenure, had got its own history, its own features and peculiarities. Summary settlements were effected by the government with these tenure-holders and their rights as such recognized. There were Taluqdari tenures or estates in Gujrat which also came under this category and it may be noted that several pieces of legislation were passed by the State Legislature in regard to those several tenures of alienated lands, e.g., Titles to Rent-Free Estates Act (Bom. XI of 1852); Ahmedabad Taluqdar's Act (Bom. VI of 1862); Bombay Hereditary Offices Act (Bom. III of 1874); Broach and Kaira Encumbered Estates Act (Bom. XIV of 1877); Broach and Kaira Encumbered Estates Act (Bom. XXI of 1881); Matadars Act (Bom. VI of 1887) and Gujrat Taluqdars Act (Bom. VI of 1888). Our attention was also drawn in this connection to the various Acts passed by the State Legislature (between 1949 and 1955) abolishing the several land tenures in Bombay where the government was not in direct contact with the tiller of the soil but there was an interposition of intermediaries between them, the intermediaries having leased out parts of the lands to the tenants who actually cultivated the soil and it was urged that the interests of these intermediaries were estates properly so called.

It is to be noticed, however, that the several land tenures which were thus abolished were not only tenures in respect of alienated lands but also comprised unalienated lands, e.g., the Bombay Bhagdari and Narvadari Tenures Abolition Act, 1949 (Bom. XXXII of 1949); The Bombay Khoti Abolition Act, 1949 (Bom. VI of 1950) and the Bombay Merged Territories (Janjira and Bhore) Khoti Tenure Abolition Act, 1953 (Bom. LXXI of 1953). There was no distinction made thus between land tenures in regard to alienated lands and those in regard to unalienated lands. It may also be noted that all these Acts followed a common pattern, viz., the abolition of these land tenures, award of compensation to the tenure holders whose tenures were thus abolished and the establishment of direct relations between the government on the one hand and the tenure-holders cultivating the lands personally and the tenants cultivating the soil on the other. All these persons, thus cultivating the soil were given the status of occupants and direct relationship was thus established between the government and them. These Acts, so far as our present purpose is concerned, are only mentioned to show the different types of land tenures which existed in the State of Bombay prior to their abolition as aforesaid.

These were the various land tenures known in the State of Bombay and we may at this stage appropriately refer to the statistics (1886-87) of these tenures given by Baden-Powell in Vol. III of his said book at p. 251:—

Tenure	Number of estates or holdings.	Number of villages	Area in acres.	Remarks.
Village landholders: Raiyatwari villages	1284,338	30,118½	28,475,016 (occupied land only)	I have added together these paying at full rates and the much smaller number paying at privileged rates, the latter are 213,405, and how far these represent bhagdar, etc., etc., I have no means of telling.
Overlord tenures	530½	530½	1,419,897 (gross area)
Talukdari			79334
Mowasi	41	41	194,830
Udhad Jambandi	123	123	2160,517
Khoti	1732½	1732½	3808
Isafat	7	7	4433,343
Revenue free i.e. inam & Jagir.	2165½	2165½		These refer to whole villages or estates not to revenue privileges on individual fields, etc., which are included in village land-holdings.

It is to be noted that the holdings of the land-holders in Ryatwari villages apart from others were also styled therein as estates or holdings.

It was vehemently urged before us by learned counsel for the petitioners that the expression "estate" aptly applied only to lands held by the various tenure holders of alienated lands above referred to, and that it could not apply to the holdings of occupants who had merely a right of occupancy in specific pieces of unalienated lands. The word "estate" had been defined in the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879, in s. 3(5) to mean: "any interest in lands and the aggregate of such interests vested in a person or aggregate of persons capable of holding the same," and would prima facie cover not only an interest in alienated lands but also in unalienated lands. It was, however, urged that the expression "estate" should be construed in a narrower sense having legislative history and particularly to the fact that the lands held by holders of alienated lands only had prior to 1879 been recognized as such. The holding of an occupant was not treated as such. The distinction sought to be made between holders of unalienated lands and holders of alienated lands is not of much consequence, because even in regard to unalienated lands besides the occupants there were tenure holders called Narwadars and Khotes who had interests in lands held by them under several tenures which lands were unalienated lands. The interests of tenure holders enjoyed in the lands held by them were "estates" and not, therefore, be predicated of the expression "estate" that it is used in connection with alienated lands. If this distinction was not available, we have only got to consider if there is any reason why the interpretation should be put upon the expression "estate" as suggested by the petitioners. Reliance was placed by the learned counsel for the appellants on a decision of this Court in Hariprasad Shivshankar Shukla v. A. S. Wadia where the word "retrenchment" as defined in s. 2(oo) and the word "dismissal" in s. 25F of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, as amended by Act XLIII of 1953, were held to have no wider meaning than the ordinary connotation of those words and were held to mean the discharge of labour or staff by the employer for any reason whatsoever, other than a punishment inflicted by way of disciplinary action, and did not include the termination of services of all workmen on a bona fide closure of industry or on change of ownership or management thereof. Even though the word "dismissal" was defined as meaning the termination of services by a workman for any reason whatsoever, otherwise than as a punishment inflicted by way of disciplinary action, which words were capable of including within their scope the termination of services of all workmen on a bona fide closure of industry or on change of ownership or management thereof, the word "retrenchment" was construed in a narrow sense because the word "dismissal" connoted in its ordinary acceptance that the business was being conducted and a portion of the staff or labour force was discharged. This Court observed in the course of the judgment (1957) 1 L.R. 101.

"...In the absence of any compelling words to indicate that the intention was to include a bona fide closure of the whole business, it would, we think, be wrong to extend the expression altogether from its context to give it such a wide meaning as suggested by learned counsel for the respondents. What is being defined is retrenchment in the context of the definition. It is true that an artificial definition may be made different from or in excess of the ordinary acceptance of the word as the subject of definition; but there must then be compelling words to show that a different meaning or an extension of the ordinary meaning is intended. Where, in the ordinary work of the word, every single requirement of the definition is fulfilled, it would be wrong to take the definition as destroying the ordinary meaning of the word defined."

Reliance was also placed on a decision of the Court of Appeal in Boaler v. Board of Education (1896) 1 Q.B. 373, 280, where the words "proceedings" were held not to include criminal proceedings, in spite of the fact that they were prima facie capable of including the same. Kennedy C.J. viewed at page 32 that it was impossible to say that the meaning of "legal proceedings" was in itself and by itself clear and unambiguous and followed the dictum of Lord Esher in The Queen v. Judge of the Court of Common Pleas.⁷

"If the words of an Act admit of two interpretations then they are ambiguous. If one interpretation leads to an absurdity and the other does not, the Court will adopt the latter. If the Legislature did not intend to lead to an absurdity, and will not be interpreted as leading to an absurdity, it will be interpreted as leading to an interpretation."

Scrutton J. also expressed the same opinion, (p. 41) :—

"...I find general words used in the Act capable of two meanings, a wider and a narrower one. On the whole I think the language is more suited to the narrower than the wider meaning. The narrower meaning will affect the liberties of the subject to some extent; the wider meaning will most seriously affect the liberties of the subject in a matter, his personal liberty and safety, which I see no reason in the Act to believe was in the contemplation of the Legislature. I decline to make this more serious interference with the liberty of the subject, unless the Legislature uses language clear enough to convince me that that was its intention, and I think ample meaning is provided for its words, and ample remedy is provided for the grievance in respect of which Parliament was legislating by putting the narrower construction on the general words it has used."

Are there any circumstances in the present case which would compel us to put a narrower construction on the expression "estate" in s. 3(5) of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879? It is true that the expression "estate" was used prior to 1879 in connection with the interests which the various tenure-holders of alienated lands held in their respective lands, but it does not, therefore, follow that that expression could be used only in connection with those interests and no others. The Watandars, Saranjamdars, Inamdars and Taluqdars and the like were no doubt holders of "estates", but does that fact militate against the occupants also holding "estates" in the lands which were the subject-matter of their tenures? The words of the definition contained in s. 3(5) of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879, were clear and unambiguous. They meant any interest in lands and the expression "lands" was capable of comprising within its ambit alienated and unalienated lands.

As a matter of fact, the definition of "Superior holder" in s. 3(13) and the definition of "alienated" in s. 3(20) of the Code, provisions of s. 111 in regard to revenue management of villages or estates not belonging to the Government, of s. 113 with regard to the partition of estates and of s. 136 prescribing liability for revenue, amongst others refer not only to alienated lands but also to unalienated lands and the expression "estates" used therein can have reference not only to alienated lands but also to unalienated lands. If the definition of the expression "estate" in the context of the Code is thus clear and unambiguous as comprising both the types of lands, there is no reason why a narrower construction as suggested by the petitioners should be put upon the expression "estate". (See the observations of Kennedy L. J. in Vexatious Actions Act, 1896 In re. Boaler In re. (Supra) at p. 31 and the observations of this Court in *Raja Sri Sailendra Narayan Bhanja Deo v. The State of Orissa*⁸). Even if there was any ambiguity in the expression, the wider significance should be adopted in the context of the objectives of the Act as stated above.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the expression "estate" had the meaning of any interest in land and it was not confined merely to the holdings of landholders of alienated lands. The expression applied not only to such "estate" holders but also to land holders and occupants of unalienated lands.

It was, however, contended on behalf of the petitioners that the Bombay Land Revenue Code was not a law relating to land tenures in force in the State of Bombay and, therefore, the definition of the expression "estate" contained therein would not avail the respondent. It was urged that the Code was passed by the State Legislature in order to consolidate and amend the law relating to Revenue Officers, and to the assessment and recovery of Land Revenue, and to other matters connected with the Land Revenue Administration in the Presidency of Bombay and was merely concerned with the collection of land revenue by the State and had nothing to do with land tenures as such. This argument, however, ignores the various provisions of the Code which define the status as also the rights and obligations of the occupant who has been defined in s. 3(16) of the Code to mean the holder in actual possession of unalienated lands other than a tenant provided that where the holder in actual possession is a tenant, the landholder or superior landlord, as the case may be, shall be deemed to be the occupant. Chapter VI deals with the Grant, Use and Relinquishment of unalienated lands and s. 65 thereof prescribes the uses to which an occupant of land for purposes of agriculture may put his land. Under s. 68 an occupant is entitled to the use and occupation of his land for the period therein prescribed on fulfilling the conditions therein mentioned and under s. 73 occupancy is stated to be transferable and heritable. Section 73, as it was enacted in 1879, read as follows:

"The right of occupancy shall subject to the provisions contained in section 56, and to any conditions lawfully annexed to the occupancy and save as otherwise prescribed by law, be deemed an heritable and transferable property."

Certain amendments have been made in this section by various Bombay Land Revenue Amendment Acts, (Bom. VI of 1901 and Bom. IV of 1913) and the section as it stands at present reads:—

"An occupancy shall, subject to the provisions contained in section 56, and to any conditions lawfully annexed to the tenure, and save as otherwise prescribed by law, be deemed an heritable and transferable property."

This goes to show that an occupant holds the land under a tenure and occupancy is a species of land tenures. The provisions contained in s. 73(A) relating to the power of the State Government to restrict the right of transfer and the provisions in regard to relinquishments contained in ss. 74, 75 and 76 also point to the same conclusion. These and similar provisions go to show that occupancy is one of the varieties of land tenures and the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879, comes within the description of "existing laws relating to land tenures in force" in the State of Bombay within the meaning of art. 31A(2)(a). Baden-Powell has similar observations to make in regard to these provisions in his Land Systems in British India, Vol. 1, at p. 821:—

"Nothing whatever is said in the Revenue Code about the person in possession (on his own account) being 'owner' in the Western sense. He is simply called the 'occupant', and the Code says what he can do and what he cannot. The occupant may do anything he pleases to improve the land, but may not without permission do anything which diverts the holding from agricultural purposes. He has no right to mines or minerals.

These are the facts of the tenure; you may theorize on them as you please; you may say this amounts to proprietorship, or this is a dominium minus plenum; or anything else."

There is no doubt, therefore, that the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879, was an existing law relating to land tenures in force in Bombay at the time when the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, 1955, was passed and art. 31A in its amended form was introduced therein and the expression "estate" had a meaning given to it under s. 3(5) there viz., "any interest in land" which comprised within its scope alienated as well as unalienated lands and covered the holdings of occupants within the meaning thereof.

The 1948 Act was passed by the State Legislature in order to amend the law which governed the relations between landlords and tenants of agricultural lands, the object sought to be achieved being as hereinbefore set out. Section 2 of the Act defined the expressions "to cultivate personally" [s. 2(6)]; "landholder" [s. 2(9)]; "protected tenant" [s. 2(14)] amongst other expressions and provided in s. 2(21) that words and expressions used in this Act but not defined shall have the meaning assigned to them in the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879, and the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, as the case may be. This brought in the definition of the expression "estate" which had the meaning assigned to it in that Code, viz., "any interest in land". The expression "landholder" in s. 2(9) above was defined to mean

"a zamindar, jagirdar, saranjamdar, inamdar, talukdar, malik or a khot or any person not hereinbefore specified who is a holder of land or who is interested in land, and whom the State Government has declared on account of the extent and value of the land or his interests therein to be a land-holder for the purposes of this Act."

The latter part of this definition is significant and shows that not only holders of alienated lands but also holders of unalienated lands were comprised therein provided, however, the extent and value of the land or their interests therein were such as to deserve a declaration in that behalf at the hands of the State Government. The only point to note here is that no distinction was made even in this Act between alienated lands and unalienated lands and all interests in land howsoever acquired were treated on a par so far as the holdings were concerned, necessarily implying that even an occupant would come within the description of landholder and his interests therein would come within the definition of "estate" as defined in the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879. Chapter III made provisions for protected tenants, their special rights and privileges and whoever came within the category of protected tenant was given the right to purchase from the landlord the land held by him as such protected tenant notwithstanding anything contrary in law, usage or contract subject to the provisions of sub-s. (6) which imposed restrictions on the holdings of landlords as well as tenants. These provisions were analogous to the provisions contained in ss. 32 to 32R of the impugned Act except that in the 1948 Act the protected tenant had the option to purchase the land whereas under the impugned Act there was a provision for compulsory purchase of the land by the tenant on a specified date subject to certain conditions therein mentioned. Section 34 of the 1948 Act gave the landlord the right to determine protected tenancy under certain conditions and was analogous to s. 31 of the impugned Act which empowered the landlord to terminate the tenancy for personal cultivation and non-agricultural purposes. Fifty acres of land were prescribed as the limit of the holding either by the landlord or the protected tenant which provision was analogous to the one found in the impugned Act in regard to ceiling area and economic holdings. Power was given to the State Government under s. 36 to reduce the limit of fifty acres by a notification in the official gazette and power was also given similarly to direct that the limits of fifty acres or the reduced limit specified in such notification shall comprise such kind or kinds of lands in the area as may be specified in the notification. This power was analogous again to the power given to the State Government under s. 7 of the impugned Act to vary the ceiling area or economic holding originally prescribed in ss. 5 and 6 of the Act.

These instances, culled out from some of the provisions of the 1948 Act, go to show that the agrarian reform which was initiated by that Act was designed to achieve the very same purpose of distribution of the ownership and control of agricultural lands so as to subserve the common good and eliminate the concentration of wealth to the common detriment which purpose became more prominent when the Constitution was ushered in on January 26, 1950, and the directive principles of State Policy were enacted inter alia in arts. 38 and 39 of the Constitution. With the advent of the Constitution these provisions contained in the 1948 Act required to be tested on the touch-stone of the fundamental rights enshrined in Part III thereof and when the Constitution (First Amendment) Act, 1951, was passed introducing arts. 31A and 31B in the Constitution, care was taken to specify the 1948 Act in the Ninth Schedule so as to make it immune from attack on the score of any provision thereof being violative of the fundamental rights enacted in Part III of the Constitution. The 1948 Act was the second item in that schedule and was expressly saved from any attack against the constitutionality thereof by the express terms of art. 31B.

The impugned Act, which was passed by the State Legislature in 1956, was a further measure of agrarian reform carrying forward the intentions which had their roots in the 1948 Act. Having regard to the comparison of the various provisions of the 1948 Act and the impugned Act referred to above it could be legitimately urged that if the cognate provisions of the 1948 Act were immune from attack in regard to their constitutionality, on a parity of reasoning similar provisions contained in the impugned Act, though they made further strides in the achievement of the objective of a socialistic pattern of society, would be similarly saved. That position, however, could not obtain, because whatever amendments were made by the impugned Act in the 1948 Act were future laws within the meaning of art. 13(2) of the Constitution and required to be tested on the self-same touchstone. They would not be in terms saved by art. 31B and would have to be scrutinized on their own merits before the Courts came to the conclusion that they were enacted within the constitutional limitations. The very terms of art. 31B envisaged that any competent Legislature would have the power to repeal or amend the Acts and the Regulations specified in the 9th Schedule thereof and if any such amendment was ever made the vires of that would have to be tested. (Vide *Abdul Rahiman v. Vithal Arjun*¹⁰).

That brings us back to the provisions of art. 31A and to a consideration as to whether the impugned Act was a legislation for the acquisition by the State of any estate or of any rights therein or the extinguishment or modification of any such rights within the meaning of sub-article (1)(a) thereof. We have already held that the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879, was an existing law relating to land tenures in force in the State of Bombay and that the interests of occupants amongst others fell within the expression "estate" contained therein. That, however, was not enough for the petitioners and it was further contended on their behalf that even though the impugned Act may be a law in regard to an "estate" within the meaning of the definition contained in art. 31A (2)(a) it was not law providing for the acquisition by the State of any estate or any rights therein or for the extinguishment or modification of any such rights. The impugned Act was certainly not a law for the acquisition by the State of any estate or of any rights therein, because even the provisions with regard to the compulsory purchase by tenants of the land on the specified date transferred the title in those lands to the respective tenants and not to the State. There was no compulsory acquisition of any "estate" or any rights therein by the State itself and this provision could not help the respondent. The respondent, however, urged that the provisions contained in the impugned Act were enacted for the extinguishment or modification of rights in "estates" and were, therefore, saved by art. 31A(1)(a). It was on the other hand urged by the petitioners (1) that the extinguishment or modification of any such rights should only be in the process of the acquisition by the State of any estate or of any rights therein and (2) that the provisions in the impugned Act amounted to a suspension of those rights but not to an extinguishment or modification thereof. We shall now proceed to examine these contentions of the petitioners.

Article 31A(1)(a) talks of two distinct objects of legislation; one being the acquisition by the State of any estate or of any rights therein and the other being the extinguishment or modification of any such rights. If the State acquires an estate or any rights therein that acquisition would have to be a compulsory acquisition within the meaning of art. 31(2)(4) which was also introduced in the Constitution by the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, 1955, simultaneously with art. 31A(1) thereof. There was no provision made for the transfer of the ownership of any property to the State or a Corporation owned or controlled by the State with the result that even though these provisions deprived the landholders of their property they did not amount to a compulsory acquisition of the property by the State. If this part of art. 31A(1)(a) is thus eliminated what we are left with is whether these provisions of the impugned Act provided for an extinguishment or modification of any rights in "estates". That is a distinct concept altogether and could not be in the process of acquisition by the State of any "estate" or of any rights therein. Acceptance of the interpretation which is sought to be put upon these words by the petitioners would involve the addition of words "in the process of the acquisition by the State of any estate or of any rights therein" or "in the process of such acquisition" which according to the well-known canons of construction cannot be done. If the language of the enactment is clear and unambiguous it would not be legitimate for the Courts to add any words thereto and evolve therefrom some sense which may be said to carry out the supposed intentions of the Legislature. The intention of the Legislature is to be gathered only from the words used by it and no such liberties can be taken by the Courts for effectuating a supposed intention of the Legislature. There is no warrant at all, in our opinion, for adding these words to the plain terms of art. 31A(1)(a) and the words "extinguishment or modification of any such rights" must be understood in their plain grammatical sense without any limitation of the type suggested by the petitioners.

It, therefore, remains to consider whether the relevant provisions of the impugned Act were designed to bring about an extinguishment or modification of the landlord's rights in their "estates". These provisions are contained in ss. 32 to 32R of the impugned Act and are under the heading "Purchase of lands by Tenants". Section 32 provides that:

"On the first day of April 1957 (hereinafter referred to as 'the tillers day') every tenant shall, subject to the provisions of the next succeeding sections, be deemed to have purchased from his landlord, free of all incumbrances subsisting thereon on the said day, the land held by him as tenant..."

provided certain conditions are fulfilled. Under s. 32A the tenant shall be deemed to have purchased the lands up to the ceiling area and the tenant shall not be deemed to have purchased lands held by him as such tenant if he hold lands partly as owner and partly as tenant but the area of the land held as owner is equal to or exceeds the ceiling area (s. 32B). Section 32C empowers the tenant to choose the land to be purchased if he holds lands separately from more than one landlord and in spite of anything contained in the Bombay Prevention of Fragmentation and Consolidation of Holdings Act, 1947 (Bom. LXII of 1947) the tenant shall be deemed to have purchased even such fragments of the land held on tenancy (s. 32D). The balance of any land after the purchase by the tenant as above is to be disposed of as if it were land surrendered by the tenant (s. 32E); and the right of the tenant to purchase such land where the landlord is a minor, or a widow, or a person subject to any mental or physical disability or a serving member of the armed forces is postponed till one year after the cessation of disability. The price to be paid by the tenant is to be determined by the Tribunal as soon as may be after the tiller's day and the Tribunal is in the first instance to record in the prescribed manner the statement of the tenant whether he is willing or is not willing to purchase the land held by him as a tenant and if the tenant fails to appear or makes a statement that he is not willing to purchase the land, the Tribunal is to declare by an order in writing that such tenant is not willing to purchase the land and that the purchase is ineffective (s. 32G). These provisions also apply to a sub-tenant of a permanent tenant who is deemed to have purchased the land subject to the conditions specified in ss. 32 to 32E (s. 32I). Section 32J provides for an appeal to the State Government against the decision of the Tribunal. Section 32K prescribes the mode of payment of price by the tenant; and the purchase price is recoverable as arrears of land revenue (s. 32L). Under s. 32M, on the deposit of the price in lump sum or of the last instalment of such price, the Tribunal is to issue a certificate of purchase to the tenant in respect of the land, which certificate of purchase shall be conclusive evidence of purchase. If a tenant fails to pay the lump sum within the period prescribed or is at any time in arrears of four instalments the purchase is to be ineffective and the land is to be at the disposal of the Collector and any amount deposited by such tenant towards the price of the land is to be refunded to him. Section 32N gives the landlord a right to recover rent when purchase becomes ineffective, as if the land had not been purchased at all. Section 32P gives the power to the Collector to resume and dispose of land not purchased by tenants. The amount of purchase price is to be applied towards satisfaction of debts (s. 32Q); and the purchaser is to be evicted from the land purchased by him as aforesaid if he fails to cultivate the land personally (s. 32R).

It is argued on the strength of these provisions that there is no effective purchase or effective sale of the land between the landlord and the tenant on the tiller's day or the alternative period prescribed in that behalf until certain conditions are fulfilled. To start with it is only an inchoate right which is given to the tenant to purchase the land which he can perfect on a statement being made by him before the Tribunal that he is willing to purchase the land. Even if he does so, the land does not vest in him because only on the payment of the purchase price either in lump or by instalments can he get the certificate of purchase from the Tribunal. If he commits default in payment, the purchase is ineffective and he gets no title to the land. These provisions, it is submitted, do not vest the title to the land in the tenant at all until all those conditions are fulfilled, and if any one or more of them is not fulfilled, the purchase becomes ineffective—in fact it is no purchase at all—with the result that the title to the land which is already vested in the landlord is not at all transferred to the purchaser. If that is so, there is no compulsory sale or compulsory purchase of the land in question on the tiller's day or the alternative period of time prescribed therefor and there is no extinguishment of the rights of the landlord. His rights in the land are merely suspended, and such suspension is certainly not an extinguishment of his rights therein nor a modification thereof within the meaning of the expression used in art. 31A(1)(a). Reliance is placed in support of this proposition on the observations of this Court in *Thakur Baghubir Singh v. Court of Wards, Ajmer*¹¹. In that case this Court considered the provisions of s. 112 of the Ajmer Tenancy and Land Records Act (XLII of 1950) which provided that if a landlord habitually infringes the rights of a tenant under the Act he would be deemed to be a landlord who is disqualified to manage his own property and his property would be liable to be taken under the superintendence of the Court of Wards. Mahajan J. (as he then was) observed at p. 1055:—

"Section 112 of the Act XLII of 1950, intended to regulate the rights of landlords and tenants, is obviously not a law providing for 'the acquisition by the State' of the estates of the landlords, or of any rights in those estates. It is also not a law providing for the extinguishment or modification of any such rights. The learned Attorney-General laid emphasis on the word 'modification' used in article 31A. That word in the context of the article only means a modification of the proprietary right of a citizen like an extinguishment of that right and cannot include within its ambit a mere suspension of the right of management of estate for a time, definite or indefinite."

These observations were confined to suspension of the right of management of the estate and not to a suspension of the title to the estate. Apart from the question whether the suspension of the title to the estate for a time, definite or indefinite, would amount to a modification of a right in the estate within the meaning of art. 31A(1)(a), the position as it obtains in this case is that there is no suspension of the title of the landlord at all. The title of the landlord to the land passes immediately to the tenant on the tiller's day and there is a completed purchase or sale thereof as between the landlord and the tenant. The tenant is no doubt given a locus penitentie and an option of declaring whether he is or is not willing to purchase the land held by him as a tenant. If he fails to appear or makes a statement that he is not willing to purchase the land, the Tribunal shall, by an order in writing, declare that such tenant is not willing to purchase the land and that the purchase is ineffective. It is only by such a declaration by the Tribunal that the purchase becomes ineffective. If no such declaration is made by the Tribunal, the purchase would stand as statutorily effected on the tiller's day and will continue to be operative, the only obligation on the tenant then being the payment of price in the mode determined by the Tribunal. If the tenant commits default in the payment of such price either in lump or by instalments as determined by the Tribunal, s. 82M declares the purchase to be ineffective, but in that event the land shall then be at the disposal of the Collector to be disposed of by him in the manner provided therein. Here also the purchase continues to be effective as from the tiller's day until such default is committed and there is no question of a conditional purchase or sale taking place between the landlord and tenant. The title to the land, which was vested originally in the landlord, passes to the tenant on the tiller's day or the alternative period prescribed in that behalf. This title is defeasable only in the event of the tenant failing to appear or making a statement that he is not willing to purchase the land or committing default in payment of the price thereof as determined by the Tribunal. The tenant gets a vested interest in the land defeasable only in either of those cases and it cannot, therefore, be said that the title of landlord to the land is suspended for any period definite or indefinite. If that is so, there is an extinguishment or in any event a modification of the landlord's right in the estate well within the meaning of those words as used in art. 31A(1)(a).

We have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the impugned Act is covered by art. 31A and is protected from attack against its constitutionality on the score of its having violated the fundamental rights, enshrined in arts. 14, 19, and 31 of the Constitution. That being so, the attack levelled against ss. 5, 6, 8, 9, 17A, 31A to 31D and 32 to 32B on the score of their being violative of the fundamental rights conferred upon the petitioners is of no avail to the petitioners. This being the true position it is not necessary for us to consider the interesting questions which were argued before us at some length, viz., the nature, scope and extent of the provisions contained in arts. 31(1) and 31(2) of the Constitution and the line of demarcation between them as also the impact of art. 31(1) on the fundamental right enshrined in art. 19(1)(f) of the Constitution. Suffice it to say that under the circumstances no fundamental right of the petitioners before us is infringed by the impugned Act or the provisions thereof and the petitions under art. 32 cannot be sustained.

The impugned Act being within the legislative competence of the State Legislature no question as to its being a piece of colourable legislation can arise. It is not a legislation resorted to by the State Legislature with a view to by-pass the provisions of List II of the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution, attempting to do something which it was otherwise not competent to do. The legislation being covered by Entry 18 of the said List is really a further measure for agrarian reform which it was well within its competence to enact. It is not an expropriatory legislation in the guise of one covered by Entry 18 in the said List. It only fixes the ceiling area for the holding of the landlord cultivating the land personally and transfers the excess holding to the tenant in actual cultivation thereof and there too the price of the land as fixed by the Tribunal has got to be paid by the tenant to the landlord. The tenant also is not entitled to hold land beyond the ceiling area and there is a balance sought to be struck between the interests of the landlord and those of the tenants so that the means of production are not concentrated in the hands of one party to the common detriment. The price payable is also either in lump or in such instalments as may be determined by the Tribunal and on default committed by the tenant in payment thereof the purchase becomes ineffective and the land deemed to have been purchased by the tenant reverts to the Collector to be dealt with in accordance with the provisions contained in the Act in that behalf. It may be that instalments may be spread over a particular period which may thus be determined by the Tribunal and unless default is committed by the tenant in payment of four instalments the purchase does not become ineffective. That, however, is not a provision which makes the payment of price in any manner illusory. The landlord is entitled to the rents of the land as if there had been no purchase of the land by the tenant and the payment of such rent is made the first charge on the land. There is, therefore, no scope for the argument that the provisions in this behalf contained in the Act were illusory or that the impugned Act is a piece of colourable legislation.

The only question that now survives is whether s. 7 of the impugned Act is bad by reason of excessive delegation of legislative power. Section 7 invests the Government with the power to vary the ceiling area and economic holding have been prescribed in ss. 5 and 6 of the Act. Sections 5, 6 and 7 read as under:—

"5. Ceiling area: (1) For the purposes of this Act, the ceiling area of land

- (a) 48 acres of jirayat land, or
- (b) 24 acres of seasonally irrigated land or paddy or rice land, or
- (c) 12 acres of perennially irrigated land.

(2) Where the land held by a person consists of two or more kinds of land in sub-section (1), the ceiling area of such holding shall be determined on one acre of perennially irrigated land being equal of two acres of seasonally irrigated land or paddy or rice land, or four acres of jirayat land.

6. Economic holding—(1) For the purposes of this Act an economic holding

- (a) 16 acres of jirayat land, or
- (b) 8 acres of seasonally irrigated land, or paddy or rice land, or
- (c) 4 acres of perennially irrigated land.

(2) Where the land held by a person consists of two or more kinds of land in sub-section (1) an economic holding shall be determined on the basis applicable ceiling area under sub-section (2) of section 5.

7. Power of Government to vary ceiling area and economic holding: Notwithstanding anything contained in sections 5 and 6, it shall be lawful for the State Government if it is satisfied that it is expedient so to do in the public interest, to vary, by notification in the Official Gazette, the acreage of the ceiling area or economic holding, or the mode of determination of such ceiling area or economic holding, under sub-section (2) of section 5, regard being had to—

- (a) the situation of the land,
- (b) its productive capacity,
- (c) the fact that the land is located in a backward area, and
- (d) any other factors which may be prescribed."

It is contended that s. 7 does not fix any criteria for the guidance of the State Government and that the power which is given to the State Government to vary the ceiling area and economic holding is unguided and unfettered so that it is possible to exercise it at the sweet will and discretion of the Government even in favour of a single individual or in favour of politicians and the like. It is urged that no broad principle or policy is enunciated by the Legislature in this behalf and it would be open to the State Government to exercise this power arbitrarily and even in a discriminatory manner. Such entrustment of power to the State Government amounts to an abdication of legislative power and s. 7, therefore, must be held to be void.

The principles by which the Courts are guided in the determination of such questions are now well settled. In *The State of Bihar v. Maharaja Kameshwar Singh of Darbhanga*¹², Mahajan J. (as he then was) (at p. 954) :—

"...The Legislature applied its mind to the question of the method and mode of payment of compensation. It settled its policy and the broad principles. It gave to the Government the power to determine matters of detail after having settled its policy. It cannot be said that the Legislature did not apply its mind to the matter of legislation and did not lay down a policy. The proportion in which compensation was payable in cash or in bonds or whether the whole of it was to be paid in one instalment or in instalments and the period of redeemability of the bonds were also matters of detail which the executive could more appositely determine in exercise of its rule-making power. It cannot be said in this case that any essential legislative power has been delegated to the executive or that the Legislature did not discharge the trust which the Constitution reposed in it. If the rule-making Authority abuses its power or makes any law which makes the payment illusory the expropriated proprietor will not be without a remedy. If the Legislature settles the policy and the broad principles of

there is no bar against leaving the matters of detail to be fixed by the executive and such delegation will not amount to excessive delegation of legislative power such as to vitiate the enactment. In the case before us the preamble to the Act says what the policy of the impugned Act is, viz., further to amend the 1948 Act which, as we have already observed, sets out specific objectives to be achieved. Sections 5 and 6 prescribe the ceiling area and the economic holding which are fixed by the Legislature itself having regard to the normal conditions then prevailing within the State. The Legislature knew what were the different types of land, their situation and productive capacity and having regard to all the relevant factors determined the ceiling area as also the economic holding. There were, however, bound to be differences between district and district and one part of the State and another, and having, therefore, enunciated the broad principles and policy which were embodied in ss. 5 and 6 of the Act, the Legislature enacted s. 7 empowering the State Government to vary the ceiling area and the economic holding if it was satisfied that it was expedient so to do in the public interest, regard being had to the various criteria therein specified. The State Government was to be guided in arriving at its satisfaction in regard to the expediency thereof by (a) the situation of the land, (b) its productive capacity, (c) the fact that the land is located in a backward area, and (d) any other factors which may be prescribed. In so far as the situation of the land and its productive capacity were variable factors, more so if the land was located in a backward area, the State Government was enjoined to have regard to these factors as determining the variations one way or the other from the normal standard adopted by the Legislature in ss. 5 and 6 of the Act. "Any other factors which may be prescribed" would be factors ejusdem generis to the factors mentioned earlier in the section and could not be any and every factor which crossed the mind of the executive. The very terms of the section preclude any single individual being treated in this manner because it talks of the variation in the ceiling area and the economic holding being considered by the State Government to be expedient in the public interest and the satisfaction of any individual interest could hardly be said to be a matter of public interest. No doubt individuals would be benefited by the variations contemplated in s. 7 but for that purpose the State Government has got to be satisfied that it is expedient in the public interest to do so and no variation in regard to ceiling area of the economic holding of a single individual can ever be said to have been contemplated within the terms of s. 7. It appears, however, that this argument found favour with the Bombay High Court in its decision in *Parasram Damodhar v. State of Bombay*¹³ where the Court observed that the power to issue a notification may be exercised in favour of a single individual under the authority reserved under s. 7 and may lay the State Government open to a charge of favouritism. With great respect to the learned Judges of that High Court, we are of the view that no such thing is ever contemplated in the terms of s. 7 of the Act. There is also no warrant for the suggestion that the State Government might vary the ceiling area and the economic holding, say for instance, for benefiting the political sufferers within the State. If the situation of the land and its productive capacity as also the fact that the land is located in a backward area are the criteria to be determined before the State Government is satisfied that it is expedient to vary the ceiling area and the economic holding in the public interest and "any other factors which may be prescribed" are to be read ejusdem generis with the above as already observed, no question of benefiting political sufferers can ever enter into the picture. That would be an extraneous consideration. It does not come within the criteria specified in s. 7 of the Act on a true construction thereof. Such considerations, therefore, do not militate against the validity of the provisions contained in that section. In our opinion, the broad principles and policy have been laid down by the Legislature, the criteria have been fixed according to which the State Government has to be satisfied that it is expedient to vary the ceiling area and economic holding already prescribed by the Legislature and the mere matter of working out the details having regard to those criteria which are specifically mentioned therein which has been delegated to the State Government does not amount to any excessive delegation of legislative power.

It is also to be remembered that this power of variation of the ceiling area and the economic holding is vested in the State Government and is left to its subjective satisfaction having regard to the criteria therein specified. As was observed by Kania C.J. in *Dr. N. B. Khare v. The State of Delhi*¹⁴ :—

"...this whole argument is based on the assumption that the Provincial Government when making the order will not perform its duty and may abuse the provisions of the section. In my opinion, it is not proper to start with such an assumption and decide the legality of an Act on that basis. Abuse of the power given by a law sometimes occurs; but the validity of the law cannot be contested because of such an apprehension."

These observations of Kania C.J. were quoted with approval by Patanjali Sastri C.J. in *The State of West Bengal v. Anwar Ali Sarkar*¹⁵ where it was stated (p. 301) :—

"...Whether a law conferring discretionary powers on an administrative authority is constitutionally valid or not should not be determined on the assumption that such authority will act in an arbitrary manner in exercising the discretion committed to it."

The above observations of Kania C.J. were then quoted and the judgment proceeded :—

"On the contrary, it is to be presumed that a public authority will act honestly and reasonably in the exercise of its statutory powers..."

We may lastly refer to the observations of this Court in *Pannalal Binjraj v. Union of India*¹⁶ :—

"It may also be remembered that this power is vested not in minor officials but in top-ranking authorities like the Commissioner of Income-tax and the Central Board of Revenue who act on the information supplied to them by the Income-tax Officers concerned. This power is discretionary and not necessarily discriminatory and abuse of power cannot be easily assumed where the discretion is vested in such high officials. (Vide *Matajog Dobey v. H. S. Bhari*¹⁷). There is moreover a presumption that public officials will discharge their duties honestly and in accordance with the rules of law. (Vide People of the State of New York v. John E. Van De Carr, etc.,¹⁸). It has also been observed by this Court in *A. Thangal Kunju Musaliar v. M. Venkatchalam Potti*¹⁹ with reference to the possibility of discrimination between assesses in the matter of the reference of their cases to the Income-tax Investigation Commission that 'it is to be presumed, unless the contrary were shown, that the administration of a particular law would be done "not with an evil eye and unequal hand" and the selection made by the Government of the cases of persons to be referred for investigation by the Commission would not be discriminatory.'

This presumption, however, cannot be stretched too far and cannot be carried to the extent of always holding that there must be some undisclosed and unknown reason for subjecting certain individuals or corporations to hostile and discriminatory treatment (vide *Gulf, Colorado, etc. v. W. H. Ellis*²⁰). There may be cases where improper execution of power will result in injustice to the parties. As has been observed, however, the possibility of such discriminatory treatment cannot necessarily invalidate the legislation and where there is an abuse of such power, the parties aggrieved are not without ample remedies under the law (vide *Dinabandhu Sahu v. Jadumony Mangaraj*²¹). What will be struck down in such cases will not be the provision which invests the authorities with such power but the abuse of the power itself."

It, therefore, follows that s. 7 of the Act cannot be impugned on the ground of excessive delegation of legislative power.

All the various contentions urged by the petitioners, therefore, fail and the result is that the petitions filed by the petitioners before us must be dismissed with costs. The State of Bombay which is the only respondent in all these petitions will however get only one set of costs therein.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

[NAGPUR BENCH]

Before Mr. Justice Tambe and Mr. Justice Tarkunde.

W. W. JOSHI v. STATE OF BOMBAY.*

States Reorganisation Act (XXXVII of 1956), Secs. 87, 88, 116—Constitution of India, Art. 311(2)—Meaning of word "liability" in Part VII of Act—Whether "liability" includes obligation to reinstate government servant wrongly dismissed—"Actionable wrong", meaning of expression in s. 88—Dismissal in contravention of art. 311(2) of Constitution whether actionable wrong within s. 88—Applicability of s. 88(b).

The word 'liability' used in Part VII of the States Reorganisation Act, 1956, includes not only a financial obligation but also obligations of every other kind, including one of reinstating a government servant wrongly dismissed.

The meaning of the term "actionable wrong" in s. 88 of the States Reorganisation Act, 1956, is an illegal or unauthorised act infringing a legal right of another affording him a ground for action in law. Therefore, where the petitioners, who were citizens of India, challenged the orders of their dismissal on the ground of infringement of art. 311(2) of the Constitution of India, the wrong complained of would be an actionable wrong within the meaning of s. 88 of the Act.

*The State of Tripura v. The Province of East Bengal*¹, referred to.

To call in aid cl. (b) of s. 88 of the States Reorganisation Act, 1956, it must be shown that the cause of action arose in its entirety within the territories which as from November 1, 1956, formed part of the territories of one of the successor States. Therefore, where the petitioners' claim is that their services had been wrongfully terminated in contravention of art. 311(2) of the Constitution of India, for the purposes of s. 88(b) of the Act they must establish that the entire cause of action, namely, the order for termination of their services and the consequence of that order i.e. the fact that they were removed from their services, had arisen within the aforesaid territories.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

M. R. Bobde, B. B. Ranade and G. J. Ghate, for the petitioners.

G. R. Mudholkar, Assistant Special Government Pleader, for the State.

TAMBE J. An important question of law arises out of a preliminary objection raised on behalf of the State of Bombay. The preliminary objection raised relates to the maintainability of the petition against the present State of Bombay. This decision will govern the preliminary objection raised in three cases, viz. Miscellaneous Petition No. 523/56, Miscellaneous Petition No. 470/56 and Special Civil Application No. 73 of 1957. The consideration of this question turns on the interpretation of ss. 87, 88 and 116 of the States Reorganisation Act, 1956, Act XXXVII of 1956, hereinafter called the Act.

The case in general that falls for our consideration is that the petitioners before us were in the service of the former State of Madhya Pradesh. Their services were terminated by the orders of the Government of the then State of Madhya Pradesh prior to the date the Act came into force. Two of the petitioners were serving on the date of termination of their services in territories which now form part of the State of Bombay. Two of the petitioners challenged the orders of their dismissal by petitions under arts. 22 of the Constitution before the then High Court of Judicature at Nagpur on the ground of contravention of art. 311(2) of the Constitution. These were filed against the State of Madhya Pradesh. Their cases have been transferred before this Court on a certificate issued by the Chief Justice of the High Court of Judicature at Nagpur under s. 59(2) of the Act. On the admissions of these petitioners the State of Bombay is joined as a party to the petitions. The remaining petitioner has directly come to this Court after the States Reorganisation Act came into force. All of them claim that their termination is maintainable against the State of Bombay and that the State of Bombay is liable to reinstate them or give them such relief as is available to them by law, on the orders of dismissal being quashed by this Court. They ask whether they are entitled to the relief asked for by them against the State of Bombay.

*Decided, November 19, 1958. Miscellaneous Application No. 73 of 1957, Petition No. 523 of 1956 (with Miscellaneous I [1951] S.O.R. 1, Petition No. 470 of 1956 and Special Civil

There were also other cases pending before this Court arising out of the same set of facts. In one of those cases, viz. Dr. Surjuprasad v. State of Madhya Pradesh, a preliminary objection was raised on behalf of the State of Madhya Pradesh that no writ could be issued by this Court against the State of Madhya Pradesh in respect of the order of dismissal made by the former State of Madhya Pradesh prior to the date the Act came into force. This question was referred to a Bench of this Court and awaiting the decision of the Full Bench in these cases and other cases were kept pending. The Full Bench took the view that this Court could not issue a writ against the present State of Madhya Pradesh or any of its officers and it, therefore, directed that the name of the State of Madhya Pradesh and its officers (the Accountant General of Madhya Pradesh in that case) should be struck off the record. The Full Bench further directed that the petition should continue against the State of Bombay and be disposed of in accordance with law.

In the course of the judgment of the Full Bench the learned Chief Justice who delivered the judgment of the Court, observed (p. 1472):

"...If the complaint of the petitioner is that he has been dismissed by the State of Madhya Pradesh and that the State of Madhya Pradesh should reinstate him, it is easier than for him to file a petition in the High Court of Madhya Pradesh to get a writ from that High Court. If, on the other hand, the relief he seeks is that the Bombay Government should reinstate him, the Bombay Government being the Government of the Madhya Pradesh Government, then the petition is well founded and should be maintained in this Court and this Court can give him relief if he is entitled to relief."

It is the petitioners' case in all the three petitions that they are entitled to claim relief against the State of Bombay. As already stated, the principal objection of the present State of Bombay is that the petitioners cannot claim any relief against it and, therefore, the petitions are not maintainable. For the purposes of deciding this objection it will have to be assumed that the orders for termination of services made in Miscellaneous Petition No. 470/56 and Special Civil Application No. 470/56 were bad in law on account of the contravention of art. 311(2) of the Constitution of India.

The principal argument in these three petitions was advanced by Shri M. R. Bobde, learned counsel for the petitioner in Miscellaneous Petition No. 523/56. We, therefore, propose to deal with his argument first. He contends that the illegal and wrongful action of the then State of Madhya Pradesh in dismissing the petitioner from service was an actionable wrong and that the meaning of s. 88 of the Act. The liability, to redress the wrong done by the then State of Madhya Pradesh has under the provisions of cl. (2) of s. 88 of the Act become the liability of the present State of Bombay. In the Shri Bobde contends that the dismissal of the petitioner being illegal, the petitioner, in Miscellaneous Petition No. 523/56, in the eye of law still holds his post at Arvi within the meaning of s. 116(1) of the Act and, therefore, it must be taken that from the date the Act came into force the petitioner is a servant appointed by the present State of Bombay from November 1, 1956, and in this view of the matter also the petition is maintainable against the present State of Bombay.

Shri G. R. Mudholkar, learned counsel for the State of Bombay, on the other hand, contends that neither s. 88 nor s. 116 of the Act is attracted to the facts of these cases. Admittedly, the petitioners were not, in fact, holding any post on the date the Act came into force. Section 116 of the Act has, therefore, no application. He further contends that the liability contemplated by s. 88 of the Act is a liability to pay damages. The claim made by the petitioners is not to recover damages but is for getting the impugned order quashed and reinstatement in the service. Such a claim does not fall within the scope and ambit of s. 88. According to him, the provisions that are attracted to the facts of these cases are those of s. 87 of the Act and under those provisions the reliefs claimed by the petitioners are not available to them against the State of Bombay.

It is a matter of common knowledge that Parliament in its wisdom considered it necessary to reorganise the existing States in India, and to provide for it and other matters connected therewith the States Reorganisation Act was passed by Parliament. As a result of reorganisation, the boundaries of various States changed. Some of the States merged into other States in their entirety, while some of the States got split and certain parts thereof merged into one State and other parts into another State. These events were bound to give rise, and did give rise, to various complex problems including the apportionment of assets and liabilities and distribution of service personnel of a former State between its successor States. We are here concerned with these questions relating to the former State of Madhya Pradesh. It comprised of two territories known as (i) Central Provinces and (ii) Berar. The capital of this State was located at Nagpur and its High Court also was located in Nagpur and was known as the High Court of Judicature at Nagpur. As a result of the Act, eight districts of the former Madhya Pradesh merged into the present State of Bombay and the remaining districts merged in the new State of Madhya Pradesh. The said eight districts are, Buldana, Akola, Amraoti, Yeotmal, Wardha, Nagpur, Bhandara and Chanda. From November 1, 1956, the date on which the Act came into force, these eight districts came under the jurisdiction of this Court. The High Court at Nagpur ceased to function at Nagpur and was removed to Jabalpur. Looking to the aim, scope and the object of the Act, in our opinion, the intention of Parliament clearly appears to be to provide for a solution of all problems arising out of the states reorganisation. Effect can only be given to this intention of Parliament by liberally construing its provisions so far as the language used would permit.

It cannot be doubted, and it has not been disputed before us, that on establishing their cases on merits the petitioners would have been entitled to the reliefs claimed against the then State of Madhya Pradesh if these cases had been disposed of by the Nagpur High Court prior to the date the Act came into force. Their cases, however, were not decided by that date. It is to be seen whether this liability of the State of Madhya Pradesh has been passed on to the present State of Bombay under any of the provisions of the Act.

Part VII of the Act, relates to apportionment of assets and liabilities; ss. 87 and 88 fall under this part. The word 'liability' in its widest import means an obligation or duty to do something or to refrain from doing something. We see no reason why any restricted meaning should be given to the word 'liability' used in this Act. In our opinion, Parliament intended to include in the word 'liability' not only a financial obligation but also obligations of every other kind, including one of reinstating a government servant wrongly dismissed.

Turning to the provisions of s. 87, they deal with the apportionment of rights and liabilities accrued or which may accrue under a contract between the existing States i.e. the States that existed prior to the reorganisation and any other person. It is the contention of Shri Mudholkar that it is this section that is attracted to the facts and circumstances of these petitions. According to him, the petitioners by their petitions seek to enforce their rights under their contract of service with the former State of Madhya Pradesh. The grievance of the petitioners, in substance, is that the tenure of their service has been illegally cut short. It is well settled that the tenure of service of a government servant does not form part of his contract of service. The office was formerly held by him during the pleasure of His Majesty and now under art. 310(1) of the Constitution it is held during the pleasure of the President or the Governor, as the case may be. It is undoubtedly true that under the Constitution there are certain limitations imposed on the exercise of this pleasure by the President or the Governor in terminating the services of a government servant. Those limitations are enshrined in certain articles of the Constitution, including art. 311 thereof.

The common law doctrine that a servant of a Crown holds office during the pleasure of the Crown and the limitations subject to which it has been accepted in India has been stated by the learned Chief Justice of India, who delivered the judgment of the Court in *P. L. Dhingra v. Union of India*². At page 40 he observes:

"Under the English Common Law all servants of the Crown held office during the pleasure of the Crown, and were liable to be dismissed at any time and without any reason being assigned for such dismissal. No action lay against the Crown in respect of such dismissal, even though it were contrary to the express term of the contract of employment, for the theory was that the Crown could not fetter its future executive action by entering into a contract in matters which concerned the welfare of the State." The limitations subject to which this doctrine is accepted in India in the words of the learned Chief Justice are (p. 41):

"...The opening words of Art. 310(1), namely, 'Except as expressly provided by this Constitution', reproduce the opening words of s. 240(1) of the 1935 Act, substituting the word 'Constitution' for the word 'Act'. The exceptions contemplated by the opening words of art. 310(1) quite clearly refer, inter alia, to Arts. 124, 148, 218 and 324 which respectively provide expressly that the Supreme Court Judges, the Auditor-General, the High Court Judges and the Chief Election Commissioner shall not be removed from his office except by an order of the President passed after an address by each House of Parliament, supported by the requisite majority therein specified, has been presented to him in the same session for such removal on the ground of proved misbehaviour or incapacity. There are clearly exceptions to the rule embodied in Art. 310(1) that public servants hold their office during the pleasure of the President or the Governor, as the case may be. Subject to these exceptions, our Constitution, by Art. 310(1), has adopted the English Common Law rule that public servants hold office during the pleasure of the President or Governor, as the case may be and has, by Art. 311, imposed two qualifications on the exercise of such pleasure. Though the two qualifications are set out in a separate Article, they quite clearly restrict the operation of the rule embodied in art. 310(1). In other words, the provisions of art. 311 operate as a proviso to art. 310(1)." This being the position in law, it is not possible for us to accept the contention of Shri Mudholkar that the tenure of office of a government servant is a matter of contract. Apart from this, the claim made by the petitioners is not one arising out of an alleged breach of any term of the contract between them and the State Government. On the other hand, the claim is founded on the alleged contravention of the provisions of art. 311 of the Constitution. This being the nature of the claim of the petitioners, it is not possible for us to hold that the cases of the petitioners are governed by s. 87 of the Act.

Section 88 of the Act reads as follows:

"Where, immediately before the appointed day, an existing State is subject to any liability in respect of an actionable wrong other than breach of contract, that liability shall—

- (a) if there be only one successor State, be a liability of that State;
- (b) if there be two or more successor States and the cause of action arose wholly within the territories which as from that day are the territories of one of them, be a liability of that successor State; and
- (c) in any other case, be initially a liability of the principal successor State, but subject to such financial adjustment as may be agreed upon between all the successor States concerned, or in default of such agreement, as the Central Government may by order direct."

It is the contention of Shri Bobde that the provisions of cl. (b) of this section are attracted. To call in aid these provisions it is necessary for the petitioners to first establish that their claim relates to the 'liability in respect of an actionable wrong' of the former State of Madhya Pradesh. We have already held that the word 'liability' used in this Act has to be understood in its widest import and would include a liability to reinstate a government servant wrongly dismissed. We have also said that in the event the petitioners are able to establish their cases on merit, and for purposes of this decision we will have to assume that they would be able to establish their cases on merit, then the former State of Madhya Pradesh would have been liable either to reinstate them or to hold a fresh inquiry against them, as the case may be.

It has next to be seen whether that liability of the former State of Madhya Pradesh is in respect of "an actionable wrong other than breach of contract". Now, the term "actionable wrong" has not been defined in the Act; there is, therefore, no reason to give it a restricted meaning. We find useful guidance to construe this term in the majority view of their Lordships of the Supreme Court in *The State of Tripura v. The Province of East Bengal*³ wherein their Lordships have construed an identical term "liability in respect of an actionable wrong other than breach of contract" appearing in art. 10 of the Indian Independence (Rights, Property and Liabilities) Order, 1947. The problems with which the said Order dealt with are similar to the problems dealt with in the Act. It is a matter of history that in the year 1947 India was partitioned into two dominions, India and Pakistan. An Act to make provision for the setting up in India of two independent Dominions of India and Pakistan, was passed by Parliament (India Independence Act, 1947). Under the provisions of this Act from the appointed day, i.e. August 15, 1947, the former province of Bengal ceased to exist and its territories were divided into two new provinces to be known respectively as East Bengal and West Bengal. East Bengal formed part of the Dominion of Pakistan whereas West Bengal formed part of the Dominion of India. Section 9 of the Indian Independence Act empowered the Governor-General to make such provision by order as appears to him to be necessary and expedient for bringing the provisions of this Act into effective operation in respect of various matters mentioned therein. In exercise of the power conferred on him by s. 9, the Governor-General of India made an Order known as "The Indian Independence (Rights, Property and Liabilities) Order, 1947." Article 10 of this Order inter alia deals with apportionment of the liabilities of the former Province of Bengal in respect of an actionable wrong other than breach of contract between its two new successor provinces of East and West Bengal.

We now turn to the facts in the Supreme Court case in The State of Tripura v. The Province of East Bengal. They in brief are:

"The Income-tax Officer, Dacca, acting under the Bengal Agricultural Income-tax Act, 1944, sent by registered post a notice to the Manager of an Estate belonging to the Tripura State but situated in Bengal, calling upon the latter to furnish a return of the agricultural income derived from the Estate during the previous year. The notice was received by the Manager in the Tripura State. The State, by its then Ruler, instituted a suit in June 1948, against the Province of Bengal and the Income-tax Officer, in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Dacca for a declaration that the said Act in so far as it purported to impose a liability to pay agricultural income-tax on the plaintiff was ultra vires and void, and for a perpetual injunction to restrain the defendants from taking any steps to assess the plaintiff. The suit was subsequently transferred to the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Alipore. The partition of India under the Indian Independence Act took place on the 15th August, 1947, and the Province of East Bengal in which the Estate was situated, was substituted as a defendant in the place of the Province of Bengal on an application made by it, and in its written statement it contended that the Court of Alipore which was situated in West Bengal had no jurisdiction to proceed with the suit. The High Court of Calcutta, reversing the order of the Subordinate Judge of Alipore held that the provisions of the Indian Independence (Legal Proceedings) Order, 1947, and the Indian Independence (Rights, Property and Liabilities) Order, 1947, did not apply to the case...

The State of Tripura, therefore, took an appeal against the decision of the High Court to the Supreme Court and one of the contentions raised on behalf of the State was that its suit was maintainable against the Province of East Bengal under art. 10 of the aforesaid Order of 1947. The High Court had not accepted this contention as in its view the phrase "liability in respect of an actionable wrong" was synonymous with "liability for damages for a completed tortious act". The majority of the Judges of the Supreme Court constituting the Bench that decided this case did not accept this view of the High Court. At page 11 of the report Patanjali Sastri J., who delivered the judgment on behalf of Kania C.J. and Chandrasekhara Aiyar J. and himself, observed:

"...The learned Judges have placed much too narrow a construction on the phrase 'liability in respect of an actionable wrong'. They have assumed that the phrase connotes only a liability for damages for a completed tortious act... The intention being thus to provide for the initial distribution of rights, property and liabilities as between the two Dominions and their Provinces, a wide and liberal construction, as far as the language used would admit, should be placed upon the terms of the Order, so as to leave no gap or lacuna in relation to the matters sought to be provided for. There is no reason, accordingly, why the words 'liability in respect of an actionable wrong' should be understood in the restricted sense of liability for damages for completed tortious acts. We consider that the words are apt to cover the liability to be restrained by injunction from completing what on the plaintiff's case was an illegal or unauthorised act already commenced."

Expressing himself on the same question Mukherjea J. observed:

"...The High Court took the view that the expression 'actionable wrong other than a breach contract' is synonymous with 'tort'. It has held that the act complained of cannot be a tortious act and even if it is so, no action would lie upon it, it being an established proposition of law that the State is not answerable for any tortious acts of its officers done in the course of official duties imposed by a Statute. It seems to me that the learned Judges have attached a narrow and somewhat restricted meaning to the words of the article mentioned above and that the plain language of the provision read in the light of the context would demand and justify a wider and more liberal interpretation. In my opinion, there can be an actionable wrong which does not arise out of a breach of contract and at the same time does not answer to the description of a 'tort' as it is understood in English law; and if the plaintiff's allegations are correct, it is an actionable wrong precisely of that type which we have in the present case."

The word 'wrong' in ordinary legal language means and signifies 'privation of right'. An act is wrongful if it infringes the legal right of another, and actionable means nothing else than that it affords grounds for action in law." (pp. 44-45).

The meaning of the term "actionable wrong" deducible from this decision in our opinion is an illegal or unauthorised act infringing a legal right of another affording him a ground for action in law. It cannot be doubted that a citizen of India is entitled to protections and guarantees enshrined in the Constitution, and if these guarantees are infringed, it amounts to illegal and unauthorised act infringing the right of a citizen. He is on that ground entitled to protection at the hands of this Court under art. 226 of the Constitution. Here the petitioners, who are citizens of India, are challenging the orders of their dismissal on the ground of infringement of art. 311(2) of the Constitution. For reasons stated above the wrong complained of by the petitioners in all the cases is, in our opinion, an actionable wrong within the meaning of s. 88 of the Act. As already stated, the liability to redress this wrong was initially the liability of the former State of Madhya Pradesh.

It is next to be seen whether it has now been transferred to the present State of Bombay under cl. (b) of this section. The successor States of the former State of Madhya Pradesh are more than one and they are the new State of Madhya Pradesh and the State of Bombay. Out of these two successor States under s. 2(m)(i) of the Act the new or the present State of Madhya Pradesh is "the principal successor State" of the former State of Madhya Pradesh. To call in aid this clause it must be shown that the cause of action arose in its entirety within the territories which as from that day November 1, 1956, formed part of the territories of one of the successor States, i.e. the present State of Bombay. The meaning of the term 'cause of action' as is generally understood is "every fact which, if traversed, it would be necessary for the plaintiff to prove in order to support his right to the judgment of the Court". The petitioners' claim is that their services have been wrongfully terminated. Undoubtedly, therefore, the fact that the order for termination of service was made would form part of a cause of action, and it would arise at the place the order is made. It is the contention of all the petitioners that once they establish that orders for the termination of their services have been made it was sufficient to entitle them to claim relief at the hands of this Court. All these orders were made in Nagpur, which at the material time was the seat of the Government of the former State of Madhya Pradesh. The cause of action, therefore, in its entirety arose at Nagpur which now forms the territory of the present State of Bombay. Clause (b) of s. 88 is thus fully attracted to the facts of all the three cases. It is not possible for us to concede that to sustain a challenge to the termination of services under art. 226 of the Constitution it is sufficient for the Government servant only to establish that an order for termination of his service has been made. That fact by itself alone cannot afford to him a ground to claim relief at the hands of this Court. He must further prove that the consequences of that order fell on him i.e. as a consequence of that order he, in fact, was removed from service. In our opinion, therefore, for a claim of this kind the cause of action would arise at a place where the order of termination of service was made and also at a place where its consequences fell on the servant. If this cause of action has in its entirety arisen within the former territories of the State of Madhya Pradesh which now form part of the State of Bombay, then the liability referred to in s. 88 of the Act of the former State of Madhya Pradesh would fall on the present State of Bombay under cl. (b) thereof.

In the light of these principles it will have to be seen to what cases cl. (b) of s. 88 is attracted. It is not in dispute that in all the three cases the orders of dismissal were made at Nagpur and were issued from that place. Nagpur is now a part of the territories of the present State of Bombay.

In Miscellaneous Petition No. 523 of 1956, the consequences of the order fell at Arvi and the petitioner in that case was relieved of his post at Arvi on November 21, 1955. Arvi is in the Wardha district and Wardha district is now one of the districts of the present State of Bombay. This petition, therefore, is maintainable against the State of Bombay.

In Miscellaneous Petition No. 470 of 1956, the consequences of the order for termination of the service of the petitioner fell at Drug. Drug does not form part of the present State of Bombay. This petition is, therefore, not maintainable against the State of Bombay.

It is necessary to notice one additional argument of Shri Ghata, learned counsel for this petitioner. He contends that the consequences of the order of dismissal of his client may have fallen at Drug, a place outside the territories of the present State of Bombay and a part of the cause of action accrued outside the territories of the present State of Bombay, it does not preclude his client from claiming reliefs against the present State of Bombay. This case has come before this Court on a certificate of the former High Court of Judicature at Nagpur under s. 59(1). This shows that the Chief Justice at Nagpur had come to the conclusion that the cause of action which entitled the petitioner to claim relief accrued in the territories of the present State of Bombay. This order is binding on the State of Bombay, and it is not open now to the State of Bombay to say that the provisions of cl. (b) of s. 88 are not attracted. It is not possible for us to accept this contention of Shri Ghate. The certificate issued under s. 59(1) is not an order made on the judicial side of the Nagpur High Court, but it was made behind the back of the present State of Bombay, and it was made when the present State of Bombay was born. Such an order cannot be set aside by the present State of Bombay from raising a contention before this Court, nor can it, in any event, come in the way of this Court accepting the contention raised.

In Special Civil Application No. 73 of 1957, the consequence of the order of the Chief Justice at Nagpur fell in Nagpur. As already stated, Nagpur forms part of the territories of the State of Bombay. This application would, therefore, be maintained against the State of Bombay.

It is next to be seen how far the provisions of s. 116 of the Constitution are attracted to the petitioners. To attract the provisions of this section it has been held by the petitioners that they were holding or discharging any post immediately before the appointed day. The appointed day, as already stated, was November 1, 1956. From the facts stated above it appears that the petitioners' services stood terminated some time before November 1, 1956. It cannot, therefore, be said that the petitioners were, in fact, holding or discharging the duties of any post or office immediately before the appointed day. It is, however, contended on behalf of the petitioners that they might not be holding or discharging the duties of any post immediately before November 1, 1956, but their dismissal being wrongful in the eyes of the law, they continue to be in service and continue to hold the post which they were holding. Such an order of dismissal must, therefore, be completely set aside. It is not possible for us to accept this contention. It would be not only assuming that each of the orders made was in contravention of art. 311(2) of the Constitution, but it would also be assuming that the orders were made by an authority having jurisdiction to make an order. The order made, therefore, cannot be said to be non est or just a piece of paper. It cannot be said that the order is void by reason of its origin being bad. A distinction has to be drawn between an order of dismissal made by an authority which was not competent to make an order and an erroneous order of dismissal made by a competent authority. The former may be non est and can be completely ignored but such is not the case with the latter.

Further, even assuming for a moment that this contention of the petitioners is well-founded, it is of no further assistance to the petitioner in Special Civil Application No. 470 of 1956 because he could only be deemed to be a person employed in the State of Bombay at the time when he was appointed to that post. He cannot be deemed to have been appointed to that post by the Government of the State of Bombay as from November 1, 1956. Consequently he cannot claim any relief against the State of Bombay even under the provision of s. 116 of the Constitution.

In the result, therefore, in our judgment, Miscellaneous Petition No. 470 of 1956 and Special Civil Application No. 73 of 1957 are maintained against the State of Bombay; while Miscellaneous Petition No. 470 of 1956 is dismissed. We make no orders as to costs. The former two petitions will be heard for hearing on merits.

Order

CRIMINAL APPELLATE.

Before Mr. Justice Shah and Mr. Justice V. S. Desai.

STATE v. PUNDLIK BHIKAJI AHIRE.*

Prevention of Corruption Act (II of 1947), Sec. 4(1)—Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), Secs. 161, 165—"Gratification", meaning of expression—Person accused of offence under s. 161 proved to have taken gratification other than legal remuneration—Statutory presumption to be raised by Court under s. 4(1) of Prevention of Corruption Act—Burden of proof—Accused whether bound to prove that gratification not accepted as a motive or reward such as mentioned in s. 161—Nature of such proof.

The expressions "gratification" as used in s. 161 and "valuable thing" as used in s. 165 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860, are not mutually exclusive in their connotations. Acceptance of a valuable thing by a public servant may amount to acceptance of gratification within the meaning of s. 161 of the Code.

Promod Chander Shekhar v. Rex,¹ agreed with.

Section 4(1) of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1947, not only dispenses with the proof by the prosecution of one of the essential ingredients of the offence under s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860, namely, that gratification was accepted or agreed to be accepted or attempted to be obtained as motive or reward for performing an official act, but the section imposes upon the person accused, when it is proved that he has accepted or obtained or agreed to accept or attempted to obtain gratification other than legal remuneration, the burden of proving that it was not as a motive or reward that the gratification was obtained. The Court is required to raise the statutory presumption subject to the limits prescribed by s. 4(3) of the Prevention of Corruption Act when it is proved that the public servant tried for an offence under s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code has received gratification.

The presumption is not one which is required to be rebutted by evidence establishing the defence of the accused beyond reasonable doubt. If the person accused shows a reasonable preponderance of probability enough to support a verdict in a civil action, that the gratification was not as a motive or reward for doing or forbearing to do an official act, the burden may be deemed to be discharged.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

SHAH J. Pundlik Bhikaji Ahire, whom we will hereafter refer to as accused No. 1, and Fajitrao Damu Mahale, whom we will hereafter refer to as accused No. 2, were tried by the Special Judge, Ahmednagar, in Corruption Case No. 1 of 1958, for offences respectively under ss. 161 and 165A of the Indian Penal Code. The learned Special Judge acquitted the two accused, and against the order of acquittal this appeal has been preferred by the State of Bombay.

The material facts which give rise to the prosecution may be briefly stated. Chapter proceedings were started by the police against one Mohanlal Doshi in the Court of the Executive Magistrate at Sangamner. The proceedings were then transferred to the Court of the Special Executive Magistrate at Ahmednagar. Accused No. 1 was the Presiding Officer of the Court of the Special Executive Magistrate at Ahmednagar. Accused No. 2 is the son-in-law of accused No. 1 and was employed in the police force as a constable, and was posted at Rahata in the district of Ahmednagar. Before September 25, 1957, three witnesses on behalf of the State had been examined in the case against Mohanlal Doshi and the case stood adjourned till that date. On September 25 Mohanlal Doshi sent a telegram addressed to the Magistrate requesting that an adjournment be granted because his presence was required in another Court in another proceeding in which he was concerned. The prosecutor applied for the issue of a warrant for arrest of Mohanlal Doshi in view of the latter's absence from Court on the date fixed. Accused No. 1 granted that application. On September 26, 1957, Mohanlal Doshi appeared before accused No. 1 and requested him to discharge the warrant. Accused No. 1 complied with his request, and on the undertaking given by Mohanlal to appear before the Court on October 16, 1957, it was directed that the warrant be cancelled. The case then stood adjourned to October 16, 1957. On September 30, 1957, there was a fair at the village Korhale, and accused No. 2 was posted as a constable on duty at the fair. Accused No. 2 met Mohanlal at the fair and told him that he had a message from accused No. 1 about the Chapter proceedings. Accused No. 2 informed Mohanlal that accused No. 1 had asked him to inform Mohanlal that if the latter desired to be "acquitted" in the Chapter proceedings, he—Mohanlal—should pay Rs. 400 to accused No. 1. Mohanlal told accused No. 2 that the demand was excessive and offered to pay Rs. 100. Accused No. 2 told Mohanlal that Rs. 100 were inadequate, and that he was under orders of transfer and that Mohanlal may accompany him to the house of accused No. 1 and settle the figure directly with accused No. 1. Accused No. 2 had received orders of transfer on September 30, 1957, from Rahata to Ahmednagar. He left charge of his duties at Rahata on October 6, 1957, and proceeded to Ahmednagar by the evening motor bus on October 13, 1957, and joined duty at Ahmednagar on the next day. On October 13, 1957, accused No. 2 before he left Rahata had met Mohanlal and informed him that he was leaving for Ahmednagar in the evening and had asked Mohanlal to accompany him. In the evening of October 13, Mohanlal and accused No. 2 proceeded from Rahata and reached Ahmednagar at about 8 p.m. Mohanlal arranged to put up for the night at the Arya Nivas Hotel, and accused No. 2 left to ascertain whether accused No. 1 was at home. He returned after some time and informed Mohanlal that accused No. 1 had agreed to see Mohanlal. Accused No. 2 and Mohanlal then proceeded to the house of accused No. 1 at about 9 p.m. There was then a meeting between accused No. 1 and Mohanlal. Accused No. 1 told Mohanlal that he had sent word with accused No. 2 demanding Rs. 400 and should Mohanlal pay him Rs. 400 an order of discharge in the Chapter proceeding will be passed. Mohanlal protested that the amount was very large and he was unable to pay the same. Accused No. 1 then explained to him that Mohanlal was not likely to succeed in the case, and that even if he went in appeal, he may have to spend a large amount. After some discussion it was agreed that Mohanlal should pay to accused No. 1 Rs. 200 in consideration of the latter agreeing to discharge Mohanlal in the Chapter proceedings. It was agreed that the amount was to be paid on October 16, 1957.

At 11 a.m. on October 16, 1957, Mohanlal attended the Court of accused No. 1. Accused No. 2 met him and took him aside and asked him whether he had brought the money agreed to be paid. Mohanlal stated that he had brought some gold, but as it was a Wednesday and the local bazar was closed, it could not be sold and promised to secure the amount on the next day. Accused No. 2 then went into the chamber of accused No. 1 and he came out after some time and told Mohanlal that he may arrange for payment of the amount on the next day. The case was then adjourned to November 4, 1957, as some of the witnesses were not present.

After leaving the Court room Mohanlal thought of approaching the Anti-Corruption Police at Ahmednagar, and he met one Patki, Sub-Inspector of Police, Anti-Corruption Branch, Ahmednagar, and narrated to him what had transpired. Patki recorded the complaint of Mohanlal and sent up a report to the Deputy Superintendent of Police, Anti-Corruption, Poona, requesting the latter to arrange for a trap. Patki asked Mohanlal to meet him on the next day. On October 17, 1957, the Deputy Superintendent of Police Mr. Kakeri arrived at Ahmednagar. He was accompanied by Divekar, Inspector of Police, and his police constables. Mohanlal met Patki at about 3 p.m. and he was taken to Kakeri some time later. The statement of Mohanlal was verified by Kakeri and Patki was requested by Kakeri to secure panchas for the trap. In the presence of the panchas Mohanlal repeated his story. Mohanlal was then searched and it was found that there was no money on his person. Thereafter currency notes of the value of Rs. 200 were handed over to Mohanlal. These currency notes were smeared with anthracene powder and were handed over to Mohanlal for being delivered to accused No. 1 if a demand for bribe was made by the latter. The signal to be given if the bribe was accepted by accused No. 1 was also settled. A panchanama about the delivery of the currency notes was prepared. Thereafter Mohanlal, three panchas, Kakeri and Divekar proceeded towards the house of accused No. 1 at about 8-45 p.m. Kakeri stood somewhere near the entrance to the street in which was the house of accused No. 1, while Divekar stood at some distance. Mohanlal proceeded to the house of accused No. 1, and found both the accused in the front apartment of the house. Accused No. 1 asked Mohanlal if he had brought the money and Mohanlal replied in the affirmative. Mohanlal then took out the currency notes and handed over the same to accused No. 1. Accused No. 1 counted the currency notes and put the same in the outer pocket of his bush coat. At that time accused No. 2 was standing in the room. Mohanlal said that accused No. 1 should "remember his work" and discharge him in the Chapter case. Accused No. 1 replied that Mohanlal need not worry about that. Mohanlal then proceeded to the gallery and lighted a cigarette which was the signal originally arranged between him and the police officers to signify that the bribe was given and accepted. Mohanlal then returned to the room, and immediately the raiding party consisting of Kakeri, Divekar and the panchas entered the house of accused No. 1. Kakeri disclosed his identity and asked accused No. 1 to show his hands. They were examined under the ultra violet light and found to be smeared with anthracene powder. Kakeri asked accused No. 1 whether he had received any bribe from Mohanlal. Accused No. 1 gave no reply and pointed out with his fingers to the pocket of his bush coat. The pocket of his bush coat was also found smeared with anthracene powder. On being asked, accused No. 1 produced the currency notes. On examination the currency notes were found to be the same which were handed over to Mohanlal for being given as bribe to accused No. 1. Accused No. 1 was then searched and no other amount was found on his person. The person of accused No. 2 was also searched and no incriminating articles were found. A search of the person of Mohanlal was also taken and beside a cigarette and a match-box nothing else was found on his person. A panchanama in respect of all the three searches was made. Thereafter Kakeri recorded the statements of several persons and after enquiries submitted the papers to the D.I.G., Anti-Corruption. A complaint was then lodged on November 9, 1957, against the two accused. The requisite sanction for prosecuting the two accused was obtained in March 1958, and the two accused were arrested and a charge-sheet was submitted against accused No. 1 for the offence under s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code and against accused No. 2 for the offence under s. 165A of the Indian Penal Code. The accused were tried before the Special Judge at Ahmednagar.

Before the Special Judge, the prosecution examined, beside Mohanlal and the panchas, Kakeri, Patki and the other police officers and the Prosecuting Jamadar attached to the Court of accused No. 1. Mohanlal substantially deposed to the story which we have set out as the prosecution case and his evidence tallied with the story related by him in his complaint by Patki. His story was corroborated by the testimony of the police and the panchas.

Accused No. 1 in his statement denied that he had demanded illegal gratification from Mohanlal. Accused No. 2 also denied that any illegal gratification was given by Mohanlal and that he had not carried out any negotiations for procuring illegal gratification from Mohanlal. Accused No. 1 admitted that he had received Rs. 200 from Mohanlal, but he explained that six or seven months ago accused No. 2 had given Rs. 200 from him promising to return the same within 2 or 4 days. After accused No. 2 was transferred from Rahata to Ahmednagar on September 4, 1957, he returned by rail to Ahmednagar to join duty and when asked about the amount which was borrowed, accused No. 2 told him (accused No. 1) that he had given the amount to a resident of Rahata who would get the amount within 2 or 4 days, and the person to whom the money was given was Mohanlal, and that accused No. 2 told him that he would bring the money the same day. Thereafter, according to accused No. 1, on October 17, 1957, at about 8-30 p.m. when he was in his house, a stranger entered. Accused No. 1 stated that he asked the stranger who he was and why he had come, and the stranger stated that he had borrowed Rs. 200 from accused No. 2 and he would return the same, that in the meanwhile accused No. 2 told the stranger that the amount was taken from accused No. 1 the same day and he returned it to accused No. 1 and that accordingly the stranger gave the amount to accused No. 1. He stated that he counted the currency notes of Rs. 200 and the same and put them in the pocket of his bush coat and thereafter he went out on the pretext that he wanted to spit but he did not spit and did there and immediately the police and the panchas arrived and the currency notes of Rs. 200 were when demanded handed over to the police.

Accused No. 2 also related a similar story. He stated that when he was at Rahata, Mohanlal had through his cousin Uttam Bhikaji requested a loan of Rs. 200 and that even though he was originally unwilling to advance a loan on the request of Uttam Bhikaji the amount was advanced. He stated that he gave the amount to Mohanlal at Rahata on the latter's promise to return the same within two or three days; that he had borrowed the amount from accused No. 1 promising to return the same within 2 or 4 days. Mohanlal avoided repayment, he, accused No. 2, reprimanded Mohanlal and that thereafter there was "some tension" between him and Mohanlal and that thereafter he was transferred to the Cantonment Police Station. Before he gave up charge at Rahata he again demanded repayment from Mohanlal. He further stated that because Mohanlal promised to repay the debt at Ahmednagar, he gave Mohanlal the address of accused No. 2, his permanent residence at Ahmednagar, and told him that if he sent the money it may be handed over to accused No. 1 because he, accused No. 2, had borrowed the same from the former. He further stated that he came to Ahmednagar by the night train on October 13, 1957, and joined duty on October 14, and thereafter Mohanlal came on the night of October 14 and handed over the money to accused No. 1 at his direction because the money which was advanced to Mohanlal, was borrowed from accused No. 1 and not from Mohanlal.

The Special Judge was of the view that the story of the defence that a loan was advanced by accused No. 2 to Mohanlal and that the currency notes of Rs. 200 were given by Mohanlal to accused No. 1 in the house of the latter on October 17, 1957, could not be accepted. In the view of the Special Judge that story was 'unnatural', but that it was not correct to say that because the defence failed to establish its case about a loan advanced by accused No. 2 to Mohanlal.

ment thereof that the prosecution case was established. He observed:

"Such an approach to the question has always been objected to on the ground that it is for the prosecution to prove its case in a criminal trial and it is only while considering whether the prosecution has proved its case that incidentally and where necessary the criminal Court would have to consider the case made for the defence. If, therefore, the prosecution has not established its case beyond reasonable doubt by the evidence led, it would not be permissible to record a conviction merely because the defence theory appears to the Court to be unreasonable or does not appear to have been established."

The Special Judge then proceeded to consider the prosecution evidence and observing that on several important particulars the story of Mohanlal was not corroborated and further observing that Mohanlal was not a person "who could be said to be of an unimpeachable character whose evidence could be readily accepted," the learned Judge acquitted that accused. Against that order this appeal has been preferred.

There is no dispute that accused No. 1 in the presence of accused No. 2 received Rs. 200 from Mohanlal. The story that accused No. 1 had given a sum of Rs. 200 to accused No. 2 and that accused No. 2 advanced that sum of money to Mohanlal is not supported by any reliable evidence, and, in our judgment, appears to be entirely improbable. There is no evidence on the record to show that before accused No. 2 was posted at Rahata he knew Mohanlal. It is the case of accused No. 2 that he was introduced to Mohanlal who was a stranger to him by his cousin Uttam Bhikaji. Why accused No. 2 should be willing to advance Rs. 200 to Mohanlal has not been attempted to be explained in the evidence or before us. There is not even a scrap of documentary evidence which supports the case of the defence that a loan was advanced by accused No. 2 to Mohanlal. Evidently accused No. 2 is not a money-lender, and even if he was willing to advance a loan of a sum of money which was not negligible, he would at least have taken some writing from Mohanlal acknowledging receipt of the money and agreeing to repay the same. Accused No. 2 admits that he could not himself advance the loan. There was no adequate reason why he should borrow Rs. 200 from his father-in-law without disclosing the reason why he wanted the amount and advance the same to Mohanlal. There is, again, no reason suggested by accused No. 1 as to why on a mere request made by accused No. 2 he was prepared to part with Rs. 200 without even ascertaining the purpose for which the amount was required. The case sought to be made by the defence that accused No. 1 gave Rs. 200 to accused No. 2, and the latter advanced it to Mohanlal whose case was pending before accused No. 1, is not supported by any reliable evidence, and strikes us as extremely improbable. Even the date on which the amount was advanced by accused No. 2 to Mohanlal is not disclosed. Again, if accused No. 2 had made an advance of a loan to Mohanlal, there was no reason why he should have asked accused No. 1 to receive the amount from Mohanlal. Accused No. 1 must have realised, when Mohanlal entered his house, that the latter was a litigant who was concerned in a case before him; and if his story about a loan were true, he would as a prudent man not have accepted the money from Mohanlal, but would have asked accused No. 2 to settle his dealing elsewhere. The cousin of accused No. 2 Uttam has not been examined in the Court below, and beyond the bare statement of the two accused there is no evidence to show that in fact Rs. 200 were advanced by accused No. 1 to accused No. 2 and that accused No. 2 had advanced that amount to Mohanlal and in repayment of the loan Mohanlal paid Rs. 200 to accused No. 1 on October 17, 1957. On the evidence, we have no doubt that the learned trial Judge was right in holding that the story of the defence that the amount of Rs. 200 paid by Mohanlal to accused No. 1 was in repayment of the loan alleged to have been given to Mohanlal cannot be accepted.

The question which then falls to be determined is whether this payment of Rs. 200 by Mohanlal was illegal gratification given as reward or motive for rendering service to Mohanlal, i.e. for discharging Mohanlal in the Chapter proceedings pending before accused No. 1, or whether it was for some innocuous purpose. As we have already observed, Mohanlal had on October 16, 1957, related before Patki a detailed story as to the various meetings and the conversation which he had with accused No. 2, and also a report about the conversation which he had with accused No. 1 on September 30, 1957. This story of Mohanlal is partially corroborated by independent evidence. We have the evidence of the Prosecuting Jamadar Sayyar Mir Akbar who stated that on October 16, 1957, accused No. 2 attended the Court of accused No. 1. He has also deposed to the circumstances in which the case against Mohanlal was adjourned on September 25, 1957. Again, the record of the Magistrate corroborates the testimony of Mohanlal about the various proceedings in the Chapter case. The record of the Police Department supports the story of Mohanlal that on the night of September 30, 1957, accused No. 2 was posted on duty at the Korhale fair, that accused No. 2 had been transferred from Korhale and that accused No. 2 joined duty at Ahmednagar on October 14, 1957. It is difficult to believe that if the movements of accused No. 2 were not known to Mohanlal and accused No. 2 had not met Mohanlal from time to time, Mohanlal could give in his complaint the details which he has given.

It is true that the antecedents of Mohanlal are not impressive. He has admitted that complaints were filed against him at the Shrirampur Police station wherein it was alleged that he had received stolen property and that complaints were also filed against him at Rahata Police station that he had committed offences under the Prevention of Gambling Act. It also appears that he had been convicted for consuming liquor without a permit; and Chapter proceedings were pending against him wherein it was alleged that he was habitually drinking and gambling and holding out threats to the police. It is, therefore, necessary to scrutinise the evidence of Mohanlal with some care. But after considering the evidence of Mohanlal, corroborated as it is by the circumstances which we have set out earlier, we see no reason to discard his testimony as the learned Judge in the Court below appears to have done. A person who lends himself to be a tool in the hands of the police in a trap may evidently be regarded as a partisan witness and his evidence requires corroboration. But if from the record it appears that the payment of the amount by Mohanlal could not on any other reasonable hypothesis be in satisfaction of some liability of Mohanlal to accused No. 1, in our judgment, an inference inevitably arises that the amount was paid to accused No. 1 as bribe.

But the decision, in our judgment, need not rest merely on the evidence of Mohanlal. Section 4 of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1947, justifies in the circumstances of the case the raising of a presumption which comes to the aid of the prosecution. By sub-s. (1) of s. 4 of the Prevention of Corruption Act it is provided:

"Where in any trial of an offence punishable under s. 161 or s. 165 of the Indian Penal Code it is proved that an accused person has accepted or obtained or has agreed to accept or attempted to obtain, for himself or for any other person, any gratification (other than legal remuneration) or any valuable thing from any person, it shall be presumed unless the contrary is proved that he accepted or obtained, or agreed to accept or obtain, that gratification or that valuable thing, as the case may be, as a motive or reward such as is mentioned in the said s. 161 or as the case may be, without consideration or for a consideration which he knows to be inadequate."

On the plain words of the section, in trials for offences under s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code, from the acceptance or obtaining or from agreeing to accept or attempting to obtain any gratification which is other than legal remuneration or any valuable thing, a presumption arises that the person who received the gratification or agreed to receive or attempted to obtain the same or a valuable thing did it as a motive or reward such as is mentioned in s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code. The ambit of the presumption was recently explained by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in The State of Madras v. A. Vaidya-

"...Therefore where it is proved that a gratification has been accepted, then the presumption shall at once arise under the section. It introduces an exception to the general rule as to the burden of proof in criminal cases and shifts the onus on to the accused. It may here be mentioned that the Legislature has chosen to use the words 'shall presume' and not 'may presume', the former a presumption of law and latter of fact. Both these phrases have been defined in the Indian Evidence Act, no doubt for the purpose of that Act, but s. 4 of the Prevention of Corruption Act is in pari materia with the Evidence Act because it deals with a branch of law of evidence, e.g., presumptions, and therefore should have the same meaning... It is a presumption of law and therefore it is obligatory on the Court to raise this presumption in every case brought under s. 4 of the Prevention of Corruption Act because unlike the case of presumptions of fact, presumptions of law constitute a branch of jurisprudence."

On the findings recorded by us, therefore, a presumption under s. 4(1) of the Prevention of Corruption Act arises that the amount received by accused No. 1 was received as a reward or motive for rendering service to the complainant Mohanlal. But Mr. Daundkar, who appears on behalf of the accused, contends that the amount received by the accused could not be said to be "gratification" other than legal remuneration, and unless the prosecution establishes by evidence that the payment was made and accepted as gratification other than legal remuneration, the presumption does not arise. We are unable to accept the contention of Mr. Daundkar. Accused No. 1 does not even claim that he has rendered any service to Mohanlal for which he was entitled to receive legal remuneration from the latter. Accused No. 1 was a public servant employed as an Executive Magistrate at the relevant time and normally the only legal remuneration which he could earn was his salary from the State for performing his official duties. It has not been suggested that the amount of Rs. 200 received by accused No. 1 was remuneration for the performance of any other duty and to which accused No. 1 was lawfully entitled.

Mr. Daundkar, however, contends that even if the payment received is not legal remuneration it is still not "gratification". The expression "gratification" is not defined in the Prevention of Corruption Act, and s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code states in the third paragraph that the word "gratification" is not restricted to pecuniary gratification, or to gratifications, estimable in money. That, strictly speaking, is not a definition of the expression "gratification". In its dictionary meaning, the expression "gratification", is inclusive of all satisfaction of desire or appetite, and we agree with the view of the Allahabad High Court in *Promod Chander Shekhar v. Rex*², that the expression is used in s. 161, Indian Penal Code, in the sense of anything which gives satisfaction to the recipient. Prima facie, therefore, voluntary acceptance of an amount of money or a valuable thing by a public servant will amount to acceptance of gratification.

Mr. Daundkar on behalf of the accused placed strong reliance upon a judgment of this Court in *State v. Pandurang Lazman Parab*³, in support of his contention that by merely proving that accused No. 1 accepted Rs. 200 given to him by Mohanlal it is not established that he accepted gratification within the meaning of s. 4(1) of the Prevention of Corruption Act. In that case, the complainant had given Rs. 8 to a public servant in pursuance of some arrangement, and the prosecution contended that a presumption under s. 4(1) of the Prevention of Corruption Act that the amount was received by the public servant as gratification arose upon proof of the fact of payment. Mr. Justice Datar in delivering the judgment of the Court observed (p. 813):

"...for the raising of the presumption under s. 4, it is, in our judgment, necessary for the prosecution to prove that not merely a payment of money or in kind was made over to the accused, but it must be further proved by the prosecution that the payment amounted to gratification other than legal remuneration. A payment without more would not, in our view, amount to gratification other than legal remuneration, and if it does not amount to gratification other than legal remuneration, there is no scope for raising the presumption under s. 4 of the Prevention of Corruption Act. Mr. Justice Datar also observed (p. 814):

"...We are disposed to think that acceptance of gratification other than legal remuneration gives rise to a presumption that that gratification was accepted as a motive, while the obtaining of a valuable thing gives rise to a presumption that it was obtained without consideration or for a consideration which the accused knows to be inadequate. Section 4 refers to two offences—one under s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code and s. 165 of the Indian Penal Code. The words 'any gratification' in the section must be read when we are considering the offence under s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code and the words 'any valuable thing' occurring in the section must be read when we are considering the offence under s. 165 of the Indian Penal Code."

If these observations were necessary for the decision in that case, we have respectfully followed them. But, in our view, the learned Judges have observed that they "were satisfied on the evidence that the prosecution failed to prove that amount of Rs. 8 which was got produced by the accused was any gratification other than legal remuneration". In our view the observations do not appear to be strictly necessary. In the expressions "gratification" as used in s. 161 and "valuable thing" as used in s. 165 of the Indian Penal Code are not mutually exclusive in their application. Acceptance of a valuable thing by a public servant may amount to acceptance of gratification within the meaning of s. 161. By s. 161 a public servant agreeing to accept or attempting to obtain gratification other than legal remuneration as a motive or reward for doing or forbearing to do an official act is penalised; by s. 165 mere acceptance by a public servant of a valuable thing without consideration or for consideration which he knows to be inadequate from a person concerned in a proceeding or business transacted by him as a public servant is penalised—the question of motive or reward being not relevant in s. 4 of the Prevention of Corruption Act in a trial of a public servant for an offence under s. 161, when it is proved that the public servant has accepted or attempted to accept any gratification or any valuable thing the law requires the court to raise a presumption, that he has accepted or agreed to accept any gratification as a motive or reward for doing or forbearing to do an official act. The essential ingredients of the offence under s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code are to be established by the prosecution that gratification was accepted or attempted to be accepted or attempted to be obtained as a motive or reward for doing an official act. By enacting s. 4(1) of the Prevention of Corruption Act the Legislature has not only dispensed with the proof of that ingredient in the prosecution, but has imposed upon the person accused, when it is proved that he has accepted or obtained or agreed to accept or attempted to accept any gratification other than legal remuneration, the burden of proving that he has accepted or obtained or agreed to accept or attempted to accept any gratification as a motive or reward for doing an official act. The law requires the court to raise the statutory presumption subject to the limits prescribed in cl. (3) of s. 4 when it is proved that the public servant tried for an offence under s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code has received gratification. If it is proved that the expression "gratification" is used in its primary meaning, the court may see what, beside voluntary acceptance by a public servant of a valuable thing which satisfies his desire or appetite, the prosecution is required to prove before the presumption under s. 4 may arise.

Reliance was also sought to be placed by Mr. Daundkar upon *Vishnu Narayan Kulkarni*⁴. In that case, Mr. Justice Gajendragadkar, in delivering the judgment of the Court observed:

"Before asking the Court to draw the statutory presumption under s.

⁴ (1956) Criminal Appeal No. 1299 of JJ., on September 4, 1956 (U. 1955, decided by Gajendragadkar and Gokhale).

prosecution must prove that money has been paid to a public servant in the first instance. A public servant is nevertheless a private individual and money may be paid to him not in his capacity as a public servant but in his capacity as a private individual. It would be unreasonable to assume that whenever money is paid to a person holding a public office it is paid to him as a public servant. In our opinion, the first essential fact which must be proved by the prosecution is that money has been paid to a public servant. It would also be necessary for the prosecution to show that the money which is paid is other than legal remuneration. In other words, the bare fact of the passing of the money from one hand to another would not raise the presumption if the receiving hand is the hand of a public servant without prima facie evidence to show that the money which has passed is other than legal remuneration; and in proving this part of the case the prosecution would inevitably in every case have to rely to some extent on evidence other than the payment of the money itself."

In that case, the Court was of the view that the evidence of the witnesses for the prosecution was unreliable and the bare fact established before the Court which could not be challenged was the passing of money from a private individual to a public servant, the former being prosecuted for the offence under s. 165A of the Indian Penal Code. It was in the context of those facts that the observations relied upon were made. With respect, we agree with the view that "mere passing of money" from one person to another without more may not establish giving of gratification to a public servant. We may observe that the Legislature has in framing s. 4(1) cast the net very wide. A charge for accepting or agreeing or attempting to obtain a bribe may lightly be made; but the Court cannot on that account, except in cases covered by cl. (3) of s. 4, refuse to raise the presumption. The presumption, it is true, is not one which is required to be rebutted by evidence establishing the defence of the accused beyond reasonable doubt. If the person accused shows a reasonable preponderance of probability enough to support a verdict in a civil action, that the gratification was not as a motive or reward for doing or forbearing to do an official act, the burden may be deemed to be discharged.

Reliance was also sought to be placed upon Dinkar Shankar Valhamare v. The State.⁵ In that case also the learned Judges were not satisfied on the evidence of the prosecution witnesses that it was proved that the accused had accepted any gratification. In that case even on the evidence of the main prosecution witnesses, the accused, who was charged for offences under s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code and s. 5(2) of the Prevention of Corruption Act, had some enforceable claim against the complainant. Mr. Justice Gokhale in delivering the judgment of the Court referred to State v. Pandurang Lazman Parab and also to The State v. Vishnu Narayan Kulkarni, and observed that the complainant's evidence was relied upon by the prosecution for showing that a ten rupee currency note was given to the accused by way of gratification, but that was not reliable evidence. The Court in that case appears to have taken the view that there was no reliable evidence other than the mere payment of money on which reliance could be placed. In our view, however, that case is also distinguishable from the present case.

On the view we take, there is the evidence of payment of Rs. 200 by Mohanlal to accused No. 1 on the night of October 17, 1957. That payment is, in our judgment, gratification; and even if the testimony of Mohanlal as to the previous negotiations and the agreement to pay the amount as consideration for discharging Mohanlal in the Chapter proceedings be regarded as somewhat weak, in our judgment, the prosecution is entitled to rely upon the presumption under s. 4(1) of the Prevention of Corruption Act to re-enforce that evidence. Accused No. 1 has not led any evidence to rebut that statutory presumption, and he must, therefore, be regarded as guilty of the offence under s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code.

Turning to the case of accused No. 2, it is true that he has not received the monies; but his participation in the previous negotiations is amply established by the testimony of Mohanlal which is corroborated by the record of the police department as well as by the evidence of the Prosecuting Jamadar. Accused No. 2 was present at the time when the amount of Rs. 200 was paid by Mohanlal to accused No. 1. It is the case of accused No. 2 that he had asked Mohanlal to go to his father-in-law's house and to pay the amount of Rs. 200. It is true that it was the case of accused No. 2 that that payment was intended to be in repayment of the loan advanced by him to Mohanlal. The presence of accused No. 2 when payment was made and his full knowledge about the circumstances in which the amount was received by accused No. 1 and the relation subsisting between accused No. 1 and accused No. 2 are sufficient evidence, in our judgment, to justify the conclusion that accused No. 2 was privy to the demand for bribe by accused No. 1 and the giving of bribe by Mohanlal to accused No. 1 and that accused No. 2 assisted in the giving of the bribe. We are, therefore, of the view that accused No. 2 is guilty of the offence under s. 165A of the Indian Penal Code.

It is true that this is an appeal against an order of acquittal and there must be strong and compelling reasons which would justify this Court in interfering with the order of acquittal passed by the learned trial Judge. It appears, however, to us that the learned trial Judge ignored the presumption which arises under s. 4(1) of the Prevention of Corruption Act and expressed the view that merely because the defence story was unreliable, even if gratification was proved to be given by Mohanlal to accused No. 1, the prosecution case must fail. That view expressed by the learned Special Judge cannot be sustained. As we have already observed, the point of dispute in this case is limited. The prosecution case is that the amount of Rs. 200 was paid by Mohanlal to accused No. 1 as a bribe in pursuance of an arrangement previously made, whereas it was the case of accused No. 1 and accused No. 2 that the amount paid was in repayment of a loan given to Mohanlal. There was no dispute about the payment actually made; and if the learned Special Judge did not examine the facts proved in the context of the statutory presumption, we are unable to uphold that judgment.

We, therefore, set aside the order of acquittal passed by the learned Special Judge and convict accused No. 1 of the offence under s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code and sentence him to suffer rigorous imprisonment for nine months and to pay a fine of Rs. 500 and in default of payment of fine to suffer rigorous imprisonment for six months in addition. We also convict accused No. 2 for the offence under s. 165A of the Indian Penal Code and sentence him to suffer rigorous imprisonment for six months. Warrants to issue for the arrest of the two accused.

Order of acquittal set aside.

INCOME-TAX REFERENCE.

Before Mr. Justice K. T. Desai.

COMMISSIONER OF INCOME-TAX, BOMBAY CITY I, BOMBAY

MESSRS. CHUGANDAS & CO.*

Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Secs. 25(3), 26, 6, 9, 7—Securities constituting stock-in-trade of assessee firm which had paid tax on its business under Indian Income-tax Act, 1918—Dissolution of assessee firm—Assessee firm claiming benefit under s. 25(3) in respect of interest on securities—Whether assessee firm entitled to such benefit.

The words "income, profits and gains" appearing in s. 25(3) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, refer to the income, profits and gains made in connection with a discontinued business under whatever head the same may have to be shown and they do not refer to any particular head of income, profits and gains with its varying nomenclature and varying content.

The expression business in s. 25(3) of the Act refers to the activity which is styled business. What has to be discontinued is that activity before the section can apply and the tax which is referred to in connection with that activity business refers to the tax charged under any of the heads under which the income, profits and gains made as a result of such activity may have been entered. If such income, profits and gains included interest on securities which constituted the stock-in-trade of that business, the tax paid under the head "Interest on securities" would be covered.

The assessee firm was a dealer in securities and securities constituted the stock-in-trade of its business. It received certain sums as interest on securities during the accounting year 1946 and the accounting period January 1, 1947, to June 30, 1947. The assessee firm was dissolved on June 30, 1947, and as it had paid tax in connection with its business under the Indian Income-tax Act, 1918, it became entitled to the benefit of the provisions of s. 25(3) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922. On the question whether the assessee firm was entitled to the benefit of s. 25(3) of the Act in respect of the interest on securities:—

Held, that the assessee firm was entitled to the benefit of s. 25(3) of the Act in respect of the interest on securities.

MESSRS. CHUGANDAS AND Co. (assessee) was a registered firm dealing in securities and securities constituted the stock-in-trade of its business. The assessee received a sum of Rs. 4,13,992 as interest on securities during the accounting year 1946, the assessment year being 1947-48 and a sum of Rs. 1,01,229 during the accounting period January 1, 1947, to June 30, 1947, the assessment year being 1948-49, also as interest on securities. The firm was dissolved on June 30, 1947. The assessee claimed benefit of the provisions of s. 25(3) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, and disputes arose between the assessee and the Income-tax Department as to whether any exemption could be claimed in respect of interest on securities. The Department contended that interest on the securities which were the stock-in-trade of the assessee had to be assessed under s. 8 of the Act and could not form part of the business income which was assessable under s. 10, and, therefore, it could not, for any other purpose including that of exemption under s. 25(3), be regarded as income, profits or gains of the assessee's business. The Tribunal by a majority decision in favour of the assessee. The following question of law was referred to the High Court:—

"Whether on the facts and circumstances of the case interest received held by the assessee formed part of the assessee's business income for the purpose of claiming relief under s. 25(3) of the Indian Income-tax Act?"

The reference was heard by Tendolkar and S. T. Desai JJ. who followed the decision of the Supreme Court in United Commercial Bank Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, West Bengal, reframed the question as follows:—

"Whether the assessee is entitled to the benefit of s. 25(3) in respect of interest on securities?"

There was a difference of opinion between Tendolkar J. and S. T. Desai J. as regards the answer to be given to the above question. The following are their Lordships' judgments delivered on September 23, 1957:—

TENDOLKAR J. The question referred to this Court upon this reference was:—

"Whether on the facts and circumstances of the case interest received held by the assessee formed part of the assessee's business income for the purpose of claiming relief under section 25(3) of the Indian Income-tax Act?"

The facts necessary for the purpose of determining this question were:—The assessee held securities as his stock-in-trade and he received interest on these securities in the assessment years 1947-48 and 1948-49 in the sum of Rs. 4,13,992 and Rs. 1,01,229 respectively. It was held by the authorities that the assessee was entitled to the benefit of the provisions of s. 25(3), and if, therefore, interest on securities was within the scope of the benefit, this interest would not be taxable. If, on the other hand, interest on securities is outside the scope of the benefit conferred by s. 25(3), it would have to be taxed. The matter was dealt with by the Tribunal in two different views—one taking the view that interest on securities was taxable under s. 10 and another that it was taxable under s. 8. The matter was, therefore, referred to the President, who took the view that interest on securities was taxable under s. 10 and not under s. 8. One of the Members of the Tribunal, having held that interest on securities was taxable under s. 10, also held that it was exempt from taxation under s. 8. Out of these orders of the Tribunal the present reference arises.

Since the decision of the Tribunal, their Lordships of the Supreme Court in *United Commercial Bank Ltd. v. Commr. of Inc.-tax*¹, decided in 1957, have held that income from interest on securities which are stock-in-trade of a business is taxable under s. 8 and not under s. 10. Therefore, the question as framed does not now bring out the real controversy between the parties. The real dispute is whether, even if interest on securities is taxable under s. 8, such income is entitled to the benefit conferred by s. 25(3). We would, therefore, reframe the question as follows:—

"Whether the assessee is entitled to the benefit of section 25(3) in respect of interest on securities?"

Now, turning next to s. 25(3), it is in the following terms:—

"Where any business, profession or vocation on which tax was at any time levied under the provisions of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1918 (VII of 1918), is discontinued, then, unless there has been a succession by virtue of which the provisions of section (4) have been rendered applicable, no tax shall be payable in respect of the income, profits and gains of the period between the end of the previous year and the date of such discontinuance, and the assessee may further claim that the income, profits and gains of the previous year shall be deemed to have been the income, profits and gains of the said period. Where any such claim is made, an assessment shall be made on the basis of the income, profits and gains of the said period, and if an assessment has already been paid in respect of the income, profits and gains of the tion shall be jointly and severally liable to assessment in respect of the income, profits and gains of the firm or association. Here again, obviously, the liability is in respect of the income of the firm or association which was liable to tax under whatever head the tax came to be charged. But in the case of both these sections, this result is brought about not by the mere words "income, profits and gains", but by the context in which they are used; and it does not follow therefrom that wherever the words "income, profits and gains" of a business, profession or vocation are referred to, they necessarily mean income, profits and gains under whichever head they are taxed.

Then Mr. Palkhivala contends that the language employed in s. 25(3) does not import any head at all; he says that it only deals with chargeability. That, no doubt, is true and the condition precedent to earning the exemption under s. 25(3) undoubtedly is that a business, profession or vocation was charged under the provisions of the Income-tax Act, 1918. Now, tax is charged under the income-tax law on income and not on the source of income. Business, profession or vocation is the source of income and not income itself; but since it is necessary to determine for the purposes of this sub-section what is the source of income that was taxed, that source must be the source of income falling within one of the classes enumerated in s. 5 of the Indian Income-tax Act of 1918. Class (i) is "salaries" and the source, of course, is service; class (ii) is "Interest on securities" and the source is securities; class (iii) is "Income derived from house property" and the source is house property; class (iv) is "Income derived from business" and the source is business; class (v) is "Professional earnings" and the source is profession, which includes a vocation by reason of s. 10, sub-s. (1), of the Act, which provides that the tax under the head "Professional earnings" shall be in respect of the profits of any profession or vocation; and class (vi) is "Income derived from other sources" and the source is obviously other sources. Therefore, if one were to determine the source of income on which tax is chargeable—and that is what one is required to do for the purpose of ascertaining whether the condition precedent to exemption being obtained under s. 25(3) is satisfied—then clearly tax is charged on business only under class (iv) and on profession or vocation under class (v) enumerated in s. 5 of the Act. This appears to me to lead to a very important consequence. Since the object of s. 25(3) was indisputably to grant relief in respect of double taxation of the same income, the relief could only be in respect of the same class of income on which tax was charged twice, that is, income charged under the corresponding "classes" which have been renamed "heads" in s. 6 of the Act of 1922; and the corresponding heads in s. 6 of the Act of 1922 were (iv) business and (v) professional earnings. Therefore, when s. 25, sub-s. (3) provides that no tax shall be paid in respect of the income, profits and gains of business, profession or vocation, it appears to me that it can only mean that no tax shall be payable on income falling under the two heads which I have just referred to.

Mr. Palkhivala next urges that the exemption attaches to business and is not conferred on an assessee; and from this he seeks to argue that whatever the nature of the income of that business and under whichever head it is taxed, it attracts the exemption. Now, in a sense, it is true that s. 25(3) appears to confer an exemption on a business, profession or vocation; but this must be understood in the context of income-tax law. A business, profession or vocation is not the unit of assessment under income-tax law. The tax is charged on income, profits and gains of the previous year under s. 3 of the Act of 1922; but the Legislature had to refer to a business, profession or vocation on which tax was charged under the 1918 Act because the object was that when such business was discontinued, whosoever was the owner of that business should get the benefit of the exemption under s. 25, sub-s. (3). Moreover, when we come to that part of the sub-section which deals with the exemption, it is quite clear that the business does not attract the exemption, but it is "income, profits and gains" of any business, profession or vocation that attracts the exemption.

The words are not that the business, profession or vocation shall not be charged; but the words are that the income, profits and gains, admittedly of any business, profession or vocation, shall not be charged.

Then Mr. Palkhivala urges that in point of fact there was no such head of income under the 1922 Act when it was enacted as "Income, profits and gains of a business, profession or vocation." Now, the actual heads in the 1922 Act were (iv) Business and (v) Professional earnings. But when one turned to s. 10(1) of the Act, it provided that the tax under the head "Business" shall be payable in respect of the profits or gains of any business, and s. 11, sub-s. (1) provided that the tax under the head "Professional earnings" shall be payable in respect of the profits or gains of any profession or vocation. Therefore, there was, no doubt, not one head, but there were two heads, which may, as a combined effect of the sections that I have referred to, be said to be, profits or gains of a business and profits or gains of any profession or vocation. These two heads were only combined into one by the Income-tax (Amendment) Act of 1939, and s. 6, sub-s. (iv) contains the combined head "Profits and gains of business, profession or vocation." The question as to whether there is one head or two heads appears to me to be of no significance in determining whether what is sought to be exempted under s. 25(3) is income falling under that head or heads. But then Mr. Palkhivala argues that, in any event, the head is "Profits and gains of business, profession or vocation" and not "Income, profits and gains of business, profession or vocation." This argument appears to me to have no substance in it, because any one familiar with the history of income-tax law knows that the words "income, profits and gains" do not in any manner add to what is taxable under the head "income". In *Income-tax Commissioner v. Shaw Wallace & Co.*² Sir George Lowndes, delivering the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council, pointed out (p. 212):—

"The object of the Indian Act is to tax 'Income', a term which it does not define. It is expanded, no doubt, into 'income profits and gains', but the expansion is more a matter of words than of substance."

Therefore, it seems to me futile to draw a distinction between "profits and gains" and "income, profits and gains". But, in any event, so far as s. 25(3) is concerned, there is absolutely no doubt that the words "income, profits and gains" are used in relation to business, profession or vocation as synonymous with profits and gains only. This appears from a proviso to sub-ss. (3) and (4) which is in these words:—

"Provided that sub-sections (3) and (4) shall not apply—

(a) to super-tax except where the income, profits and gains of the business, profession or vocation were assessed to super-tax for the first time either for the year beginning on the 1st day of April, 1920, or for the year beginning on the 1st day of April, 1921;..."

Therefore, it is clear that the words "income, profits and gains" are used in this section as meaning nothing more or less than the profits and gains of a business which are liable to super-tax. This view was taken in a decision of this Court, to which I was a party, in *Ambalal Himatlal v. Commr. of Inc.-tax*³. We were there dealing with s. 25, sub-s. (4), of the Indian Income-tax Act and held that the expression "income, profits and gains" in sub-s. (4) meant the profits and gains from the business, profession or vocation contemplated by s. 10 and nothing else. Chagla, C.J., in his judgment observes (p. 285):—

"...What the Legislature intended by using the expression 'income, profits and gains' was the profits and gains of the business or profession contemplated by section 10 and not the total income of the assessee..."

In the same judgment, in an earlier passage, the learned Chief Justice observes (p. 285):—

"...It is also clear that no relief was intended to be given by the Legislature to a person who had paid tax on his property or on dividends received by him on shares and securities."

Therefore, in my opinion, the attempt to include anything in the expression "income, profits and gains" in s. 25(3) which is outside the scope of the words "profits and gains of business, profession or vocation" must fail.

Having dealt with the main objections of Mr. Palkhivala to the construction canvassed by Mr. Joshi, I must also point out what appears to me to be a matter of very great importance. Keeping in mind the fact that the Legislature set out to grant relief in respect of what I might describe as double taxation of the same income, in respect of not all but some only of such income, is it reasonable to assume that having a readymade classification of all taxable income under the income-tax law, the Legislature would proceed to invent a new classification for the purpose of such exemption? In my opinion, it would be reasonable to assume that the classification would be adhered to and the exemption conferred on any class or classes of that income. However, it appears to me that, strictly speaking, it would be more correct to say that the "income, profits and gains" of a business, profession or vocation which is exempt under s. 25(3) is such income as understood in the Income-tax Act rather than say that it is income under the head "Profits and gains of business, profession or vocation". No doubt this would bring in the head of income but it would also bring in general exemptions such as donations to charity under s. 15B.

The primary principle of construction of any statute is that the language used in it must be interpreted and understood in the context of that Act, and when it has a meaning in that context which happens to be different from its normal meaning, or its commercial meaning, or its legal meaning in other contexts, the meaning in the context of the Act must not be discarded unless there are compelling reasons for doing so; and, therefore, one would not be justified in discarding the meaning of the expression "income, profits and gains" of a "business, profession or vocation" in the context of the Income-tax Act and reading those words in their popular, commercial or legal sense, except for compelling reasons. There are not only no compelling reasons in this case, but, on the contrary, there are compelling reasons for adhering to the meaning of that expression in the Income-tax Act. Now, in the first instance, the words used are "income, profits and gains" and I must confess that I am not aware of any popular meaning of this combined expression, nor of a commercial or legal meaning of that expression, outside income-tax law. It is an expression that is used exclusively in income-tax law; and, therefore, to start with, it can have no meaning either in the popular or the commercial sense or any other legal meaning outside income-tax law. It is only if the words were treated as synonymous with profits of a business, profession or vocation that the word "profits" may have a popular, commercial or legal meaning different from the meaning in the context of the income-tax law. It must be noted that the profits of a business, profession or vocation have both a narrower and a wider meaning under the income-tax law than they have in the popular, commercial or legal sense outside the income-tax law; and this may be illustrated only by a few examples although they can be multiplied manifold. It has a narrower meaning in income-tax law in the sense of reducing profits brought to tax when, for example, s. 10, sub-s. (2)(vi)(b) allows a development rebate to be deducted or when various kinds of depreciation allowance permissible under the Act are deducted from profits in addition to ordinary depreciation which would be taken into account in ascertaining profits in a commercial sense. In addition to ordinary depreciation, the Act allows extra depreciation for double or multiple shift under r. 8, initial depreciation under s. 10(2)(vi)(b) and extra depreciation allowance for the first five years in respect of new buildings, machinery and plant under s. 10(2)(vi)(a). Neither the development rebate nor these items of depreciation will be taken into account in determining commercial or legal profits. Similarly, if the business, profession or vocation has immovable property or interest on securities, which were its stock-in-trade, they will be taxed as separate heads of income and not as profits of the business although the income from property and interest on securities would be taken into account in arriving at the profits in a commercial sense. These are illustrations of cases where the profits in the income-tax sense of a business, profession or vocation are less than the profits in the commercial or legal sense.

Turning next to a few illustrations where the profits under the income-tax law are larger than the profits in the commercial sense or the legal sense, expenses incurred by a business may be disallowed in the computation of income for various reasons. For example, if a bonus was paid to the employees, it would be allowed under s. 10(2)(x) only to the extent to which it is reasonable and the rest will be disallowed; whilst in the commercial sense the entire bonus would be allowed. Similarly, an expenditure by a business may, in the commercial sense be treated as revenue expenditure and debited against the profits, whilst the income-tax authorities may treat it as capital expenditure and not allow its debit against the profits. Similarly, bad debts, although they would be debited against commercial profits, may be disallowed in the accounting year by the income-tax authorities if the conditions for the allowance of bad debts set out in the Act are not satisfied. Therefore, it is clear that there is a great diversity between the meaning of profits of a business, profession or vocation under the Income-tax Act and the popular, commercial or legal meaning of profits outside the Income-tax Act. If Mr. Palkhivala's argument were to be accepted and the word "profits" in s. 25(3) were to be interpreted in the commercial or legal sense, it would lead to the result that when the profits brought to tax in the Income-tax Act exceed commercial profits, exemption can only be claimed with regard to that part of the taxed profits which are commercial profits. This, surely, could not have been intended by s. 25(3). If the profits brought to tax are less than profits in the commercial sense, the exemption would comprise a larger amount of profits than the amount brought to tax—a result which the Legislature could not have contemplated, because no Act can seek to provide for an exemption higher than the taxable profit. When this position was realised in the course of arguments, Mr. Palkhivala modified his first argument that the profits should be interpreted to mean commercial or legal profits in this manner. He submitted that one should determine whether a particular income was profits in the commercial sense; having determined it, such income should be computed under the Act; and, lastly, the income so computed should be exempted from tax. Therefore, the process of determining what is exempt from tax is at the first stage to proceed on the footing that commercial profits were involved, and at the second stage to proceed on the footing that profits under the Act were involved. How or why the process is to be split up in this manner I am quite unable to see; and there can be no warrant, in my view, for the suggestion that merely for the initial purpose of determining whether any income is profits of a business, profession or vocation the commercial sense or the legal sense should be taken into account and for all other purposes the sense under the income-tax law.

Then Mr. Palkhivala drew attention to the iniquity or injustice that may be involved in the view that Mr. Joshi has canvassed. He says that if we adopt that view, what was exempt from tax at any given time may attract tax at another time if the Legislature chooses to alter the law. Taking one example, Mr. Palkhivala said that income from dividends from shares which were the stock-in-trade of a business were held to be taxable by a Division Bench of this Court in *Commr. of Inc.-Tax v. Ahmuty & Co. Ltd.*⁴ under the head "Profits and gains of business" and, therefore, such income would have been exempt from tax under s. 25(3) so long as the law remained as laid down in that case. But by the Finance Act of 1955 Parliament has amended s. 12, which is the residuary section, and specifically provided in s. 12, sub-s. (1A) that dividends shall be taxable under the head "Other sources"; with the result that thereafter, for the application of s. 25(3) income from dividends, although the shares may be held by the business as its stock-in-trade, cannot be exempted under s. 25(3) if the view canvassed for by Mr. Joshi is adopted. This, no doubt, is true; but s. 25(3) does not guarantee any fixity as to what shall be included, at the time when there is a discontinuance of business, in the income, profits and gains of a business, profession or vocation, or what shall be excluded therefrom. Parliament has the right so to amend the law as to include or to exclude from tax any portion of the income of an assessee; and no argument on the basis of any iniquity involved in such process can be called in aid to induce me to interpret the section I have to consider in the manner in which Mr. Palkhivala wants us to interpret it.

Then Mr. Palkhivala contends that ss. 7 to 12 are computation sections only, and since they are computation sections, they do not help to determine whether the income computed under them was or was not from a particular source. In other words, the argument is that the income from a business, profession or vocation may be computed under different heads and yet remains the income of the business, profession or vocation. There has been a very strenuous argument before us as to whether in United Commercial Bank Ltd. v. Commr. of Inc.-tax, their Lordships of the Supreme Court have accepted the view which had been taken in *Kamdar In re*⁵ that these are computation sections or have taken the view that they are charging sections as well, Mr. Palkhivala contending that their Lordships have held that these are computation sections only and Mr. Joshi equally strenuously contending that their Lordships have held that they are not only computation sections, but taxing sections. I do not consider it necessary for the purposes of this reference to determine what view their Lordships have adopted, because I do not consider that any argument can legitimately turn on the question before us on the basis of whether these sections are computation sections or charging sections. Even assuming that they are computation sections, although it may be true to say that the income of a business, profession or vocation as understood in the popular, commercial or legal sense outside the context of income-tax law may be computed under different heads and charged to tax, yet the real question that we have to determine is whether the exemption under s. 25(3) is granted to what are profits in a commercial or legal sense or what are income, profits and gains in the sense in which those words are used in the context of the Income-tax Act.

There is one direct authority of the Allahabad High Court which lays down that s. 25(3) confers a benefit in respect of the income, profits and gains which fall under the head "profits and gains of business, profession or vocation" and that is the case of *Gopi Mohan and Sons v. Commr. of Inc. tax, U.P. & C.P.*⁶ In that case, the assessee had claimed exemption in respect of its income from property and the income-tax authorities had held that s. 25(3) did not apply so as to confer any such exemption. In upholding this view of the income-tax authorities, their Lordships, in their judgment, observe (p. 223):—

"...the matter is placed beyond any doubt, if reference is made to Section 6 and the following sections of the Income-tax Act. That section divides the various sources of income chargeable under the Income-tax Act under five heads enumerated in that section. 'Income from property' has been described separately and put under a different head from 'profits and gains of business, profession or vocation'. The method of computation of income from property has been laid down in Section 9, while that for the computation of income from business, profession or vocation has been described in Section 10. From this it is clear that the expression 'business, profession or vocation' used in Section 25(3) relates to that head of income, which has been dealt with in Section 10, and is quite distinct from the head of 'Income from property', which has been mentioned in Section 9."

With this view I am in respectful agreement. If the view that Mr. Palkhi-vala has canvassed before us was adopted in respect of income from property and interest on securities, which may well be the income of a business, profession or vocation, the person who carries on the business, profession or vocation would be placed in a better position than other assesses who have income falling under the heads "income from property" or "interest on securities", because the former class would earn an exemption under s. 25(3) while the latter will not. No doubt, one cannot always look for logic or reason in income-tax legislation; but this anomalous position that would arise if we were to accede to the arguments of Mr. Palkhivala is only one additional ground for holding that the true interpretation of s. 25(3) is that income, profits and gains of a business, profession or vocation which are exempt from tax under s. 25(3) are income, profits and gains as understood in the Income-tax Act and not as understood in common parlance or in the commercial sense or in the legal sense outside the context of income-tax law.

Lastly, it was argued by Mr. Palkhivala that since we are dealing with an exemption clause, if there was any doubt as to the true interpretation of the exemption clause, the exemption should be liberally construed provided no violence is done to the language employed in the section. This, no doubt, has been held to be the proper canon of construction by the Calcutta High Court in *Commr. of Agri. Inc.-tax v. Raja Jagadish Chandra Deo*⁷, and by the Patna High Court in *Sir Kameshwar Singh v. Commr. of Inc.-tax*⁸, and we certainly accept that canon of construction. But I am not satisfied that the interpretation that Mr. Palkhivala canvasses for on this reference is a liberal construction at all. In the case of the present assessee, it would lead undoubtedly in benefiting him; but that is because this is a case in which the commercial profits or the legal profits are higher than the profits as understood in the Income-tax Act. But, as I have pointed out earlier in my judgment, there will be numerous cases in which the profits of a business, profession or vocation brought to tax will be higher than the commercial or legal profits, and in those cases the construction canvassed for by Mr. Palkhivala would only yield an exemption in respect of part of the income brought to tax and not the whole. Moreover, in the view that I take of the language of s. 25(3), I am not prepared to hold that without violence to that language the section can be construed in the manner in which Mr. Palkhivala wants us to construe it.

The result, therefore, is that, in my opinion, the question that we have re-framed should be answered in the negative.

S. T. DESAI J. I had the advantage of reading the judgment just delivered by my learned brother Tendolkar J. and have given it careful consideration. It is with the greatest reluctance that I am unable to agree with his view. This reference raises a rather important and interesting question as to the extent of relief that an assessee can claim where a business charged under the Income-tax Act, 1918, is discontinued. The point for determination depends wholly upon the true meaning and import of s. 25(3) of the Income-tax Act of 1922 to be gathered in the light of the general principles and rules of interpretation favoured by the Court in examining fiscal legislation.

The relevant facts are not in controversy and lie in a narrow compass though the history of the case is somewhat chequered. The assessee is a dealer in securities and received Rs. 4,13,992 in the assessment year 1947-48 and Rs. 1,01,229 in the assessment year 1948-49 as interest on securities. The securities on which interest was received, it is common ground, were the stock-in-trade of the assessee's business in securities. The assessee claimed benefit of the provisions of s. 25(3) which deals with assessment in case of discontinued business and the Department held that the assessee was entitled to claim exemption under those provisions. Dispute, however, arose whether any exemption could be claimed in respect of interest on securities, and the question that fell for determination was whether interest on the securities which were the amount payable on the basis of such assessment, a refund shall be given of the difference."

In order to appreciate what was sought to be done by this sub-section, one must look at the history of income-tax law. Under the Income-tax Act of 1918, what was subjected to tax was the income of the current year under s. 14, sub-s. (2) of that Act. This basis of taxation was altered by the Income-tax Act, 1922, which provided by s. 8 thereof that the charge shall be in respect of income of the previous year. This led to the result that for the accounting year 1921-22 the income had already been subjected to tax under the Act of 1918, but was again subjected to tax under the Act of 1922 as the income for the assessment year 1922-23, the year 1921-22 being the previous year for the assessment year 1922-23. Therefore, the income of a single year had been subjected to tax twice over; and the object of s. 25, sub-s. (3) was to give relief in respect of this double taxation of the same income to the limited extent that the section prescribes. That relief took the form in s. 25, sub-s. (3) of providing that where a business, profession or vocation was discontinued no tax shall be payable in respect of the period between the end of the previous year and the date of such discontinuance, or, at the option of the assessee, the year previous to such period. But in order to earn this exemption, the essential first condition was:

"Where any business, profession or vocation on which tax was at any time charged under the provisions of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1918 (VII of 1918), is discontinued."

Therefore, the exemption could only be claimed provided there was any business, profession or vocation subjected to tax under the Income-tax Act of 1918 and not otherwise. It follows, therefore, that in so far as a tax was levied under the Act of 1918 which did not fall within the category of a tax charged on any business, profession or vocation, no relief was granted. Under the Act of 1918, s. 5 set out the classes of income chargeable to income-tax; they were: (i) salaries; (ii) interest on securities; (iii) income derived from house property; (iv) income derived from business; (v) professional earnings; and (vi) income derived from other sources. Prima facie, therefore, if any tax had been paid under (i), (ii), (iii), or (vi) of s. 5 of the Income-tax Act, 1918, no relief was granted by s. 25(3). Thus, for example, a person who had paid tax on property which was leviable under s. 8 of the Act of 1918, had to pay tax twice over and got no relief in respect thereof. This by itself is not disputed by Mr. Palkhivala for the assessee; but what is contended is that when s. 25(3) talks of business, profession or vocation being subjected to tax under the Act of 1918, it does not relate only to the tax levied under the heads "(iv) income derived from business" and "(v) professional earnings", but it also includes any other income of the business, profession or vocation in the commercial sense or in the legal sense, except in the context of the Indian Income-tax Act, although it may be subjected to tax under some other head. The merits of this suggested interpretation of the condition precedent to the exemption being earned under s. 25(3) I will later consider in another context, but they do not fall to be considered for the purpose of determining whether the condition precedent is satisfied in this case because it is common ground on this reference that the assessee carried on a business on which tax was charged under the provisions of the Income-tax Act of 1918. But the rival contentions with which we are concerned are in relation to the nature of the income that is exempted from tax. What is exempted from tax is "income, profits and gains" of the period mentioned in the sub-section; but obviously these income, profits and gains are of the business, profession or vocation which had been charged to tax under the Income-tax Act of 1918. Mr. Joshi for the Department urges that the words "income, profits and gains" of a business, profession or vocation in this sub-section only include, in the context of income-tax law, income taxed under the head of income, which is "profits and gains of a business, profession or vocation"; whilst Mr. Palkhivala for the assessee contends that the income, profits and gains of a business, profession or vocation include within their scope not only income, profits and gains subjected to tax under the head "profits of a business, profession or vocation", but the income, profits and gains of a business, profession or vocation under whichever head taxed, if they are in fact the profits of the business, profession or vocation in the commercial sense or in the legal sense outside the context of the Income-tax Act. In other words, Mr. Palkhivala's contention is that although interest on securities may be taxed under a separate head, namely, interest on securities under s. 8, yet from the commercial point of view they are profits of the business if the securities were the stock-in-trade of the business. Even from a legal standpoint, except in the context of the Income-tax Act, the profits of a business would comprise the interest on securities held by the business as its stock-in-trade; and if there was, for example, an agreement to share the profits of the business, there can be little doubt that for the purposes of such an agreement the profits in a legal sense would include interest on securities. Similarly, if a business possessed immoveable property, it would be taxed on its profits, not under s. 10, but under s. 9. Nonetheless if the profits of that business had to be ascertained in a Court of law, undoubtedly the income from property would necessarily have to be taken into account, and so would that income be taken into account even in the commercial sense for ascertaining those profits. We have to consider which of these two rival contentions is the correct one.

Mr. Palkhivala has attempted to counter the argument of Mr. Joshi, that the income, profits and gains of a business, profession or vocation which are exempt under s. 25(3) are the income, profits and gains falling under the head "Profits and gains of business, profession or vocation" being head (iv) in s. 6 of the Income-tax Act, on various grounds. His first contention is that no head is referred to in s. 25(3) at all, and that no doubt is true; but it does not follow therefrom that the words "income, profits and gains" of a business, profession or vocation do not import into the section the concept of income, profits and gains under the head "Profits and gains of business, profession or vocation". But then Mr. Palkhivala argues that whenever the Legislature desired to refer to a head of income, it has in terms so stated, and he drew our attention to a string of sections in the Indian Income-tax Act strewn all over the Act where the expression used is "under the head..." whichever the head may be. To take only one or two examples, in s. 4, sub-s. (3), cls. (xi) and (xii), there is a reference to "income chargeable under the head 'salaries'" and "income chargeable under the head 'Income from property'" respectively; and his argument is that if the Legislature intended that income under the head "profits and gains of business, profession or vocation" was to be exempted from tax under s. 25(3), the Legislature would have used the words "under the head". No doubt, no difficulty would have arisen if such words were used; but it does not appear to me to follow, from the fact that such words are not used in s. 25(3), that if the context so requires, the words used cannot be interpreted so as to be applicable to the profits and gains of business, profession or vocation falling within that head of income under s. 6. Similarly, attention was also drawn to s. 26, sub-s. (2) and s. 44. Section 26, sub-s. (2) deals with succession to a business and provides that where a person carrying on any business, profession or vocation has been succeeded in such capacity by another person, in respect of the income, profits and gains of the previous year the taxability shall be apportioned between both the persons. Here obviously the words "the income, profits and gains of the previous year" refer to the entire liability of the person carrying on any business, profession or vocation to whom there has been a succession; and, obviously, they comprise not only tax payable by such person under the head "Profits and gains of business, profession or vocation", but any other income of the business, profession or vocation which is taxable under another head, such as property or interest on securities. The same appears to be the position under s. 44 which deals with the liability in case of a discontinued firm or association, which provides that upon discontinuance or dissolution partners of the firm or members of the associastock-in-trade of the assessee was the income of the assessee's business under s. 25(3). The contention of the Department was that interest on the securities, which were the stock-in-trade of the assessee, had none the less to be assessed under s. 8 and, therefore, could not form part of the business income which was assessable under s. 10. And if it was not income assessable under the head of "profits and gains of business" under s. 10, it could not for any other purpose, including that of exemption under s. 25(3), be regarded as the income, profits or gains of the assessee's business. In support of this proposition reliance was placed on s. 6 which enumerates the various heads of income. The argument was that interest on securities and profits and gains of business had been given separate heads under s. 6, and since interest on securities had been given a specific head, interest on securities even though they may be the stock-in-trade of the assessee could not be regarded as the income of the assessee's business under s. 25(3). On the other hand the contention of the assessee was that when securities were held as stock-in-trade of the assessee's business interest on those securities could be considered as profits and gains of the business under s. 10. The further contention was that even if the income from securities held as stock-in-trade could be assessed under a separate head by virtue of s. 6(ii) and s. 8 as urged on behalf of the Department, that distinction had no bearing when a question arose under s. 25 as to what was the income, profits and gains of the discontinued business of an assessee. The Income-tax Officer and the Appellate Assistant Commissioner decided against the assessee.

When the case was carried in appeal to the Tribunal there was a difference of opinion between the two members constituting the Bench. The Accountant Member held that in the case of the assessee the receipt of interest formed part of the revenue receipt of the assessee's business in securities and fell under s. 10. He also stated that even if it may be held for any reason that interest on such securities had to be treated as income assessable under s. 8 it would still form part of the income, profits and gains of the assessee's business under s. 25(3) and the assessee was entitled to the relief claimed by him. The judicial Member took a contrary view on both the points. There was a Reference to the President of the Tribunal and the President found himself in agreement with the conclusion reached by the Accountant Member with the result that the case was decided in favour of the assessee.

The Commissioner of Income-tax required the Tribunal to state a case to this Court, and the following question of law has been referred to this Court for its decision:

"Whether on the facts and circumstances of the case interest received on securities held by the assessee formed part of the assessee's business income for the purpose of claiming relief under section 25(3) of the Indian Income-tax Act?"

Before proceeding to give an outline of the arguments very ably presented before us by learned counsel on both the sides I may digress a little and mention that by the time this Reference came up for hearing before my Lord the Chief Justice and my learned brother Tendolkar J. an appeal had been preferred to the Supreme Court in the case of United Commercial Bank Ltd. v. Commr. of Inc.-tax,¹ and the question raised in that appeal was as to the interpretation of ss. 8, 10 and 24(3) of the Act. In view of that appeal, the hearing of the present Reference was directed to stand over as one of the points arising for determination on this Reference related to the effect of ss 8 and 10. That appeal was decided by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in May 1957 and the view there taken is that

"both on precedent and on a proper construction, the source of income 'interest on securities' would fall under s. 8 and not under s. 10 as it is specifically made chargeable under the distinct head 'interest on securities' falling under s. 8 of the Act and cannot be brought under a different head even though the securities are held as a trading asset in the course of its business by a banker".

Since I have already digressed I may also add that learned counsel on either side have relied on various observations of their Lordships in this judgment in support of their arguments. Of this more hereafter. I may, however, here observe that the precise point which now remains for our decision did not arise for their Lordships' consideration. But there are general observations made in that judgment which, as I read them, do lend some support to the present contention of the assessee. True they are not made in the selfsame context and they cannot be read as directly leading to any conclusion we are asked to reach. The question of the true meaning and import of s. 25(3) remains to be decided by us and I shall refer to those general observations later on in my judgment as pointers and as instructive of the true approach to the question.

It has been contended before us by Mr. Palkhivala, learned counsel for the assessee, that the case clearly falls under s. 25(3). It is said that the assessee's business had admittedly been charged under the Act of 1918 and admittedly that business is discontinued and, therefore, no tax is payable in respect of the income, profits and gains of that business for the period between the end of the previous year and the date of such discontinuance. Briefly stated the argument is that on a plain reading of the section the exemption granted by s. 25(3) must extend to the whole income, profits and gains of the assessee's discontinued business and no notions of the mode or method adopted for the purpose of charging income-tax under the various heads of income enumerated in s. 6 can be introduced in this matter of exemption. The crux of the argument is that there is no reference whatever in s. 25 to the heads of income chargeable to income-tax and there is no warrant for introducing in this section the concept whereby distinction has for certain purposes to be made between interest on security on one hand and profits and gains of business on the other. It is argued that it is common ground that the securities, on which interest was received, were stock-in-trade of the assessee's business in securities, and that income neither in a commercial nor legal nor taxing sense ceased to be the income of the assessee's business simply because the total income of that business is computed under different heads. One principle on which the argument is grounded is that income-tax is only one tax and there are not as many taxes as there are heads of income. It was added in this context that an examination of all the provisions of the Act shows that wherever any 'head' of income is contemplated the Legislature has been at pains to use that expression and our attention was drawn to a number of sections and it was pointed out how that expression has been consistently and uniformly used throughout the Act. The deliberate non-user of that or any similar expression in s. 25, it has been said, goes to show that the exemption does not attach to any head of income as contended by the other side but embraces the total income of the assessee's business. The argument ran that the section does not say "Where the profits or gains of any business... on which tax was at any time charged" but explicitly states "where any business... on which tax was at any time charged." Stress has been laid on the latter expression which are the initial words of sub-s. (3) and it has been urged that there was nothing to prevent the Legislature from using the former expression or to mention the expression 'head' if the intention was to restrict the exemption in the manner contended by the Department. Reliance is placed on the expressions "Business, profession or vocation" in the context of "income, profits and gains" used in ss. 44 and 26A of the Act and it is contended that the identical expression should receive the same meaning in s. 25(3) as in the other two sections. It has been pointed out that in case of ss. 44 and 26A it is obviously not possible to give any restricted meaning to those expressions. Reliance is also placed by counsel on the rule of construction that an exemption in a taxing statute must be liberally construed.

It is contended on the other hand by Mr. G. N. Joshi, learned counsel appearing for the Revenue, that the crucial words are the initial words of sub-s. (3)

“where any business profession or vocation on which tax was at any time charged under the provisions of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1918” and that these words must be construed as referable to the head of “profits and gains of business, profession or vocation” mentioned in s. 6(4) and dealt with in s. 10. Reliance is also placed on the language of s. 10(1):

“The tax shall be payable by an assessee under the head ‘profits and gains of business, profession or vocation’ in respect of the profit or gains of any business profession or vocation carried on by him” and s. 8:

“The tax shall be payable by an assessee under the head ‘Interest on securities’ in respect of interest receivable by him on any security...”

The contention is that the Supreme Court has now laid down in United Commercial Bank Ltd. v. Commr. of Inc.-tax, that the source of income “interest on securities” would fall under s. 8 and not under s. 10 as it is specifically chargeable under the distinct head “interest on securities” falling under s. 8 of the Act and cannot be brought under s. 10 even though the securities are held as a trading asset in the course of his business by a banker. The arch-stone of the whole argument is that the true meaning of the initial words in s. 25(3) quoted above is that the income profits and gains to which exemption is granted is only that which strictly falls under the head of “profits and gains of business” chargeable under s. 10 and cannot include any income made by the assessee’s business from interest on securities which is chargeable under s. 8. It is urged that you must think of the heads enumerated in s. 6 when you interpret s. 25(3). It is said that interest on securities has to be separately treated and that ss. 8 and 10 must be read as charging sections. It is also stressed that you must go to the language of the Act of 1918 and consider the scheme of that enactment. The section must be construed not in a popular sense but in a technical sense by confining and restricting the meaning of the initial words “Any business” in their context of “income profits and gains” in the sense in which s. 10 requires “profits and gains” of a business to be understood.

I shall at the outset permit myself to make a few general observations since much has been said at the Bar about the popular meaning of words, about commercial and legal connotation of terms and about technical expressions. The words I have to construe must, of course, be understood in their legal sense and technical words where I find them must have their technical sense attributed to them and not their popular sense—uti loquitur vulgus. The principle is of cogency when words in question represent legal conceptions. A rule firmly established is that the Court should avail itself, as an aid to construction, of the light thrown upon each of the expressions by the presence within it of the others. Another well established rule applicable to all statutes is the rule of construction ex visceribus actus. The Court is bound to see that every provision of a statute is construed with reference to the context and the other provisions of the statute. The Court is entitled, and even bound as far as possible, to see that the interpretation it puts on a particular provision makes a consistent enactment of the whole statute. In applying these rules the Court has to remember what has so often been emphasised—that as far as possible nothing can be read and nothing can be implied in a taxing statute. One can only look fairly at the language used. The indispensable starting point and the first step in case of any provision of the nature before us is to examine the words of the particular provision under consideration, of course, bearing in mind that it is not a detached enactment but one forming a connected scheme. Another rule having bearing on interpretation of a provision relating to exemption with which we are concerned is that the provision must, as far as possible, be liberally construed and in favour of the assessee, provided no violence is done to the language used. No safer rule can be followed than to start by assuming that the same meaning is implied by the use of the same expression in cognate sections and sections having interaction on one another. The object and scheme of the provisions relating to exemption contained in a relevant consideration.

It is essential to note that now under s. 3 of the Act of 1922 the charge is not the income of the year of assessment, but the income of the previous year. This change was introduced by the Act of 1922. Prior to the Act of 1918 the subject of charge was the actual income of assessment. The result of this change was that, if a business was carrying on and earning income, profits and gains in the year 1921 when the Act of 1918 was in force, the owner of the business would pay income-tax on his income, profits, and gains of the business in 1921. It was necessary in the 1922 Act to differentiate for the purpose of discontinuances between those which had, and those which had not been charged under the Act of 1918.

Section 25 of the Act of 1922 deals with assessment in the case of a discontinued business. Sub-section (1) provides that where any business, profession or vocation to which sub-s. (3) is not applicable is discontinued in the year of assessment, assessment may be made in that year on the basis of the income, profits and gains of the period between the end of the previous year and the discontinuance in addition to the assessment, if any, made on the income, profits or gains of the previous year. The reference to this sub-section makes it clear that this sub-section is not applicable in the case of a business which falls under sub-s. (3). Therefore, sub-section (1) applies to the case of a business which had not been charged under the Act of 1918. It provides an exception to the rule laid down in s. 6 of the Act of 1918, as already pointed out, rules that the subject of charge is the income of the previous year and not the income of the assessment year. It gives the tax Officer an option to make an accelerated assessment on the income, profits and gains of the discontinued business in the year of discontinuance instead of in the usual financial year. No doubt the procedure provided in the sub-section being permissive, but the purpose of it is obvious, namely, to ensure that the tax of a business which is closed and wound up is not lost. The construction sought to be placed on behalf of the Revenue on sub-section (1) cannot be accepted, and if the identical expressions "business, profession or vocation" and "income, profits or gains" of the discontinued business are to be taken in the same sense in sub-s. (1) and sub-s. (3), this option given to the tax Officer to tax the income, profits or gains of a discontinued business in the year of discontinuance, permits him only to tax such part of the income, profits and gains of that business as strictly fall under the head "income, profits and gains of business" mentioned in s. 6(iv) and s. 10 and debar the business from taxing any interest on securities in the year of discontinuance even though the securities were the stock-in-trade of the business. This sub-section, of course, does not apply to the present case, but reference to it at this stage only for the purpose of showing the scheme of the whole section.

Sub-section (2) is an administrative provision. It casts an obligation on the person carrying on "any such business, profession or vocation" as visualised by sub-s. (1), to give notice of discontinuance to the tax Officer within fifteen days of the discontinuance and failure to do so invites imposition of the penalty mentioned in the sub-section. This provision also has no bearing on a case falling under sub-s. (3), but it is clear that the expressions "business" and "income, profits and gains" in sub-section (2) must have the same meaning that is to them in sub-s. (1).

But it is upon the meaning and import of sub-s. (3) that the question raised upon this Reference must turn. The relevant part of the Act is in the following terms:

"Where any business, profession or vocation on which tax was at any time payable under the provisions of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1918, (VII of 1918), is then, unless there has been a succession by virtue of which the provisions of sub-section (4) have been rendered applicable, no tax shall be payable in respect of the income, profits and gains of the period between the end of the previous year and the date of such discontinuance, and the assessee may further claim that the income, profits and gains of the previous year shall be deemed to have been the income, profits and gains of the said period."

It is clear enough as was pointed out by their Lordships of the Privy Council in *Commr. of Income-tax, Bombay v. Polson*², that "...the purpose and effect of this sub-s. (3) is to give relief to a tax-payer who but for it would in the aggregate be charged with tax once in respect of every year's income and twice in respect of one year's income."

The object and scheme of s. 25(3) which deals with exemption in case of a business which was discontinued was examined by Lord Simmonds in the above case and the scheme and object of s. 25(4) which deals with exemption in case of a succession to a business, was examined by the Supreme Court in *Executors of Estate of Dubash v. Commr. of Inc.-tax*³. I may, in passing, add that it has not been questioned, and indeed it could not be questioned, that the expression "business, profession and vocation" in the context of "income, profits and gains" must in all the sub-sections of s. 25 have the same meaning. In answer to me, learned counsel for the Revenue stated that the construction urged by him of the relevant expression in sub-s. (3) must be the same as that to be put upon the identical expressions used in sub-s. (4).

To turn to the language of sub-s. (3). Considerable stress has been laid by Mr. Joshi on the word "charged" in the initial part of this sub-section. The argument for the Revenue here was, that the business which is exempted from income-tax can only be a business which was 'charged' to payment of income-tax under the Act of 1918. The crucial word it is said is 'charged'. The scheme of the Act of 1922 is that profits and gains of a business are 'charged' separately under s. 10: And these profits and gains, as has now been laid down by the Supreme Court, cannot include interest on securities which must be charged under s. 8. Therefore, income, profits and gains of any discontinued business for which exemption is claimable does not mean anything more than profits and gains of that business strictly chargeable under s. 10. The accent was on the word 'charged' which it was urged was the key-word. The premises of this syllogism require careful scrutiny.

Now, s. 25 of the Income-tax Act, 1922, deals with assessment in case of discontinued business and sub-s. (3) gives relief by granting an exemption for payment of income-tax in respect of the 'income, profits and gains' of a discontinued business provided the following conditions concur:

(1) The business must be one on which tax was at any time charged under the Act of 1918;

(2) The case must be one which does not attract the application of sub-s. (4). (Sub-section (3) does not apply where a business has been discontinued and there has been a succession by virtue of which the provisions of sub-s. (4) are rendered applicable.)

(3) The business must be discontinued which means that there must be complete cessation of business.

The way I read the words in the initial part of the sub-section is that they lay down conditions (1) and (3) above. Condition (2) above is not material for the purposes of this case. The section operates as an exemption in case of income, profits and gains of a discontinued business. The word 'income, profits and gains' are also of importance. The words 'income, profits and gains' as also the words in the initial part of the sub-section require to be read in their structural sense and collocation and in their proper context. I shall begin with an examination of the initial part of this sub-section. The initial words, "Where any business...on which tax was at any time charged under the provisions of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1918 is discontinued", it is obvious, refer to two factors: (i) the existence of the business which was at any time charged under the 1918 Act and (ii) discontinuance of that business. Where these two facts are established, the income, profits and gains of that business are exempted from taxation in respect of the period between the end of the previous year and the date of its discontinuance. That the business of the assessee has been discontinued is not a fact in controversy. That income-tax was charged on that business under the provisions of the 1918 Act is also not in controversy. But the whole crux of the matter, it is said by Mr. Joshi, is that the expression 'business' in the present context must be understood not in the ordinary legal sense of that expression but with the technical meaning given to it when profits and gains of a business are charged to tax under s. 10 and by virtue of s. 6(iv). It could not be denied, and in fairness to learned counsel for the applicant I must add that it has not been denied, that we are asked to incorporate in s. 25(3) and the word 'business' used in the sub-section, the concept underlying s. 6 which deals with heads of income chargeable to income-tax and the restricted meaning attributable to the words "profits and gains of any business" in s. 10. But it was said that you must read s. 25(3) in the context of income-tax law and you cannot, therefore, read s. 25(3) without reference to s. 6 and ss. 8 and 10 and without bearing in mind the scheme of the whole Act. I agree that while interpreting s. 25 the Court must bear in mind the scheme of the Act. I also agree that the sub-section must be read ex anteceditibus et consequentibus.

The scheme of the Act has been reviewed in numerous decisions. I shall refer to the latest decision of the Supreme Court in United Commercial Bank Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax where their Lordships had occasion to examine the scheme of the Act while considering ss. 8 and 10 and 24(3) of the Act. Before I refer to the scheme of the Act and some of the general observations made in the judgment of the Supreme Court, I may observe that one important plank in the argument of Mr. Palkhivala was that ss. 7 to 12 of the Act are not charging sections but are computation sections and, therefore, have no bearing on the construction of s. 25(3). The submission was that the mere fact that the aggregate income, profits and gains of a business falls to be computed under more than one heads of s. 6, as for example, under ss. 8 and 10 in the present case, affords no justification for importing the concept of those 'heads' and computation sections in s. 25(3). Mr. Joshi, on the other hand, has strongly urged that both ss. 8 and 10 are charging sections and not computation sections. There was considerable controversy before us as to what view their Lordships of the Supreme Court had taken of this aspect of the matter in the case of the United Commercial Bank Ltd. and it was submitted on behalf of the Revenue that their Lordships have held that ss. 8 and 10 were charging sections. I have carefully studied that decision, and as I shall presently point out, while referring briefly to the scheme of the Act, their Lordships have in express and explicit terms held that ss. 7 to 12 are not charging sections but are provisions for computation of total income. I may add that in a Full Bench case decided by this Court in Kamdar In re⁴, Kania J. and Chagla J. (as they then were) had taken the same view.

Section 2(15) defines 'total income' to mean "total amount of income, profits and gains... computed in the manner laid down in the Act." Chapter I of the Act deals with "charge of income tax". It consists principally of two ss. 3 and 4. Section 3 provides that:

"...income-tax shall be charged for any year at any rate or rates,... in accordance with, and subject to the provisions of this Act..."

Section 4 provides that

"...the total income of any previous year of any person includes all income, profits and gains from whatever sources derived..."

Chapter 3 deals with "Taxable income". Section 6 enumerates the heads of income chargeable to income-tax. It says as under:

S. 6. "Save as otherwise provided by this Act, the following heads of income, profits and gains shall be chargeable to income-tax in the manner hereinafter appearing, namely:—

- (i) Salaries.
- (ii) Interest on securities.
- (iii) Income from property.
- (iv) Profits and gains of business, profession and vocation.
- (v) Income from other sources.
- (vi) Capital gains."

The two heads (ii) and (iv) i.e. "interest on securities" and "profits and gains of business" are dealt with under ss. 8 and 10 of the Act respectively. According to the scheme of the Act income-tax has to be charged in respect of the "total income" of the previous year of every assessee and "total income" is defined under s. 2(15) to comprise all income, profits and gains from whatever source derived subject to certain exemptions. Chapter 3 which is entitled "taxable income" comprises ss. 6 to 17 (both sections, inclusive). Section 6 enumerates the various heads of income, profits and gains which are chargeable to income-tax. Each of these heads of income, profits and gains is dealt with under a separate section and these sections also give the details of allowances and exemptions in regard to each different head.

After an examination of the scheme of the Act in the case of United Commercial Bank Ltd. their Lordships of the Supreme Court cited with approval the decision of the Federal Court in *Chatturam v. Commr. of Inc.-tax, Bihar*⁵ and the decision of the Privy Council in *Wallace Bros. & Co. Ltd. v. Commr. of I.T.*⁶ in support of the view they were inclined to take that ss. 8 and 4 were the charging sections and ss. 7 to 12 were computing sections. After referring to the mandatory character of s. 6 their Lordships observed:

"So every item of income whatever its source, would fall under one particular head and for the purpose of computing the income for charging of income-tax the particular section dealing with that head will have to be looked at."

It is amply clear that it was this differentiation which led their Lordships to hold that 'interest on securities' was an exclusive head even when a banker's business income was being taxed and the securities were part of his stock-in-trade. It is to be noted that the purpose under consideration was the purpose of computing the income. A little later in the judgment appears the passage which is decisive of the point with which I am immediately concerned:

"A combined reading of ss. 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, 18 and refund section, s. 48 shows that income-tax is to be charged at the rate or rates prescribed in the Finance Act on the total income of the assessee as defined in s. 2(15) of the Act and computed in the manner given in ss. 7 to 12 which are not charging sections but are provisions for the computation of total income."

In the same passage later on their Lordships again stressed this aspect of computation. Mr. Joshi has drawn our attention to one or two sentences where their Lordships have used the expressions "chargeable under the head". I need not discuss the matter any more as it is to my mind abundantly clear that the passage cited by me above is decisive of the point that ss. 7 to 13 are only provisions for computation of total income and are not charging sections.

The scheme of the Act outlined above and the observations cited by me do lend support to the contention pressed before us by Mr. Palkhivala that there is no warrant for introducing in s. 25(3) the concept whereby distinction has for purposes of computation of income to be made between interest on security on the one hand and profits and gains of a business on the other. Learned counsel for the assessee was right when he said that the language of the sub-section does not import any head of income chargeable to income-tax and the sub-section deals only with exemption from chargeability. Section 10 as now held by the Supreme Court is not a charging section but deals with computation of income under the particular head. It is extremely difficult for me, therefore, to accede to the argument urged on behalf of the Revenue that the meaning and scope of the expression "business" in sub-s. (3) must be confined strictly to what it bears when you deal with the head of "profits and gains of business, profession or vocation" mentioned in s. 6(iv) and s. 10. This meaning, it was strenuously urged by Mr. Joshi, followed, if s. 25(3) was not read by itself but in the context of other relevant provisions of the Act. I need not repeat the general observations I have made in prefacing this judgment. Of course the enactment is a Code and not an institutional exposition. Of course s. 25 cannot be read in isolation. Of course again, the Act, at least the cognate sections, should be read as a whole, forming a connected scheme. But it is not possible for me to see any reason why in the context of the provisions of the Income-tax Act, when exemption is claimed in respect of the income, profits and gains of a discontinued business, the expression "business" must be circumstanced and straitened by the language and import of ss. 8 and 10, which though valuable in their own setting are provisions relating to computation of income. Section 25(3) does not refer to any heads of computation of income either expressly or by implication of context. I am unable to incorporate in s. 25(3) the notion of the mode or manner of computation of income under various heads. In my judgment, in these words 'income, profits and gains' of a business which is discontinued, the expression 'business' must have, attributed to it, its proper legal meaning. "Business" as defined in the Act

"includes any trade, commerce or manufacture or any adventure or concern in the nature of trade, commerce or manufacture."

It is well understood that unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context the expression business has to be understood as one of wide import. Its content in the income-tax law is not to be readily confined. Mr. Joshi has leaned heavily on the expression "charged" in s. 25(3) in its context of a discontinued business. In effect he has asked us to take the view that the scheme of the Act and the context of income-tax law require that the business contemplated by s. 25(3) must be equated with and confined to the 'business' which is the subject-matter of s. 10. I fail to see anything in s. 25 read in the context of income-tax law which requires or even faintly indicates that the expression 'business' there used must be given any artificial conception distinct from and restrictive of its legal connotation.

In coming to a determination as to the meaning of a particular word or expression in a statute, it is permissible to consider two points—namely: (i) The external evidence derived from extraneous circumstances such as previous legislation and decided cases, (ii) The internal evidence derived from the statute itself. The identical expressions in s. 25(3) with which we are concerned in this Reference are used in ss. 26 and 44. Section 26 deals with change in constitution of a firm carrying on any business. I need not set out s. 26(1) but shall only observe that the income, profits and gains of a firm carrying on any business contemplated there must include the total income of the business of the firm regardless of any consideration of any head of computation. That income for instance can be the aggregate of profits and gains of the business, interest on securities forming part of the stock-in-trade of the business and also income from property belonging to the business. Section 26(2) is as under:—

"Where a person carrying on any business, profession or vocation has been succeeded in such capacity by another person, such person and such other person shall, subject to the provisions of sub-section (4) of section 25, each be assessed in respect of his actual share, if any, of the income, profits and gains of the previous year."

Prior to Income-tax Amendment Act VII of 1937 no exemption under s. 25 was granted in case of a business which was not discontinued but in case of which there was succession. Both ss. 25 and 26 as they previously stood were amended by the amending Act of 1937. Into s. 25(3) after the word "discontinued" were interpolated the words "then, unless there has been succession by virtue of which the provisions of sub-section (4) have been rendered applicable". The whole of sub-s. (4) was newly introduced. It says as follows:

"Where the person who was at the commencement of the Indian Income-tax (Amendment) Act, 1939, (VII of 1939), carrying on any business, profession or vocation on which tax was at any time charged under the provisions of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1918, is succeeded in such capacity by another person, the change not being merely a change in the constitution of a partnership, no tax shall be payable by the first mentioned person in respect of the income, profits and gains of the period between the end of the previous year and the date of such succession, and such person may further claim that the income, profits and gains of the previous year shall be deemed to have been the income, profits and gains of the said period. Where any such claim is made, an assessment shall be made on the basis of the income, profits and gains of the said period; and, if any amount of tax has already been paid in respect of the income, profits and gains of the previous year exceeding the amount payable on the basis of such assessment, a refund shall be given of the difference."

It will be seen that the language of sub-s. (3) and sub-s. (4) is in pari materia.

The scheme of the amendments in s. 25 and s. 26 came up for consideration before the Privy Council in *Commr. of Inc.-tax, Bombay v. Polson*⁷. At p. 741 of the report their Lordships observed:

"...Sections 25 and 26 no doubt form part of a single scheme and their interaction must not be ignored. But s. 26 is primarily directed not to the circumstances in which relief from taxation is given but to the apportionment of tax where relief is not given... It is sub-s. (2) of s. 26 as amended by the amending Act which applies, and, inasmuch as at the time of making the assessment i.e. in November 1939, the respondent had been succeeded in carrying on the business by the company, each of them became assessable in respect of his actual share, if any, of the income, profits and gains of the previous year."

The scheme of the amended ss. 25 and 26 was considered by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in *Executors of Estate of Dubash v. Commr. of Inc.-tax*⁸. At p. 185 of the report Kania C.J. observed:

"Section 25 of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1939, gives certain concessions in respect of a business where tax had been paid by the person carrying the business under the provisions of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1918."

After stating the material part of sub-s. (4) his Lordship observed:

"The Scheme of Section 25 read with the provisions of Section 26(2) appear to be to give relief, inter alia, to persons who were carrying on business in 1921 and had been taxed on their income under the Income-tax Act of 1918. By a change effected by the Income-tax Amendment Act of 1922 they were subjected to taxation twice on the income of 1921-22. The relief is intended against this levy of tax twice over."

In the same case Patanjali Shastri J. (as he then was) observed (p. 188):

"...the Indian Income-tax (Amendment) Act, 1939, (hereinafter referred to as the amending Act), having amended Section 26(2) so as to provide, in the case of a succession in business, profession or vocation, for the assessment of the predecessor and the successor, each in respect of his actual share of the profits of the previous year, the relief was extended, by enacting Section 25(4), to cases of succession occurring after the commencement of that Act, with the same object as in the case of discontinuance, namely, to redress the hardship of the business having been charged twice over on the income of 1921-22. In other words, the predecessor is given the same relief as if he had discontinued the business on the date of succession. It will thus be seen that the enactment of Section 25(4) is consequential on the amendment of Section 26(2), and the scope and meaning of the expression 'succeeded in such capacity by another person' in Section 26(2) must determine also its scope and meaning in Section 25(4)."

Needless to say I am fortified in the conclusion at which I have so far arrived by these weighty observations entitled to highest respect. The day after we reserved our judgment, I drew the attention of Mr. Joshi, 1 for the Revenue, to these two decisions and particularly to the quoted above and learned counsel had little to say. All that that the observations were not made in the context of s. 25(3) while considering s. 25(4) and s. 26(2) and it was added that of sub-s. (3) supported the submissions he had already made. sel, however, agreed that the meaning and scope of the business in the initial parts of sub-ss. (3) and (4) was the same and the profits and gains of a business contemplated by sub-s. (4) must thing in sub-s. (3). Now, it is clear that these observations have bearing on the meaning and scope of s. 25(4). In terms it is Privy Council that ss. 25 and 26 form part of a single scheme a action cannot be ignored. Patanjali Shastri J. (as he then was out that s. 25(4) was consequential on s. 26. I do not intend on these observations, but have gratefully referred to them as throwing considerable light on the question of construction that has arisen for

Now it is to be noted that the amendments in ss. 25 and 26 were by the same Amending Act of 1939. Sub-section (2) was added sub-section (4) was added in s. 25. Not only that but at the same amendment was also made in s. 25(3). The Legislature must be to have been cognizant of the general character and scope of s stood, but also to have been fully apprised of the presence in significance of the expressions "income, profits and gains" and "profession or vocation on which tax was at any time charged under of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1918 (VII of 1918), is discontinued make any verbal change but on the contrary adopted the s. 25(3) in s. 25(4) except that since the same relief which was s. 25(3) was to be given in case of succession the sub-s. (4) has clearly that the exemption was given to the person whose business succeeded. When I examine s. 26(2) it rules that in case of succession both the person who is succeeded and the successor to the business be assessed in respect of the income, profits and gains of the business for the terminal period. It is obvious that the assessment would be the total income, profits and gains of the business derived from the business. The operation of the rule, however, is in express terms made "the provisions of sub-section (4) of section 25", with the result, as the exemption from liability is made commensurate with the liability by s. 26(2) and the proviso to s. 26(2). The presumption is used by the law-maker correctly and exactly and not loosely. The Legislature is always assumed to be aware of its own distinction as of the form of words which it has employed and the sense of them. It is also to be assumed that a form of words uniform intentional. And it is a favoured canon of construction that related sections and sections having interaction and having the same form of words, the same sense of the words is to be adhered to. This would lead to some absurdity or repugnancy or inconsistency. particular cogency when the Legislature amends an existing statute doing so chooses identical words and form of words in provisions of inter-connected matters. I have not so far made any reference to section which is part of the same scheme and can be distinctly s. 25(3). That is s. 44 which says:

"Where any business, profession or vocation carried on by a firm or persons has been discontinued, or where an association of persons or a person who was at the time of such discontinuance or dissolution a partner in a firm or a member of such association shall, in respect of the income, profits and gains of the firm or association, be jointly and severally liable to assessment under section IV and for the amount of tax payable and all the provisions of Chapter IV shall apply to any such assessment."

The cognation is apparent. This section in its present form was substituted by the same Amending Act of 1939. The interaction of ss. 44 and 25(3) does not require to be stressed. It was not disputable and it has not been disputed before us that the liability of members of a firm whose business is discontinued is in respect of the total income, profits and gains of that business regardless of the heads of income chargeable to income-tax. Considerations which apply to ss. 25 and 26 in the present context are also applicable to ss. 25 and 44.

There is one more facet of this question. The heads of income chargeable to income-tax on which so much stress is laid on behalf of the Revenue, have varied at different times since 1918. I do not deem it necessary to examine these changes in any detail and will refer only to one head of income. Prior to the amendment of s. 12 by the Finance Act of 1955 income from dividend from shares which were the stock-in-trade of a business was all along held to be profits and gains of the business under s. 10. By amendment made in 1955 dividends now fall under s. 12(1A) as one of the "other sources" dealt with by s. 12. Mr. Palkhivala has relied on this amendment in support of his arguments. In my opinion this is an additional consideration which cannot be overlooked.

There is another aspect of the matter. It is sometimes said that the exemption in s. 25(3) is conferred on a business and not the person who carried on that business. Mr. Palkhivala also in the course of his arguments adopted this line for the purpose of showing that whatever the nature of the income of a business and under whichever head it is taxed it attracts the exemption. True s. 25(3) does not in terms state that the exemption is granted to the person and speaks of non-liability to pay tax in respect of the income, profits and gains of a discontinued business. But the way I read the sub-section is that the exemption from double taxation is conferred on the person—it may be a firm—who was carrying on any business which is discontinued and was charged to tax under the Act of 1918. Primarily charge of income-tax is directed to the person, natural or artificial, who earns income, profits and gains from whatever source rather than to the ownership or enjoyment or activity which is the source of it. This seems to me to follow from ss. 3 and 4. Take the case of a firm. A firm by virtue of these charging sections is taxed in respect of the total income of its business—to adhere to the words of s. 4—"including all income, profits and gains from whatever source derived". Speaking generally the tax is on the entity—the firm—in respect of its income. The assessment is made on the entity who is the assessee, and again speaking generally, collected from the assessee. This principle is the substratum of s. 3. Another basic principle on which the section rests is that the levy is to be on the total income of that assessable entity. Where that assessable entity is an individual or a firm carrying on business the charge is on the aggregate income, profits and gains derived from that business. And if exemption is given in respect of the income, profits and gains of that business on the principle of avoidance of double taxation, it would naturally and normally be a concession in respect of the aggregate income, profits and gains derived from that business by the assessable entity. It is these basic principles which lead me to the conclusion that the exemption is to the person, natural or artificial, whose income from that business is the subject-matter of s. 25(3). Section 25(4) in terms speaks of the person. Considerable support is to be derived for this proposition from the observations of the Privy Council and of Kania C.J. which I have already quoted before. The liability of that person, natural or artificial, to pay the tax is founded on ss. 3 and 4 of the Act. Therefore, when you consider a provision which enacts that the liability is exempt in case of discontinuance of the business carried on by that person in respect of the terminal period, you have to go to those sections to see what that liability was which attracts the exemption. The fundamental position was brought out in bold relief in the House of Lords case of *Whitney v. Inland Revenue Commissioners*⁹ where Lord

Dunedin, speaking with accredited accuracy as to these tax cases, stated (p. 52) :

"...Now, there are three stages in the imposition of a tax: There is the declaration of liability, that is the part of the statute which determines what persons in respect of what property are liable. Next, there is the assessment. Liability does not depend on assessment: That ex hypothesi has already been fixed. But assessment particularizes the exact sum which a person liable has to pay. Lastly come the methods of recovery if the person taxed does not voluntarily pay."

This passage has become locus classicus and was cited with approval by the Federal Court in *Chatturam v. Commr. of Inc.-tax, Bihar*¹⁰, and very recently by the Supreme Court in *Chatturam Horilram Ltd. v. Commr. of Inc.-tax*¹¹. The exemption in s. 25(3) has to do with the incidence of liability. The subsequent provisions as to assessment and so on are machinery only. They enable the liability to be quantified. The liability is definitely and finally fixed by the charging sections. The stage of assessment is not yet. Therefore, when you say that the liability to pay tax is exempt, it is not in the context of that machinery but in the context of the first stage of liability which as Lord Dunedin pointed out ex hypothesi has already been fixed. It is this concept of imposition of the tax and exemption from such imposition which to my mind leads to the solution of the case. No tax is to be charged in a case falling under s. 25(3), and Chap. III, which deals with heads of income, does not enter into the scheme or meaning of s. 25(3). Sections 7 to 17 in that chapter are computing sections. They deal with the mode or manner of computation or ascertainment of the quantum of tax under various heads and come into operation only when tax has to be charged as enjoined by ss. 3 and 4. Therefore, in a section which lays down that no tax is to be charged in respect of the income, profits and gains of a discontinued business in respect of the terminal period, it is impermissible to implant either the concept or the language and meaning of any of the ss. 6 to 17.

All these considerations lead me to the conclusion that the 'business' contemplated in s. 25(3) is to be understood in the proper legal sense attributable to that expression without recourse to the artificial conception urged on behalf of the Revenue. Aid can, of course, be derived in considering a section from other sections of the statute so long as by doing so you do not alter the meaning of what is itself clear and explicit or diminish the efficacy of any express provision therein contained. In case of the section before us I am unable to see any reason for attributing to the word 'business' any modified and straitened meaning as pressed on behalf of the Revenue. Words of limitation are not as a rule to be read into a statute unless the subject-matter or context so requires. We are not dealing with any sweeping general words but an expression of ample legal content. We are asked to acquiesce in a non-legal construction which limits the operation of the sub-section, so as to make the exemption given by it, not commensurate with the income, profits and gains of a business as understood in the legal sense and as understood in other cognate provisions and provisions having interaction. It is not permissible in case of a provision of the nature under consideration, therefore, to read into it words by implication and make it smaller than what its terms express. Considerations grounded on the scheme of the Act, the scheme and object of s. 25(3), the principle of cogency which requires that relevant provisions of an enactment must as far as possible be read so as to harmonise them and other considerations which I have already discussed, are in my judgment abiding grounds for construing s. 25(3) as exempting the income, profits and gains of a discontinued business, without excluding from such income, profits and gains interest on securities where the securities are themselves stock-in-trade of the business. This is the only way I am able to read s. 25(3) after giving the words of the section their proper legal meaning and after reading the sub-section along with other cognate sections and in the context of income-tax law by which latter expression I understand that the meaning and import of any provision in this fiscal enactment must be gathered in the light of general principles and the well-established rules of interpretation, that the true meaning of any passage is that which (being permissible) best harmonises with the subject and with every other passage of the statute and if you can do so without straining the language of a fiscal statute you must construe it in a manner which enables the smooth working of the system which it purports to regulate.

I have so far omitted from discussion the meaning and import of the words "income, profits and gains" in s. 25(3) without being unmindful of them. Learned counsel for the Revenue in the very opening of his argument stated that they were not germane to the question of construction of this sub-section. The submission also was that the expression meant nothing more than profits and gains of a business as understood in case of the head of income mentioned in s. 6(iv) and dealt with in s. 10. The whole case for the Revenue had to be based on this narrow foundation of s. 10. In my judgment it is ill-founded. Mr. Joshi has in effect asked us to treat the word 'income' used in s. 25(3) as tautologous and superfluous when he said that it meant the same thing as "profits and gains" and was synonymous with the latter expression. I am unable to agree. It is well established that in the context of the charging sections the expression 'income' has a very wide import—wider than profits and gains. And I see no reason for equating the words "income, profits and gains" used in s. 25(3) with "profits and gains". The word "income" itself is of such broad connotation that without adding anything to it you can cover the whole ground of chargeability but the words "profits and gains" are not of such elastic ambit. How wide is the import of the expression "income" used in the charging ss. 3 and 4, can be gathered from numerous decisions. I shall quote one passage from the judgment of my Lord the Chief Justice (Chagla J. as he then was) in Kamdar In re¹² where reference was made to the leading cases on the point (p. 769):

"In Income-tax Commissioner v. Shaw, Wallace & Co. Sir George Lowndes delivering the judgment of the Privy Council defined 'income' as a periodical monetary return 'coming in' with some sort of regularity, or expected regularity, from definite sources. He likened 'income' pictorially to the fruit of a tree, or the crop of a field. He further points out that the expansion of 'income' into income, profits and gains is more a matter of words than of substance. In *Gopal Saran Narain Singh v. Commissioner of Income-Tax, B. & O.*¹³, the Privy Council went as far as saying that anything which can properly be described as income is taxable under the Act unless expressly exempted. Lord Wright in the judgment of the Privy Council in Kamakshya N. Singh v. Commr. of Income-Tax,¹⁴ appreciates the difficulty of defining 'income' and concedes that it is perhaps impossible to define it in any precise general formula, but he says that it is a word of the broadest connotation. He rather disapproves of Sir George Lowndes' pictorial language and sounds a note of warning against using picturesque similes to limit the true character of income in general."

In Gopal Saran Narain Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., their Lordships of the Privy Council held that in s. 12 the words "income, profits and gains" are used in a disjunctive sense and the word "income" is not limited by the words "profits" and "gains". It was there contended that these words as used in s. 12(1) must be construed as including only such income as constitutes or provides a profit or gain to the recipient i.e. that the word "income" was in some way limited by its association with the words "profits" and "gains". The contention was negatived and it was observed (p. 821):

"...The word 'income' is not limited by the words 'profits' and 'gains'. Anything which can properly be described as income, is taxable under the Act unless expressly exempted."

I have already observed that the concept of imposition of the tax on such income emerges from ss. 3, 4 and 25(3) reading the observations cited above their Lordships of the Privy Council. It appears to me, do broadly approve of this concept. In my judgment of the words "income, profits and gains" in the context of business is purposeful and connotes their amplitude and the support to the conclusion I have already arrived at that from this and gains you cannot exclude interest on securities in case of claims exemption on the ground that the interest was on securities themselves were the stock-in-trade of his business. But the Revenue claims the statutory right to impose tax on a person in respect of his business from whatever source derived, demands to his claim from double taxation under a provision in which also are to same words of wide import and asks us to put a narrow construction.

The whole contention on behalf of the Revenue here also has an insistence that inasmuch as the words "profits and gains of a business" have a restricted meaning in the scheme of ss. 6 to 12 they must construe of s. 25 and the words "income, profits and gains" there used read to mean no more than the profits and gains of a business in a restricted sense. How fragile this argument is, can be seen by s. 25(1) which says:

"Where any business, profession or vocation to which sub-section (3) is discontinued in any year, an assessment may be made in that year of the income, profits or gains of the period between the end of the previous year and the date of such discontinuance in addition to the assessment, if any, made in the previous year of the income, profits or gains of the previous year."

It is not disputable that the income, profits and gains of a business must mean the same thing in sub-s. (1) and sub-s. (3). As pointed out an accelerated assessment may at the option of the Assessing Officer be made in respect of the income, profits and gains of business under sub-s. (1) unless sub-s. (3) is applicable. Is this to be confined only to profits and gains of the business, in the case of s. 10 or is the assessment to be on the aggregate income, profit and gains of the business, that is, inclusive of income of the business from other sources? The answer must be that there can be one assessment and it is to be in respect of the entire income, profits and gains of the business as provided in ss. 3 and 4. In my opinion ss. 6 and 10, so much relied on by the Revenue, only lay down a method of its computation. It is little use dwelling on the fact that as my Lord the Chief Justice (Chagla J. as he then was) observed in the case, ss. 6 to 12 do not in any way control or limit the conditions of chargeability laid down in s. 4 and merely provide a machinery for computation for every species of income. In my judgment for reasons, they cannot be read as in any way controlling or limiting the conditions of exemption from that chargeability unless there is a clear authority for doing so.

In construing these words "income, profits and gains" in the case of a discontinued business, we must give them their ordinary legal meaning. The rule of construction requires that as far as possible these words in s. 25 should have the same meaning attributable to them in sub-s. (1) and in other cognate sections. Section 26A and s. 44 which have already made reference are instances in point. I have also pointed out the decisions of the Privy Council and the Supreme Court that form part of a single scheme and how s. 25(4) was said to be covered by s. 26(2). It would only be a compelling context which could induce us to impose upon these words "income, profits and gains" of a business a meaning which carves out a good deal from their ordinary meaning. The context supports the construction urged by the assessee and to read the words in their legal sense and not in any restricted manner. For all these reasons, I am of the opinion that on a true construction of s. 25(3) interest on securities which form part of the stock-in-trade of a business is part of the income, profits and gains of that business and entitled to exemption under that sub-section.

So far I have dealt with the matter on principle and in the light of judicial pronouncements instructive of the principle but without reference to any authority on the construction of s. 25(3). Is there any authority which compels me to refrain from giving effect to the conclusions at which I have come?

I can find none in those that have been cited to us. The one more relied upon by Mr. Joshi was *Ambalal Himatlal v. Commr. of Inc.-tax*¹⁵. The head note to the report is not accurate and does not bring out the ratio decidendi of that case. Mr. Joshi has relied on certain observations from the judgment of my Lord the Chief Justice and my learned brother Tendolkar J. in that case. Now the way I approach any income-tax matter is that it should be my endeavour to appreciate and respectfully follow any direct observation made by this Court in another decision when I see that it was the reason which induced the Court to reach a conclusion. It is true that there is one observation made in that judgment which at first blush may seem to lend some support to the contention urged on behalf of the Revenue. But when you read that observation in its context you find that it was made only in refutation of an argument urged on behalf of the assessee who in that case had a Reference made to the High Court. When you examine the facts of the case and the submissions there made it becomes clear that the observation was made in the limited context of those facts and submissions. Before I refer to the same, it is necessary to state briefly the facts of that case. The assessee, a Hindu undivided family, was in 1943, when it was disrupted, carrying on three distinct and separate businesses:

- (i) money-lending business,
- (ii) running a ginning factory,
- (iii) a share business.

It was found, and this is important, that only the money-lending business had paid income-tax under the Act of 1918. On these facts the assessee claimed the exemption granted by s. 25(4) not only in respect of the total income, profits and gains of the money-lending business but curiously enough in respect of the total income, profits and gains of all the three businesses. There was only the money-lending business subsisting in 1921-22 and in the statement of case the Tribunal stated that this fact was not disputed. The Tribunal held that the assessee was entitled to relief only in respect of the money-lending business which was charged to income-tax under the Act of 1918. At the hearing of the Reference the ingenious argument urged on behalf of the assessee by Sir Jamshedji Kanga was, that when you look at s. 25(4) it is clear that the Legislature intended to give relief not merely in respect of the particular business which was assessed to tax under the Act of 1918, but the relief contemplated was in respect of the total income of the assessee whose business was succeeded to. The argument was based on the language used in sub-s. (4) to the effect that "no tax shall be payable by the first mentioned person in respect of the income, profits and gains for the period between the end of the previous year and the date of such succession." And it was in support of this argument, that it was pointed out that when you turn to s. 10 which deals with tax on business, profession or vocation the language used is "profits and gains of any business, profession or vocation". It is essential to note that the attempt was to show that s. 10 speaks of "any business" and therefore the exemption given by s. 25(4) should not be confined to the particular business which was charged to tax under the Act of 1918 but "any business"—meaning all the three businesses—of the assessee which at the time of disruption of the Hindu undivided family were being charged to incometax. Therefore, there was really an endeavour to introduce the concept and language of s. 10 in the ambit of s. 25(4). The contention was negatived as ingenious and the Court declined to accept the interpretation of s. 25(4) urged by the assessee which would have led to absurd results. In the course of his judgment the learned Chief Justice in examining the novel contention of the assessee, that he was exempted from payment of tax in respect of all the three distinct and separate businesses even though two of them did not even exist prior to 1922, observed at p. 285 of the report:

"...If that was the policy of the Legislature it is difficult to understand why relief should be given to a person whose business is succeeded to in respect of not only that business but also in respect of all sources of income."

Then in proceeding to examine the argument which sought to introduce the concept underlying the words "any business" in s. 10 and in s. 25(4) the learned Chief Justice observed:

"...If we were satisfied that the Legislature intended to use the expression 'income, profits and gains' not only for the purpose of indicating the profits and gains of the business as contemplated by Section 10 but also for the purpose of indicating the total income of the assessee then no doubt we would have to come to that conclusion, however reluctantly; but fortunately there is a clear indication in this sub-section itself. What the Legislature intended by using the expression 'income, profits and gains' was the profits and gains of the business or profession contemplated by Section 10 and not the total income of the assessee..."

It is the latter part of these observations that are relied upon by Mr. Joshi. The ratio of the judgment is to be gathered from the following observations at p. 286 of the report:

"...Further when you look at sub-section (4) as a whole, apart from the use of the expression 'income, profits and gains' it is clear that the conditions required for obtaining of relief under this sub-section are firstly, carrying on any business, profession or vocation; secondly, tax being charged on this business, profession or vocation under the Act of 1918; and, lastly, succession to any such business, or vocation in such capacity by another person. Therefore, such other person must not only succeed, he must also succeed in such capacity, which means, he must carry on the same business, profession or vocation which had been carried on by the assessee to whom relief is to be given. If these conditions are satisfied then no tax is payable by the first mentioned person who is the person to whom relief is intended to be given in respect of the income, profits and gains of the period between the end of the previous year and the date of such succession."

It emerges, therefore, from the observations quoted immediately above that the ultima ratio of the decision is that the exemption is confined to the income of the particular business and did not embrace the total income of the assessee. It is confined to the income of the particular business which was charged to tax under the Act of 1918 and not to any other distinct and separate business which did not fulfil the conditions laid down in s. 25(4) and which conditions must be satisfied before the exemption could be attracted. I have already said the observation about s. 10 was made only in the context of the facts of the case and to negative the submission made on behalf of the assessee.

Needless to state that I would have dutifully and respectfully founded myself on the above decision if the ratio of it was as suggested on behalf of the Revenue. But that ratio clearly is different as I have pointed out above. If the observations are read in the context of the submission and the line of argument followed on behalf of the assessee in that case, and they must be so read, if I may respectfully make the observation, there is nothing in that decision from which the Revenue can derive any support. The case is clearly distinguishable.

The other decision relied upon by Mr. Joshi was *Gopi Mohon and Sons v. Commr. of Inc.-tax, U.P. & C.P.*¹⁶ The facts in that Reference before the Allahabad High Court were that a certain Hindu undivided family which was assessed in respect of its income from property became divided in the previous year relevant to the assessment year 1941-42. It was held that there was a partition in the family as from January 31, 1941. An application was made claiming relief under s. 25(3) and it was rejected. It was not in dispute that the Hindu undivided family was assessed under the Act of 1918 but the assessment was made only in respect of income of the property and not any business. The Tribunal also rejected the second appeal. That was on the ground (1) that s. 25(3) applied only to a case where tax was charged under the Indian Income-tax Act, 1918, on business, profession or vocation and did not apply to a case where tax was charged on income from property, and (2) that from the very nature of the case, it could not be said that there was any discontinuance of a business charged to tax under the Act of 1918. The High Court on a Reference approved of the decision of the Tribunal as perfectly correct. It was, however, urged at the hearing of the Reference that it was an anomalous position that while relief was granted in respect of a business none was granted in case of income from property. The argument solely based on an anomaly was rejected by the Court as ill-founded. Reliance was, however, placed on the following observations in the judgment at p. 223 of the report:

"...The method of computation of income from property has been laid down in Section 9, while that for the computation of income from business, profession or vocation has been described in Section 10. From this it is clear that the expression 'business, profession or vocation' used in Section 25(3) relates to that head of income, which has been dealt with in Section 10, and is quite distinct from the head of 'income from property', which has been mentioned in section 9."

It may be pointed out that there was no question of any income, profits and gains of a business in that case; nor any question of any property owned on account of any such business. It is also clear that the learned Judges regarded ss. 9 and 10 as dealing with the method of computation. True, the learned Judges have observed that "the expression 'business, profession or vocation' used in s. 25(3) relates to that head of income, which had been dealt with in s. 10" and is quite distinct from the head of income mentioned in s. 9. Now, I agree that exemption under s. 25(3) is in respect of income from business, but, with great respect, I am unable to agree that s. 25(3) relates to that head of income which has been dealt with in s. 10. On the facts which I have summarised the decision could not have been different. It will be seen that the position there was quite different and the decision is clearly distinguishable.

For the reasons I have given I would answer the question in the affirmative.

TENDOLKAR J. As my learned brother and I are not agreed as to the correct answer to the issue which we have re-framed, the case would be heard by one or more of the other Judges of the High Court as the Chief Justice may direct under the proviso to s. 66A of the Income-tax Act. Costs of the Reference before us will be costs in the Reference to be so tried.

The reference was accordingly heard by K. T. Desai J.

G. N. Joshi, with R. J. Joshi, for the Commissioner.

N. A. Palkhivala, with Sir Jamshedji Kanga and B. A. Palkhivala, for the respondent-assessee.

K. T. DESAI J. Messrs. Chugandas and Co. (Securities), Bombay, a registered firm, hereinafter referred to as "the assessee", was a dealer in securities. Securities constituted the stock-in-trade of its business. It received a sum of Rs. 4,13,992 as and by way of interest on securities during the accounting year 1946, the assessment year being 1947-48. The assessee firm was dissolved on June 30, 1947. It received a sum of Rs. 1,01,229 during the accounting period January 1, 1947, to June 30, 1947, the assessment year being 1948-49, as interest on securities. The business carried on by the assessee was an old business. It had paid tax in connection with that business under the provisions of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1918. That business having continued, the assessee became entitled to the benefit of the provisions contained in s. 25(3) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922. A question whether the benefit conferred by s. 25(3) extended to interest received by the assessee as aforesaid. At the instance of the Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay City, I, the following question was referred under s. 66(1) of the Indian Income-tax Act:

"Whether on the facts and circumstances of the case interest received by the assessee formed part of the assessee's business income for claiming relief under section 25(3) of the Indian Income-tax Act?"

After the reference was made, the Supreme Court gave its judgment in the case of *United Commercial Bank Ltd. v. Commr. of Inc.-tax*¹. The Supreme Court held that where securities are held by a person as part of his trading assets in the course of his business, income from securities was required to be shown under the head "Interest falling under s. 8 of the Income-tax Act, 1922, and not under the head "Fits and gains of business, profession or vocation" falling under s. 10. Having regard to the decision of the Supreme Court, when the reference came before Mr. Justice Tendolkar and Mr. Justice S. T. Desai, the question was re-framed in order to bring out the real point in dispute between the parties. The re-framed question is as follows:—

"Whether the assessee is entitled to the benefit of section 25(3) in respect of interest on securities?"

There was a difference of opinion between Mr. Justice Tendolkar and Mr. Justice S. T. Desai as regards the answer to be given to the aforesaid question. Mr. Justice Tendolkar was of the opinion that the assessee was entitled to the benefit of s. 25(3) in respect of the interest on securities which were held by him. Mr. Justice S. T. Desai was of the opinion that the assessee was not entitled to the benefit of s. 25(3). The matter has now come up for hearing on that question before the Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay City, I.

The provisions of s. 25(3), which have given rise to the controversy, are as follows:—

"Where any business, profession or vocation on which tax was at any time chargeable under the provisions of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1918 (VII of 1918), then, unless there has been a succession by virtue of which the provisions of section 4 have been rendered applicable no tax shall be payable in respect of the income, profits and gains of the period between the end of the previous year and the date of such discontinuance, and the assessee may further claim that the income, profits and gains of the previous year shall be deemed to have been the income, profits and gains of the said period. Where any such claim is made, an assessment shall be made on the basis of the income, profits and gains of the said period, and if an amount of tax has already been paid in respect of the income, profits and gains of the period preceding the amount payable on the basis of such assessment, a refund shall be made of the difference."

The applicant contends that when the legislature used the words "business, profession or vocation on which tax was at any time chargeable" in the provisions of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1918 it referred only to income under the head "Income derived from business" falling under s. 8 of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1918, and not to income under the head "Fits and gains of business, profession or vocation" falling under s. 10 of the said Act. It is further contended that when the legislature in the year 1922 used the words "no tax shall be payable in respect of the income, profits and gains of the period between the end of the previous year and the date of such discontinuance" it referred only to income, profits and gains liable to be shown under the head "Income derived from business" under s. 8 of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, and not to income, profits and gains liable to be shown under the head "Professional earnings" under the repealed said Act and that those words now refer to the income, profits and gains liable to be shown under the head "Profits and gains of business, profession or vocation" under the present s. 10 of the said Act. It is further urged that when the legislature used the words "and the assessee may further claim that the income, profits and gains of the previous year shall be deemed to have been the income, profits and gains of the said period", the legislature was only referring to what was liable to be shown under the heads "Business" and "Professional earnings" referred to in ss. 10 and 11 of the said Act as first enacted and that those words now refer to what is liable to be shown under the head "Profits and gains of business, profession and or vocation" under the present s. 10 of the said Act. It is further contended that when the legislature used the words "the income, profits and gains" in the sentence "Where any such claim is made, an assessment shall be made on the basis of the income, profits and gains of the said period and if an amount of tax has already been paid in respect of the income, profits and gains of the previous year exceeding the amount payable on the basis of such assessment a refund shall be given on the difference", the legislature was referring only to the income, profits and gains liable to be shown under ss. 10 and 11 of the said Act as first enacted in the year 1922 and that those words now refer to what is liable to be shown under the present s. 10.

Having regard to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case reported in United Commercial Bank Ltd. v. Commr. of Inc.-tax, the present position in law is that where an assessee derives income, profits and gains from a business carried on by him, such income, profits and gains may have to be shown under various heads. If securities constitute the stock-in-trade of his business, interest received in connection with those securities would have to be shown separately under the head "Interest on securities" covered by s. 8 of the Act of 1922. If the business consisted of purchase and sale of houses, the income derived from such houses would have to be shown separately under the head "Income from property" under s. 9 of the Act of 1922. If shares of joint stock companies constitute the stock-in-trade of such business, the dividend income derived therefrom would have to be shown separately under the head "Income from other sources" under s. 12 as it now stands after the amendment made in the year 1955 and it is only the residue which may remain thereafter which would have to be shown under the head "Profits and gains of business, profession or vocation" covered by s. 10. Even under the Indian Income-tax Act of 1918, if an assessee derived income, profits and gains from a business carried on by him, he was under an obligation to show the interest received by him from securities which constituted the stock-in-trade of his business under the head "Interest on securities" covered by s. 7 of the Act of 1918. If purchase and sale of house property constituted the business of such assessee, then the income derived from house property was liable to be shown separately under the head "Income derived from house property" under s. 8 of the Act of 1918. Only the balance of income, profits and gains of such business remaining thereafter was liable to be shown under the head "Income derived from business" under s. 9 of the Act of 1918. It is contended on behalf of the assessee that when the legislature used the words "Where any business...on which tax was at any time charged under the provisions of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1918" in s. 25(3) it referred to the tax which might at any time have been charged under the Act of 1918 under any of the three heads referred to by me above in respect of the income, profits and gains of the business carried on by the assessee. It is further contended on behalf of the assessee that where such business is discontinued, no tax is payable in respect of the income, profits and gains of such business for the period between the end of the previous year and the date of such discontinuance which may have to be shown under each of the four heads referred to by me above under the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922. It is further contended by the assessee that the words "and the assessee may further claim that the income, profits and gains of the previous year shall be deemed to have been the income, profits and gains of the said period" also refer to the income, profits and gains of such business which are required to be shown under each of the aforesaid four heads under the Act of 1922. It is also contended that when the legislature used the words "Where any such claim is made, an assessment shall be made on the basis of the income, profits and gains of the said period and if an amount of tax has already been paid in respect of the income, profits and gains of the previous year exceeding the amount payable on the basis of such assessment, a refund shall be given on the difference", the legislature was referring to the income, profits and gains of such business liable to be shown under each one of the aforesaid four heads under the Act of 1922.

In order to adjudge which of these rival contentions is correct, it is necessary to look fairly at the language used by the legislature in s. 25(3) itself. That section speaks of "any business... on which tax was at any time charged under the provisions of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1918". It is common ground that a business was not a unit of assessment under the Indian Income-tax Act of 1918. What the legislature intended to convey was any business, on the income, profits and gains whereof tax was at any time charged under the Indian Income-tax Act of 1918. Section 2(4) of the Indian Income-tax Act of 1922 lays down that unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context, the expression "business" includes any trade, commerce or manufacture or any adventure or concern in the nature of trade, commerce or manufacture. The expression "business" in s. 25(3) can only refer to the activity which is styled business. What has to be discontinued is that activity before the section can apply. If what is to be discontinued is the activity business, the tax which is referred to in connection with that activity business must of necessity refer to the tax payable in connection with the income, profits and gains derived from that activity business irrespective of the head or heads under which such income, profits and gains are required to be shown under the provisions contained in the Indian Income-tax Act, 1918. The expression "business... on which tax was at any time charged" on a plain reading of the section must refer to the tax charged under any of the heads under which the income, profits and gains made as a result of such activity may have been entered. If such income, profits and gains included interest on securities which constituted the stock-in-trade of that business, the tax paid under the head "Interest on securities" would be covered. There is no warrant for confining the tax to only one head. When the legislature thereafter uses the words "no tax shall be payable in respect of the income, profits and gains", the legislature is referring to the tax otherwise payable in respect of the income, profits and gains derived from the activity business referred to earlier. The income, profits and gains of business here referred to do not refer exclusively to income, profits and gains liable to be shown under the head referred to in s. 10 of the Act of 1922. The intention of the legislature is to completely exempt the income, profits and gains resulting from the activity styled 'business' for the period referred to in the section. When the legislature uses the words "and the assessee may further claim that the income, profits and gains of the previous year shall be deemed to have been the income, profits and gains of the said period", the legislature is referring to the totality of income, profits and gains in connection with the activity styled 'business' under that sub-section and not merely to the income, profits and gains liable to be shown under s. 10. When the legislature uses the further words "where any such claim is made, an assessment shall be made on the basis of the income, profits and gains of the said period", it refers to all the income, profits and gains made in connection with the activity styled business in that section. When the legislature uses the further words "if an amount of tax has already been paid in respect of the income, profits and gains of the previous year exceeding the amount payable on the basis of such assessment, a refund shall be given of the difference", the legislature there again is referring to all the income, profits and gains of the activity termed business in that section. It seems to be a far-fetched construction of that section to say that what the legislature intended was not the totality of the income, profits and gains of the activity termed business but was intending what was liable only to be entered under the provisions contained in s. 10. The term 'business' for the purpose of discontinuance cannot have one meaning and the same term "business" for the purpose of tax cannot have another meaning.

Sub-section (3) of s. 25 was enacted in order to mitigate the effect of double taxation levied in respect of the income, profits and gains of one accounting year having regard to the changes made in the Income-tax law by the Act of 1922. Section 14(2) of the Act of 1918 provided as follows:—

"Subject to the conditions hereinbefore set out, there shall be levied in respect of the year beginning with the first day of April 1918, and in respect of each subsequent year, by collection in that year and subsequent adjustment as hereinafter provided income-tax upon every assessee in respect of his taxable income in that year at the rate specified in Schedule 1."

Under the aforesaid provisions the income, profits and gains for the accounting year 1921-22 were liable to be charged to tax in the assessment year 1921-22 under the Act of 1918.

There was a material alteration in the aforesaid scheme of taxation made by the consolidating and amending Indian Income-tax Act XI of 1922. Under the Act of 1922 the tax had to be paid in the current assessment year in respect of the income, profits and gains of the previous year; with the result that during the assessment year 1922-23 tax was liable to be paid once again under the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, in respect of the income, profits and gains for the accounting year 1921-22.

The question that I have to consider relates to the extent of the relief granted by the legislature. There appears to be no warrant for giving a very truncated and artificial meaning to the expression "income, profits and gains" used in that section in connection with 'business'. When the legislature says that no tax shall be payable in respect of the income, profits and gains of the period between the end of the previous year and the date of such discontinuance, the legislature intended to exempt from tax all income, profits and gains derived from the activity 'business'. When giving the exemption the legislature, in my view, did not contemplate or intend that the assessee would nevertheless have to pay tax in connection with that part of the income, profits and gains made in connection with the activity 'business' which may consist of income from securities in a case where securities constituted the stock-in-trade of that business. It could not possibly be the intention of the legislature in giving the exemption that tax was intended to be charged by the legislature under three out of the four different heads under which the income, profits and gains derived from business is liable to be shown under the provisions of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922. When the legislature enacted that "the assessee may further claim that the income, profits and gains of the previous year shall be deemed to have been the income, profits and gains of the said period", the legislature did not intend that the income, profits and gains of that business for the previous year should remain unaltered to the extent that the same are shown under the head "Interest on securities", "Income from properties" and "Income from other sources" and that only the residue thereof shown under the head referred to in s. 10 alone should be substituted. When the legislature provided for an assessment in connection with such business to be made on the basis of the income, profits and gains of the period referred to in that sub-section, the legislature did not contemplate the assessment to be made only under the head referred to in s. 10. What is provided is that the assessment shall be made "on the basis of the income, profits and gains of the said period". There is no warrant for adding thereto the words "liable to be shown only under section 10".

Section 25(3) being part of s. 25, it would not be out of place to consider the sense in which the Legislature has used similar words in other parts of the same section. As the marginal note to that section shows, it deals with assess-discontinued business. Section 25(1) of the

Where any business, profession or vocation to which such assessment is applicable, is discontinued in any year, an assessment may be made on the basis of the income, profits or gains of the period between the end of the year and the date of such discontinuance in addition to the assessment, on the basis of the income, profits or gains of the previous year."

When the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, was first passed in 1922, it contained the provision "Where any business, profession or vocation commenced after March 1922 is discontinued etc." By Act XI of 1924 for "commenced after the 31st day of March 1922" the words "on or after the 1st day of April 1922" were substituted. By Act XI of 1944 these words were substituted by the words "to which sub-section (3) applies" which now appear. This sub-section provides for assessment on the year of discontinuance itself on the basis of the income, profits or gains of the period between the end of the previous year and the date of discontinuance. Mr. Joshi, the learned counsel for the assessee, submitted that it seemed as if the expression "assessment" in this sub-section meant the assessment being made in respect of the totality of the income, profits and gains made in connection with the discontinued business referred to therein. He, however, stated that the language was different, and that in the context of the language used in this sub-section the expression "income, profits and gains" bore a different meaning. He stated that such difference arose by reason of the use by the legislature of the words "assessment may be made" contained in s. 25(1). His argument was pointed out that the legislature in sub-section (3) provides for the making of an assessment when the option given thereby is exercised by the assessee and that a difference in result is not warranted in the alternative argued that even so far as s. 25(1) is concerned, when dealing with discontinued business to the assessment made under the head referred to in s. 10 of the Act of 1922. In this connection it is not proper to give a truncated meaning to the expression "assessment" when the legislature says that assessment may be made on the basis of the income, profits and gains of the period referred to in the assessment has to be made in connection with the income, profits and gains of a business, you have to assess the totality of the income, profits and gains in connection with that business under whatever head the business is to be entered having regard to the provisions contained in the Act of 1922.

Section 25(1) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, merely provides for assessment in the year of assessment itself. The effect of this section was observed in the case of Commr. of Inc.-tax, Madras v. K. Shrinivasan & Co. observed at p. 97 that all that the section authorises the Income-tax Officer to do is that it gives him an option to make a premature assessment of the income, profits and gains earned up to the date of discontinuance in the year of assessment itself instead of in the usual financial year. This section does not provide for splitting up of the assessment in two different years. It was observed that in the case of a discontinued business, the income, profits and gains in connection with that business have to be assessed in the year of discontinuance itself, and the income, profits and gains are liable to be shown under the head referred to in s. 10 of the Act in the year of discontinuance itself, and any interest on securities earned in connection with that business where securities constituted the stock-in-trade of that business on securities is to be assessed separately in a subsequent assessment. In my view, such splitting up was never intended or contemplated by the legislature when the Act was passed, and it is not possible to say that when the legidering the question of assessment under s. 25(1) a part of the income of the discontinued business was to be assessed in one year and another part in another year. In my view, the alternative argument advanced by Mr. Joshi in connection with s. 25(1) viz., that it refers only to an assessment in connection with the head referred to in s. 10 is without any merit and without any foundation.

I shall now turn to s. 25(2). That section provides:

"25.(2) Any person discontinuing any such business, profession or vocation shall give to the Income-tax Officer notice of such discontinuance within fifteen days thereof, and, where any person fails to give the notice required by this sub-section, the Income-tax Officer may direct that a sum shall be recovered from him by way of penalty not exceeding the amount of tax subsequently assessed on him in respect of any income, profits or gains of the business, profession or vocation up to the date of its discontinuance."

This sub-section deals with the question of the imposition of the penalty, and the words "not exceeding the amount of tax subsequently assessed on him in respect of any income, profits or gains of the business, profession or vocation up to the date of its discontinuance" refer to the assessment made in respect of the totality of the income, profits or gains made in connection with the discontinued business, and not to that part of it which is liable to be entered under the head referred to in s. 10.

I will now turn to s. 25(4) as it was enacted originally by the Act of 1922. That sub-section provided as under:—

"25.(4) Where an assessment is to be made under sub-section (1) or sub-section (3), the Income-tax Officer may serve on the person whose income, profits and gains are to be assessed, or, in the case of a firm, on any person who was a member of such firm at the time of its discontinuance, or, in the case of a company, on the principal officer thereof, a notice containing all or any of the requirements which may be included in a notice under sub-section (2) of section 22, and the provisions of this Act shall, so far as may be, apply accordingly as if the notice were a notice issued under that sub-section."

The assessment referred to in sub-s. (4) is the assessment which is required to be made under sub-s. (1) or sub-s. (3). The assessment which is required to be made under sub-s. (1) or sub-s. (3) is the assessment in respect of the totality of the income, profits or gains made in connection with the activity business. The original sub-s. (4) of s. 25 has been renumbered as sub-s. (6) of s. 25 and the words "sub-section (1) or sub-section (3)" therein have been substituted by the words "sub-section (1), sub-section (3) or sub-section (4)". I may also refer to s. 26 of the Act of 1922. Section 26 is a section which is co-related to s. 25 and it forms an integral part of the scheme of the Act. The Privy Council recognised this fact in the case of *Commr. of Inc.-tax, Bombay v. Polson*³. The Privy Council there observed as follows (p. 741):—

"...Sections 25 and 26 no doubt form part of a single scheme and their interaction must not be ignored."

Section 26 as enacted in the year 1922 ran as follows:—

"Where any change occurs in the constitution of a firm or where any person has succeeded to any business, profession or vocation, the assessment shall be made on the firm as constituted, or on the person engaged in the business, profession or vocation, as the case may be, at the time of the making of the assessment."

The part material for the purpose of the present case is as follows:—

"...Where any person has succeeded to any business..., the assessment shall be made...on the person engaged in the business...at the time of the making of the assessment."

Now, the word 'assessment' here clearly refers to the assessment made in connection with the totality of the income, profits and gains made in connection with such business. It does not refer merely to the head referred to in s. 10.

Mr. Joshi submitted that the expression "assessment" even here in connection with business referred only to the assessment that may be made under the head referred to in s. 10. In my view, it was never the intention of the legislature in enacting s. 26 that where there is a case of succession, the person who succeeds should be made liable only in respect of that part of the income, profits and gains of the business which is liable to be included under the head referred to in s. 10 and that as regards the rest, the person who has been succeeded would be assessed. In my view, this theory of assessment in compartments sought to be imported in the provisions of ss. 25 and 26 is without any basis or foundation. As regards s. 26 it has been observed by the Privy Council in the case of the *Indian Iron & Steel Co., Ltd. v. Commr. of Inc.-tax, Bengal*⁴, that s. 26 is not concerned with the computation of tax, but with the person upon whom the liability is imposed. In my view, reading s. 25 as a whole the words "income, profits and gains" appearing in sub-s. (3) refer to the income, profits and gains made in connection with business under whatever head the same may have to be shown.

There is another aspect of the matter to which I will now advert. Under the Act of 1918 as well as under the Act of 1922, various heads of income, profits and gains are mentioned. Section 5 of the Act of 1918 provided as follows:—

"Save as otherwise provided by this Act, the following classes of income shall be chargeable to income-tax in the manner hereinafter appearing namely,

- (i) Salaries;
- (ii) Interest on securities;
- (iii) Income derived from house property;
- (iv) Income derived from business;
- (v) Professional earnings;
- (vi) Income derived from other sources."

Section 6 of the Act of 1922 when first enacted provided as follows:—

"Save as otherwise provided by this Act, the following heads of income, profits and gains, shall be chargeable to income-tax in the manner hereinafter appearing, namely:—

- (i) Salaries;
- (ii) Interest on securities;
- (iii) Property;
- (iv) Business;
- (v) Professional earnings;
- (vi) Other sources."

Section 6 of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, as it now stands provides as under:—

"Save as otherwise provided by this Act, the following heads of income, profits and gains, shall be chargeable to income-tax in the manner hereinafter appearing, namely:—

- (i) Salaries;
- (ii) Interest on securities;
- (iii) Income from property;
- (iv) Profits and gains of business, profession or vocation;
- (v) Income from other sources;
- (vi) Capital gains."

It is clear from the above that the nomenclature of some of the heads has changed from time to time and that the legislature by legislation has amalgamated two heads into one. A scrutiny of some of the sections of the Act as they existed from time to time will show that what was included in some of the heads has changed. By an amendment made by s. 9 of the Finance Act, 1955, with effect from April 1, 1955, the head "Income from other sources" covered by s. 12 is to include dividends. The result is that in the case of a business where shares of joint stock companies constituted the stock-in-trade of the business, dividends received in respect of those shares, which were at one time liable to be shown under the head "Profits and gains of business, profession or vocation" referred to in s. 10 would now, after the amendment, have to be shown under the head "Income from other sources" referred to in s. 12. In this connection, I may refer to a decision of a division bench of this Court (*Commr. of Inc.-tax v. Ahmuty and Co., Ltd.*⁵). In that case, Chagla C.J. and Tendolkar J. held that in the case of an assessee company which was a dealer in shares which constituted the stock-in-trade of the business of the company, the dividend income received by the company was income from business chargeable under s. 10. This decision was given before the amendment of 1955. In view of the amendment made in the year 1955, this dividend income would now have to be shown under the head "other sources" covered by s. 12. Section 8 of the Act of 1918 provided that under the head "Income derived from house property" the bona fide annual value of any house property of which the assessee was the owner was required to be shown subject to certain allowances.

When we come to the Act of 1922 as first enacted s. 9(1) provided as follows:

"9. (1) The tax shall be payable by an assessee under the head 'Property' in respect of the bona fide annual value of property consisting of any buildings or lands appurtenant thereto of which he is the owner other than such portions of such property as he may occupy for the purposes of his business..."

The present s. 9 provides as follows:—

"9. (1) The tax shall be payable by an assessee under the head 'Income from property' in respect of the bona fide annual value of property consisting of any buildings or lands appurtenant thereto of which he is the owner, other than such portions of such property as he may occupy for the purposes of any business, profession or vocation carried on by him the profits of which are assessable to tax..."

These different provisions in connection with property also indicate that what was liable to be included under a head has varied. Some of the heads do not include all that would ordinarily be covered by the words used in describing the head. For instance, under the head "Salaries" referred to in the present s. 7 of the Act of 1922 the salary received by a servant of a foreign Government is not liable to be shown under this head. Similarly as regards the head "Interest on securities", the interest on securities issued by a foreign Government is not liable to be shown under that head. In my view, when the legislature enacted s. 25 and legislated in connection with the discontinuance of a business and provided for certain reliefs in connection with the income, profits and gains of such business, the legislature was not contemplating any one particular head of income, profits and gains with its varying nomenclature and varying content. In this connection it would be pertinent to note that where the legislature intended to refer to a particular head of income, it has been careful enough to refer to the same by describing it as the "head", by using the specific words by which the head is known with the first letter thereof in capital and by putting those words into inverted commas so that no confusion may arise as regards the intention of the legislature.

I will refer in this connection to the provisions contained in the Act of 1922 as first enacted. Section 18 as first enacted provided as follows:—

"18. (1) Income-tax shall, unless otherwise prescribed in the case of any security of the Government of India, be leviable in advance by deduction at the time of payment in respect of income chargeable under the following heads:—

(i) 'Salaries' and

(ii) 'Interest on securities'.

(2) Any person responsible for paying any income chargeable under the head 'Salaries' shall, at the time of payment, deduct income-tax on the amount payable at the rate applicable to the estimated income of the assessee under this head..."

Section 21(a) provided as follows:—

"21. (a) the name and, so far as it is known, the address of every person who was receiving on the said 31st day of March, or has received during the year ending on that date, from the authority, company, body, association or private employer, as the case may be, any income chargeable under the head 'Salaries' of such amount prescribed..."

"46. (5) If any assessee is in receipt of any income chargeable under the head 'Salaries', the Income-tax Officer may require any person paying the same to furnish a statement of the income so received. A reference may also be made in this connection to ss. 7 to 12 of the Act of 1922. Numerous such instances can be cited from the Act as amended. If we examine the provisions contained in s. 25(3) we have the words 'business, profession or vocation'. Under the Act of 1918 the word 'business' itself did not describe any head. The head under s. 9 of the Act of 1918 was 'Income derived from business'. The words 'profession or vocation' appearing in sub-s. (3) did not constitute the language of the head under s. 9 of the Act of 1918. The head under s. 10 of the Act of 1918 was 'Profits and gains of business, profession or vocation', though it included profits of any vocation. When the Act of 1922 was first enacted the word 'Business' represented the language of the head covered by s. 10. As regards the words 'profession or vocation' they did not represent any head under the Act of 1918 as enacted. The head under s. 11 as originally enacted was 'Profits and gains of business, profession or vocation'. As a result of the legislative amendments the head 'Profits and gains of business, profession or vocation' has now been completely abolished. By the amending Act of 1922 the head under s. 10 has been altered to 'Profits and gains of business, profession or vocation'. There is a temptation to equate the words 'business, profession or vocation' with the head 'Profits and gains of business, profession or vocation' now appearing in s. 10 of the Indian Income-tax Act after the amendment made in 1939, because the words 'business, profession or vocation' appear in juxtaposition, but when these words were used in the Act of 1922 at the time when that section was first enacted, the head like 'profits and gains of business, profession or vocation' when the legislature used the words 'business, profession or vocation' in s. 25(3) and referred to the income profits and gains thereof, it was referring to any particular head of income. If the legislature intended to refer to any particular head or heads, it would have done so in the language for the purpose as it has done in various other provisions of the Act."

In order to visualise the effect of what Mr. Joshi contends in the case of a company whose sole business was to deal in shares, let us suppose that the company constituted its stock-in-trade. If, whilst the Act of 1918 was in force, the company's assessable income for any year was computed at Rs. 15 lacs, and tax had been paid thereon and if the said sum of Rs. 15 lacs was computed by showing Rs. 24 lacs under the head "Interest on securities" and Rs. 9 lacs as loss under the head "Income derived from other sources", would it be possible to say that in respect of the business of the company tax has been charged under the Act of 1918 within the meaning of the Act of 1922? It would be an unrealistic and far fetched attempt to say that the company carried on business on which no tax was payable. In my view, it could not have been the intention of the legislature to give relief to such an assessee merely because its profits have been shown under a head other than that covered by s. 9 of the Act of 1918. Illustration: If the business of an assessee company consisted in the purchase and sale of shares of joint stock companies which constituted its stock-in-trade, under the present s. 12 the income from the dividends would be chargeable under the head "Income from other sources". That income, if it was chargeable, would be liable to be shown under the head "Profits and gains of business, profession or vocation" referred to in s. 10. If the assessee carried on such business under the Act of 1918 and the income was chargeable, could it be said that the assessee is not entitled to the benefit of s. 25(3) in respect of income from dividends merely because it is to be shown under s. 12 instead of under s. 10? In my view, the answer is no. When it referred to income, profits and gains in s. 25(3) in advanced that a landlord who lives merely on rental income should be deemed to be exercising a vocation. In dealing with that argument the learned judges observed that the method of computation of income from property had been laid down in s. 9, while that for the computation of income from business, profession or vocation had been described in s. 10. They further observed as follows (p. 223) :—

“...From this it is clear that the expression ‘business, profession or vocation’ used in Section 25(3) relates to that head of income, which has been dealt with in Section 10, and is quite distinct from the head of ‘income from property,’ which has been mentioned in Section 9.”

To the extent that the judgment contains observations which are contrary to the view I have taken, with respect, I do not agree with the same.

The facts in respect of the case reported in Ambalal Himatlal v. Commr. of Inc.-tax, were the following: The assessee, a Hindu undivided family, carried on three separate businesses, viz. (1) money-lending, (2) running a ginning factory and (3) a share business. That family was disrupted in 1943 and the businesses were divided amongst its members. It was found that only in respect of the money-lending business the Hindu undivided family had paid tax under the Act of 1918. The assessee claimed the benefit of s. 25(4) in respect of all the businesses carried on by it up to the date of partition. The learned judges held that the benefit accrued only in respect of the business in connection wherewith tax had been paid viz., the money-lending business. In the course of his judgment Chagla C.J. observes as follows (p. 286) :—

“...Therefore, the whole emphasis in sub-section (4) is not upon the assessee so much as upon the particular business, profession or vocation which was carried on and which was subjected to tax under the Act of 1918. One might almost say that the relief contemplated to be given was not to the assessee so much as to the particular business...”

There are observations in that case which go to show that the learned judges considered that the legislature in s. 25(4) contemplated profits and gains of business, profession or vocation contemplated by s. 10. Mr. Joshi very strongly relied upon the words in that judgment which appear at p. 285 where Chagla C.J. observes:

“...What the Legislature intended by using the expression ‘income, profits and gains’ was the profits and gains of the business or profession contemplated by Section 10 and large majority of business, the profits and gains of such business, would be liable to be included under the head "Profits and gains of business, profession or vocation" covered by s. 10. It is only in those cases where securities constitute the stock-in-trade of a business that the question arises of including the interest on securities which forms part of the profits of such business under the head "interest on securities" referred to in s. 8, and it is only in cases where the business consists of purchases and sale of houses that the question would arise of including the income from such houses which forms part of the profits of such business under the head "Income from property" referred to in s. 9 of the Act. The learned judges without any argument might well have thought that all profits and gains of business were liable to be shown under s. 10. In the absence of any argument as to the heads under which profits and gains of a business may have to be shown this judgment cannot be regarded as an authority for the preposition for which Mr. Joshi is contending. I cannot regard that judgment as a considered expression of an opinion on the matter with which I have to deal and I cannot regard it as having any binding authority on me, on the point which I have to decide.

In the course of the arguments advanced before me, there was a controversy between counsel as regards the section or sections which constituted the charging section or sections under the Act of 1918 and under the Act of 1922 as first enacted. There is no necessity for me to give any decision on that question in the present reference. Mr. Joshi had argued that in s. 25(3) the use of the words "on which tax was at any time charged" when read along with the provisions contained in the Indian Income-tax Act, 1918, indicated that what the legislature was referring to was the class of income specified in s. 9 of the Indian Income-tax Act of 1918. He urged that s. 5 of the Act of 1918 provided for various classes of income therein set out which were charged to income-tax and that the words "tax...charged under the provisions of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1918" referred to the class of income that was chargeable to income-tax under the provisions contained in the aforesaid s. 5. Mr. Joshi therefrom sought to deduce that the tax charged that is referred to in s. 25(3) is the one charged in respect of the classes of income falling only under the heads "Income derived from business" and "Professional earnings". There is no reason why the tax charged should not refer to other classes of income referred to in the aforesaid s. 5, if such income was derived from the activity business.

In the result, I answer the question as reframed in the affirmative.

Out of the three Judges including myself, who have dealt with this reference, Mr. Justice S. T. Desai and myself have answered the question in the affirmative whilst Mr. Justice Tendolkar has answered the question in the negative. The decision of the Court, having regard to the provisions of s. 66A of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, is that the question is answered in the affirmative.

STATE v. DAHYALAL DALPATRAM.*

Indian Penal Code (XLV of 1860), Secs. 409, 405—Accused collecting amount of fine from landholder in his capacity as public servant—Accused misappropriating such amount—State not entitled in law to enforce fine—Whether accused had committed offence under s. 409.

Section 409 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860, merely requires that there must be entrustment of property to a public servant and breach of the trust committed by him in respect of the property entrusted. It is not necessary under the section that the property in respect of which the offence is committed must be shown to be the property of the State. Therefore, where the State is not entitled in law to collect an amount from the tax-payer, and the amount is received by a person acting as a public servant in exercise of his duties, he holds the amount for and on behalf of the State and in his hand it becomes part of the public fund and if he misappropriates that amount, he commits the offence of criminal breach of trust.

Section 405 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860, does not contemplate that the property in respect of which an offence of criminal breach of trust may be committed must be property which belonged to the complainant. Provided there is entrustment of property, it matters little whether the complainant on whose behalf the property is entrusted is the owner thereof or not.

The accused as a Talati employed under the revenue department was invested with authority to collect land revenue and fines ordered to be recovered under the Land Revenue Code from landholders. The accused pursuant to an order of the Mamlatdar collected a certain amount of fine from a landholder. The accused misappropriated this amount. It was found that the alleged liability of the landholder for the amount collected by the accused could not have been lawfully enforced by the State by revenue or other lawful process. On the question whether the accused had committed an offence punishable under s. 409 of the Indian Penal Code:—

Held, that as the accused was a public servant and had received in his capacity as a public servant the amount of fine, he was entrusted with that amount and he was bound to pay the same in the Government Treasury or to account for the same under the rules made in that behalf by the Land Revenue Code and as the accused had misappropriated the amount entrusted to him, he had committed criminal breach of trust in respect thereof.

SHAH J. This is an appeal by the State of Bombay against an order of acquittal passed by the Additional Sessions Judge, Mehsana, acquitting in appeal the accused Dahyalal Dalpatram, who was convicted by the Judicial Magistrate, First Class, Radhanpur, of an offence under s. 409 of the Indian Penal Code and sentenced to suffer rigorous imprisonment for two months and to pay a fine of Rs. 200.

The accused Dahyalal was employed in the Revenue Department of the State of Bombay as a Talati of the Piparala Seza which consists of four villages—

*Decided, January 5, 1959. Criminal Appeal No. 1186 of 1958, against the order of acquittal passed by M. M. Hakim, Additional Sessions Judge at Mehsana, in Criminal Appeal No. 35 of 1958, setting aside the order of conviction and sentence passed by D. A. Chhaya, Judicial Magistrate, First Class, Radhanpur, in Criminal Case No. 13 of 1957.

Piparala, Roza, Madhatra and Gramdi in the Santalpur taluka of Radhanpur Sub-Division, District Banaskantha. One Vagha Ganga had unauthorisedly cultivated land near the village pond of Roza in the years 1951-52 and 1952-53. An enquiry was started by the Mamlatdar of Santalpur in that behalf and the Mamlatdar directed the accused to recover from Vagha Ganga Rs. 4 as fine for each year for unauthorised cultivation and Re. 1-12-0 as assessment. In enforcement of the order of the Mamlatdar, the accused recovered from Vagha Ganga Rs. 13-9-0 sometime between May 18, 1955, and July 1955, but he did not credit the amount in the revenue account. The accused was transferred to another village in the month of July 1955 and one Ganesh was appointed Talati of Piparala Seza. Ganesh inspected the revenue accounts and found that Vagha Ganga was shown as a debtor for the amount directed to be recovered from him as fine and assessment, and he, accordingly, called upon Vagha Ganga to pay the amount. Vagha Ganga appeared before Ganesh and showed him a receipt issued by the accused Dahyalal acknowledging receipt of Rs. 13-9-0 from Vagha Ganga. Thereafter an enquiry was started against the accused, and in the course of the enquiry the accused made two statements before the Prant Officer, Radhanpur. In his first statement, dated May 1, 1956, the accused told the Prant Officer that he had given the receipt for Rs. 13-9-0 to Vagha Ganga in acknowledgment of receipt of the amount, and that the amount was not credited in the Government Treasury nor was it credited in the Government accounts and it had remained with him "due to oversight" but he had not intentionally committed any default. In his reply to the notice issued to him, the accused informed the Mamlatdar that the amount which was recovered by him from Vagha Ganga was not recovered by him as "Government dues," that after he had recovered that amount from Vagha Ganga he had returned the same to the latter and that he had not misappropriated the amount and that he had obtained a receipt from Vagha Ganga for repayment of the amount. The accused was, thereafter, charged before the Judicial Magistrate, First Class, Radhanpur, for criminal breach of trust in respect of the amount of Rs. 13-9-0.

Before the learned Magistrate the accused contended that the State of Bombay was not entitled to recover from the cultivators of Jahagirdari lands assessment or fine for unauthorised cultivation and that the Jahagirdar of the village was entitled to recover the same till the Jahagir Abolition Act was brought into force on August 1, 1954, and that one Viramji Harbhanji Jahagirdar of the village Roza had asked him to recover the amount from Vagha Ganga and he had recovered the same from Vagha Ganga and had passed a receipt and subsequently the amount was returned to Vagha Ganga who paid over the same to the Jahagirdar and, therefore, he—the accused—had not committed any offence.

The learned trial Magistrate held that the accused had recovered Rs. 13-9-0 from Vagha Ganga and had misappropriated the amount, that the State of Bombay was entitled to recover the amount and that the story of the accused that he had returned the amount to Vagha Ganga was untrue. He, accordingly, convicted the accused of the offence charged against him.

Against the order of conviction an appeal was preferred by the accused to the Court of Session of Mehsana at Palanpur. The learned Additional Sessions Judge held on the evidence that some time before the month of July 1955 the accused had collected an amount of Rs. 13-9-0 from Vagha Ganga in enforcement of the order of the Mamlatdar, dated November 8, 1954, and that the amount was not credited by the accused in the revenue account maintained by him. But in the view of the learned Judge as the amount was not due from Vagha Ganga to the State of Bombay, by appropriating the same the accused did not commit an offence of criminal breach of trust even though, in his view, the defence of the accused that the amount had been returned to Vagha Ganga and the latter had paid it over to the Jahagirdar was not true. The learned Judge observed in the course of his judgment:

"...it must be held that when the accused recovered the amount from Vagha, Vagha was not liable to pay any amount to the Government. It is thus clear that the accused had recovered the amount from Vagha by misrepresenting the facts to him and the accused thus can be said to have committed the offence of cheating punishable under section 420 of the I.P. Code. The accused, however, cannot by any stretch of imagination be held to have committed the offence punishable under section 409 of the I.P. Code as he had not recovered any dues belonging to the government and as such he cannot be said to have been entrusted with the amount in his capacity as a public servant", and on that view he acquitted the accused. Against the order of acquittal the State of Bombay has preferred this appeal.

There is little dispute as to the facts found by the Courts below. That the accused was a Talati of Piparala Seza in 1954-55 and as such a public servant is not denied. He has also admitted that he had recovered Rs. 13-9-0 from Vagha Ganga in enforcement of the order of the Mamlatdar, dated November 8, 1954. It is also undisputed that this amount is not credited in the accounts maintained by the accused. That the amount of Rs. 13-9-0 was collected by the accused in his capacity as the Talati, i.e. as a public servant employed in the revenue department, is also undisputed. The trial Magistrate found that the accused had not returned the amount of Rs. 13-9-0 to Vagha Ganga and that the receipt, exh. 5/1, was a fabricated document. The Additional Sessions Judge agreed with that view, and no substantial argument has been advanced before us which may justify us in taking a different view on that question. The learned Judge has pointed out that if the accused had returned the amount of Rs. 13-9-0 to Vagha Ganga, there was no reason why he should not have called upon Vagha Ganga to return the receipt, which had already been issued by him to Vagha Ganga. The receipt exh. 21 on which reliance is placed by the accused does not bear the thumb mark of Vagha Ganga. He disbelieved the evidence of Viramji Harbanji that the amount of Rs. 13-9-0 was paid to him by Vagha Ganga. The amount is not shown as credited by Viramji in his books of account, and except the bare word of Viramji, there is no other evidence which supports that case. We, therefore, agree with the view of the learned Additional Sessions Judge that the amount of Rs. 13-9-0 was not returned by the accused to Vagha Ganga and was appropriated by him. The question which then falls to be determined is whether in appropriating the amount of Rs. 13-9-0 recovered in enforcement of the order of the Mamlatdar to himself the accused was guilty of the offence of criminal breach of trust.

In the view of the learned Additional Sessions Judge, the State of Bombay was not entitled to recover this amount from Vagha Ganga; and in support of that view he has relied upon exh. 10/5, which is a letter addressed by the Assistant Secretary to the Government of Bombay, Political and Services Department, to all Collectors in the Northern Division. That letter recites that for the Jagir villages in the Banaskantha district the Jahagirdars not having executed any agreement (relinquishing their interest), the orders treating properties like rivers, river-beds, mountains, etc., situated in the village of the Jahagirdars as State property "had no legal basis", and that specific provision in that behalf was made in the Bombay Merged Territories and Merged Areas (Jagirs Abolition) Act, 1953, and that in the circumstances the orders issued by the Government of Bombay by letters dated February 17, 1953, and August 5, 1953, should be treated as cancelled and that the question of recovering the income, if any, which the Jahagirdars may have realised from the said properties from the date of merger till the issue of the orders did not arise. It appears from this letter that the Government was advised that until the enactment of the Bombay Merged Territories and Merged Areas (Jagirs Abolition) Act, 1953, the State had no right to recover income from properties like rivers, river-beds and mountains situate in the villages of the Jagirdars in the Banaskantha district: and intimation in that behalf was given to the Collectors and to the Mamlatdars. It may, therefore, be assumed that the State of Bombay had no right to recover assessment and fine from Vagha Ganga for unauthorised cultivation of land near the village pond of Roza.

The Additional Sessions Judge thought that, because the State was not entitled to enforce liability for recovering the fine and assessment in respect of the land, the accused had not committed an offence of criminal breach of trust in appropriating the amount recovered in enforcement of the order of the Mamlatdar, dated November 8, 1954, and that if at all, the accused may have committed an offence under s. 420, Indian Penal Code. But it was not the case of the prosecution nor of the defence that the accused had by a false representation persuaded Vagha Ganga to pay him the amount of Rs. 13-9-0. It was the case of the accused that he had recovered that amount in his capacity as Talati of the village Roza and that he issued a receipt in that behalf to Vagha Ganga. It was not even suggested that in recovering the amount from Vagha Ganga the accused was not acting as a public servant: and there is a finding by the Courts below that the amount was recovered by the accused in his capacity as a public servant. Does the fact that the alleged liability for the amount collected by the accused could not have been lawfully enforced by the State by revenue or other lawful process make any difference as to the consequence of appropriation of the amount collected by him? The learned Additional Sessions Judge was of the view that it did. In his view, the amount which was collected by the accused did not belong to the State and, consequently, it could not be regarded as entrusted to the accused. In para. 5 of this judgment he observed:

"The Talati was, however, not recovering the amount from Vagha which belonged to the Government and as such it cannot be said that the accused was entrusted with the funds which belonged to the Government or over which he had dominion or control in his capacity as a public servant;"

and in support of that view he relied upon a judgment of the Allahabad High Court reported in *Surendra Pal Singh v. State*¹.

We are unable to agree with the learned Judge. Section 405 of the Indian Penal Code defines the offence of criminal breach of trust, and in so far as it is material it states:

"Whoever, being in any manner entrusted with property, or with any dominion over property, dishonestly misappropriates or converts to his own use that property,.... commits 'criminal breach of trust'."

The accused as a Talati employed in the revenue department was invested with authority to collect land revenue and fines ordered to be recovered under the Land Revenue Code from landholders. When any amount is collected as a tax or fine by the accused as a Talati from a landholder, the money collected by him becomes public fund and the accused becomes entrusted with that fund. If liability for payment of any amount was lawfully enforceable against a landholder, and the amount was collected by the accused as a Talati, it is undisputed that when the amount reached his hand he became entrusted with that amount. When the accused collected the amount as tax alleged to be due by a landholder, though the liability whereof could not be enforced according to law, could it be said that he was then entrusted with the money? On this question the Allahabad High Court appears to have taken the view that a public servant collecting money claiming that it was due to the State but which in fact was not due to the State could not be regarded as entrusted with the money collected by him. But evidently s. 405 of the Indian Penal Code does not contemplate that the property in respect of which an offence of criminal breach of trust may be committed must be property which belonged to the complainant. Provided there is entrustment of property, it matters little whether the complainant on whose behalf the property is entrusted is the owner thereof or not. If authority be needed for that proposition, there is an old judgment of the Calcutta High Court in which it was held that s. 409 of the Indian Penal Code does not require that property in respect of which criminal breach of trust is committed should be that of Government; it should have been entrusted to a public servant in that capacity (see *In re. Ram Soonder Poddar*²). The accused being a public servant and having received in his capacity as a public servant an amount of Rs. 13-9-0 from Vagha Ganga, in our judgment, he was entrusted with that amount and he was bound to pay the same in the Government Treasury or to account for the same under the rules made in that behalf under the Land Revenue Code. The accused having misappropriated the amount entrusted to him, it must be held that he has committed criminal breach of trust in respect thereof.

In Surendra Pal Singh v. The State it appears that the accused, who was an employee of the revenue department of Uttar Pradesh, collected Rs. 596-14-0 from certain cultivators as canal dues when only an amount of Rs. 398-4-6 was due from them. On the allegation that out of the amount collected by him the accused credited to the State Rs. 398-4-6 and appropriated the balance to himself, the accused was prosecuted for the offence of criminal breach of trust. It was observed in that case by the High Court that the balance of Rs. 198-9-6 which was appropriated by the accused to himself was never due to the State and it was, therefore, not the property of the State at any stage, and that when the accused realised that sum of money it did not become State property nor did the accused become its trustee on behalf of the State. It was also observed that when the amount was handed over by the cultivators to the accused he could not become the trustee of the money on behalf of the cultivators because the cultivators had purported to surrender all their rights in the money, their intention being that the money should go to the State and it was in pursuance of that intention and for its fulfilment that they handed over the money to the accused and, therefore, the money was not held by the accused as a trustee on behalf of the cultivators.

But the assumption that before an offence under s. 409 can be committed by an accused person the property in respect of which the offence is committed must be shown to be the property of the State does not, in our judgment, appear to be warranted by the plain words used in that section. The law merely requires that there must be entrustment of property to a public servant, or banker, merchant or agent, and breach of the trust committed by him in respect of the property entrusted. Even if the State was not entitled in law to collect the amount from the tax-payer, when the amount was received by the accused acting as a public servant in exercise of his duties, he held the amount for and on behalf of the State and in his hand it became part of the public fund and when he misappropriated that amount, in our judgment, he committed the offence of criminal breach of trust.

The decision in *Emperor v. John McIver*³, on which reliance was placed by Mr. Shah, has, in our judgment, no bearing on this question. In that case a charge was made against the person accused for offences under ss. 406 and 420 of the Indian Penal Code. Thereafter the accused compounded with the complainant for the offence under s. 420 and the Court acquitted the accused. An application in revision was filed to the High Court and the High Court directed a trial of the accused for the offence under s. 406, Indian Penal Code. A contention was then raised at the trial for the offence under s. 406, Indian Penal Code, that by virtue of the rule of autrefois acquit the accused could not be tried again on the same facts in respect of which there was outstanding an order of acquittal, and the matter was ultimately placed before a full bench of the Madras High Court. Mr. Justice Cornish and Mr. Justice Mockett held that the accused was entitled to the benefit of the rule of autrefois acquit because he had been acquitted of a charge under s. 420 of the Indian Penal Code which was raised against him on the identical facts on which the charge under s. 406 was sought to be pressed against him. Mr. Justice Lakshmana Rao disagreed with that view, but having regard to the majority decision, the accused was ordered to be acquitted. But in that case the Court was not called upon to decide the question whether a person who as an agent had received money on behalf of his principal to recover which the principal could not have resorted to legal process and had misappropriated the same can be regarded as having committed an offence of criminal breach of trust. Nor did this question fall to be determined in *Lake v. Simmons*⁴, which was relied upon by Mr. Shah for the accused. That case was decided upon the interpretation of a policy of insurance. The view expressed by their Lordships was that loss of property by deception was not "loss by theft or dishonesty committed by a customer or broker" within the meaning of the clause contained in the policy.

In our view, the accused having received the amount in his capacity as a Talati from Vagha Ganga in satisfaction of an alleged liability of the latter to pay assessment and fine, the accused committed the offence of criminal breach of trust when he misappropriated that amount.

BIDI LEAVES & TOBACCO MERCHANTS ASSOCIATION v. THE STATE OF BOMBAY.*

Minimum Wages Act (XI of 1948), Secs. 5(2), 5(1)(b), 2(h), 3, 4, 20—Notification issued under Act revising minimum rates of wages in respect of employment in tobacco manufactory in Vidharbha—Validity of provisions of notification—Power conferred on State Government to fix minimum rate of wage, how far can interfere with terms of contract between employer and employee—Whether Authority constituted under s. 20 can deal with every kind of wage dispute between employer and employee—Government whether can constitute tribunal to decide disputes relating to ascertainment and fixation of rate of wage payable to employee—Doctrine of implied powers under statute, scope and ambit of.

The second part of cl. 6, cl. 7 and the Explanation contained in the Schedule to the notification† No. MWA-1557-J, dated June 11, 1958, issued by the State of Bombay under s. 5(2) read with s. 5(1)(b) of the Minimum Wages Act, 1948, are ultra vires of the powers of the State Government. The remaining provisions of the notification are intra vires of the powers of Government and, therefore, valid and effective.

Sections 2(h), 3 and 4 of the Minimum Wages Act, 1948, cast a duty on the appropriate Government to fix a minimum rate of wage (which is only a bare subsistence wage) which should be paid to the employee in respect of his employment or in respect of the work done by him in such employment on his fulfilment of the terms of the contract of employment, express or implied. The power thus conferred on the appropriate Government includes the power to interfere with the terms of the contract between the employer and the employee so far as they relate to the fixation of the wage rate, and the appropriate Government has powers by necessary implication to do all acts necessary to so fix the minimum rate of wage as would effectively compensate or remunerate the employee in respect of his employment or in respect of the work done by such employee in his employment.

The powers conferred on the appropriate Government under the Act to interfere

⁴ [1927] A.C. 487.

*Decided, September 23, 1958. Special Civil Applications Nos. 205 and 214 of 1958.

†See Bombay Government Gazette, Part IV-A, p. 466, dated June 19, 1958. This notification revised the minimum rates of wages in respect of the employment in any tobacco (including bidi making) manufactory in the Vidharbha region of the State of Bombay. It came into force from July 1, 1958.

with the terms of the contract between the employer and the employee are limited. Those powers are to interfere with the terms of the contract so far as they relate to fixation of wage for the work done in the employment. It is, therefore, not open to the State Government in fixing minimum rate of wages to interfere with the other terms of the contract between the employer and the employee.

*Express Newspaper Ltd. v. Union of India*¹, Bijoy Cotton Mills Ltd. v. The State of Ajmer,² *Thomas v. Travancore-Cochin State*³ and P. C. Chakravarty v. Manager, D. T. Estate,⁴ referred to.

The words "in any other case" in s. 20(3)(4) of the Minimum Wages Act, 1948, relate only to the three types of claims other than the fixed minimum rate of wage, mentioned in s. 20(1) of the Act. These words do not confer jurisdiction on the Authority constituted under s. 20 to deal with all and every kind of wage dispute arising between the employer and the employee, e.g. disputes relating to the ascertainment and fixation of minimum rate of wage payable to the employee.

In the absence of any provision in the Minimum Wages Act, 1948, for a decision of disputes between the employer and the employee relating to the ascertainment and fixation of minimum rate of wage payable to an employee, by necessary implication it has to be assumed that it is left to the State Government to constitute a tribunal for the said purpose wherever found necessary.

Section 3(3)(b)(iv) of the Minimum Wages Act, 1948, does not relate to a fixation of wage. It directs the appropriate Government to indicate the manner of calculation for purposes of conversion of the rate fixed by it per month into a rate per day and vice versa.

The doctrine of implied powers under a statute can be applied only where the following conditions are fulfilled:—

(1) There must be a duty imposed or power prescribed.
(2) On a reasonable construction of the statute there must be an impossibility in the exercise or fulfilment of that power, resulting in making its object or purpose nugatory.

(3) The impossibility must be such that it is not an impossibility in an individual case because then the law cannot permit powers by implication, but the impossibility must be of a general nature so that the purpose and object of the duty or power is rendered impossible of achievement in every case. It is only then that powers by implication can be inferred.

(4) The implication cannot contradict the expressed intent which must always prevail and where it becomes necessary to read an implication into an enactment the scope of the implication must be limited only to what is reasonably necessary and no more.

THESE were applications under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution of India made by the Bidi Leaves and Tobacco Merchants Association, Gondia, manufacturers of bidis in the city of Nagpur and others for quashing the Notification of the Government of Bombay dated June 11, 1958, made under the Minimum Wages Act, 1948, and directing the Government to take steps not to give effect to the Notification. The applications came on for hearing before a Nagpur Bench of the High Court composed of Mudholkar and Kotval JJ. Mudholkar J. was of the opinion that cls. 1 to 7 of the Schedule to the Notification were intra vires of the Act while Kotval J. was of the opinion that cls. 3 to 7 were ultra vires of the Act. The following were the opinions given by Mudholkar and Kotval JJ.

MUDHOLKAR J. This order will also govern Special Civil Application No. 214 of 1958. In these petitions the petitioners challenge the notification issued by the Government of Bombay in Labour and Social Welfare Department, dated June 11, 1958, under the Minimum Wages Act, 1948. That notification runs thus:

"No. MWA. 1557-J. In exercise of the powers conferred by sub-section (2) of section 5

1 [1958] A.I.R. S.O. 578.

2 [1955] 1 S.O.R. 752.

3 (1957) (2) Labour Law Journal 53. •

4 [1955] A.I.R. Assam 12.

read with clause (b) of sub-section (1) of that section of the Minimum Wages Act, 1948, (XI of 1948) and after consulting the Advisory Board and in supersession of the former Government of Madhya Pradesh Labour Department Notification No. 564-451-XXIII, dated February 23rd 1958, the Government of Bombay, hereby revise the minimum rates of wages in respect of the employment in any tobacco (including bidi making) manufactory in the Vidarbha region of the State of Bombay as mentioned in the Schedule hereto annexed and directs that this Notification shall come into force with effect from 1st July, 1958.

Schedule.

Subject to the other provisions of this Schedule, the revised minimum rates of wages payable to employees per thousand bidis (when leaves are supplied by the employer) shall be as follows:

Area.	Revised rate in Rs.
(i) Nagpur district	1.69
(ii) Bhandara district	1.62
(iii) Chanda, Akola, Buldana, Yeotmal, Amravati and Wardha districts	1.56

2. For all bidis in which 7 chataks or more of tobacco mixture is used and for those bidis which are known as 'Hathnakhun' bidis, there shall be an increase of 12 Naye Paise per 1,000 bidis in the rates mentioned above in all the areas.

3. It shall be within the discretion of the employer to decide which are "chhat" bidis or bad bidis, up to 5 per cent., of the bidis prepared by the employee. If the employer decides that any bidis are "chhat" or bad, the "chhat" or bad bidis up to 5 per cent. shall be destroyed forthwith by the employee and whatever tobacco is recovered from them shall be retained by the employer. If, however, the employer wants to retain these "chhat" or bad bidis, he shall pay full wages for the same to the employee.

4. If "chhat" or bad bidis are more than 5 per cent., but less than 10 per cent., and if there is any dispute between the employer and the employee as to whether the "chhat" or bad bidis is done properly or not, equal number of representatives of the employer and the employees shall inspect (sic) the "chhat" is done properly or not. If there is any difference of opinion among the representatives of the two sides, the majority shall prevail. If the opinion is equally divided and the employer wants to retain the "chhat" bidis, he shall pay wages for "chhat" bidis between 5 per cent. to 10 per cent. at half the rates fixed above. If the employer does not want to retain these bidis, the employee shall destroy them forthwith.

5. The employer shall nominate his representatives and the employees shall elect their representatives.

6. In the case of "chhat" above 10 per cent. the employee shall be entitled to full wages. It shall, however, be open to the employer to take suitable action against the employee if the "chhat" is more than 10 per cent. for 6 continuous working days in a calendar month.

7. The "chhat" shall be made once in a day only at any premises within a distance of not more than 2 miles from the premises where bidis are manufactured.

Explanation: For the purposes of this Schedule the expression "employer" includes his thekadar, contractor or agent as the case may be."

Petitioner No. 1 in Special Civil Application No. 205 of 1958 is an association of manufacturers of bidis in the Bhandara District. Petitioner No. 2 and petitioner No. 3 are proprietors of the concerns manufacturing bidis in Gondia. The petitioners in the other Special Civil Application are manufacturers of bidis in the city of Nagpur and in the Bhandara District. It is common ground that some of the manufacturers of bidis have factories in which the work of manufacturing bidis is carried on while some manufacturers distribute tobacco and tendu leaves to the workers living in villages who manufacture bidis and deliver them to the employers, or their agents or to the contractors working on behalf of the employers. The aforesaid notification purports to revise the rates for payment to workers who prepare bidis which were originally fixed by the Government of Madhya Pradesh by the notification dated January 11, 1951, and revised by that Government by the notification dated February 23, 1956.

It may be mentioned that in the two notifications issued by the Government of Madhya Pradesh different rates were fixed for the urban area and for the rural area. No such distinction has been made in the notification issued by the Government of Bombay. There is one more point of difference between the notifications issued by the Government of Madhya Pradesh and that issued by the Government of Bombay and that point is that the notification of the Bombay Government contains some provisions dealing with "chhat". Now, it is common ground that the practice of "chhat" is prevalent in the bidi industry and in particular in the Bhandara District. The impugned notification purports to lay down the extent of "chhat" permissible to an employer.

Shri Phadke, who appears for the petitioners in Special Civil Application No. 205 of 1958, impugned this notification on three grounds. Those grounds are as follows:

(i) that the notification is ultra vires of the provisions of the Minimum Wages Act;

(ii) that the procedure prescribed by the Act has not been properly followed by the Government, and

(iii) that the rights of the bidi manufacturers under art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution have been infringed by the notification inasmuch as the State Government has abused its powers to place restrictions on the fundamental rights of the bidi manufacturers to carry on their trade.

It will be convenient to take the second point first. Shri Phadke contended that the State Government omitted to follow the procedure laid down in sub-s. (2) of s. 5 of the Minimum Wages Act. Section 5 deals with the procedure for fixing and revising minimum wages. Under this provision the Government in fixing minimum rates of wages in respect of any scheduled employment or in revising minimum rates of wages can proceed in one of two ways: it may either appoint committees and sub-committees to hold enquiries and advise it in respect of such fixation or revision as the case may be, or it may publish its proposals by a notification in an Official Gazette for the information of persons likely to be affected thereby and specify a date, not less than two months from the date of the notification, on which the proposals will be taken into consideration. In the instant case the State Government has chosen to follow the latter procedure, that is to say, it published certain proposals in the Official Gazette and took the proposals for consideration two months after the publication of the notification. Under the proviso to sub-s. (2) of s. 5 where the State Government chooses to follow the kind of procedure which was followed in this case it has to consult the Advisory Board appointed under s. 7 of the Act. Shri Phadke's contention is that the Advisory Board for the Vidarbha area was appointed by the Government of Madhya Pradesh and that though the notification appointing the Advisory Board had not been superseded, the Government of Bombay instead of consulting that Advisory Board consulted the Advisory Board for the Bombay State and that there was thus non-compliance with the provisions of the proviso to sub-s. (2) of s. 5.

Shri Abhyankar, who appears for the State of Bombay, pointed out that by virtue of the notification dated November 1, 1956, issued by the State Government of Bombay under s. 122 of the States Reorganisation Act, 1956, the Advisory Board for the Bombay State became the Advisory Board even for Vidharbha and the Advisory Board appointed by the Government of Madhya Pradesh ceased to function even for Vidarbha as from that date. Shri Phadke then accepted this position, but contended that this Advisory Board did not contain any representative of the bidi industry in Vidarbha and that, therefore, it cannot be said that there was proper compliance with the provisions of law. The Act nowhere says that the representative from any particular region should be appointed on the Advisory Board in order that the Board should have jurisdiction with respect to that area. In the circumstances, therefore, Shri Phadke's argument that there was no proper compliance with the provisions of the proviso to sub-s. (2) of s. 5 of the Act cannot be accepted.

It may be mentioned that the Advisory Board before tendering its advice to the Government appointed a committee for making enquiries into the conditions of the bidi industry in Vidarbha. This committee actually toured in the whole of Vidarbha, interviewed a number of persons including employers and representatives, examined such persons as appeared before it, considered the memorandum submitted to it by the interests concerned and then submitted a report to the Advisory Board. That report was taken into consideration by the Advisory Board before it tendered its advice to the Government.

Shri Qazi, who appears for the petitioners in Special Civil Application No. 214 of 1958, contended that the Advisory Board had no power to appoint a committee and that it could not base its advice upon the report of that committee. An Advisory Board is a very large body and it is certainly not convenient that the whole Board should hold an enquiry into a matter of this kind. It is surely open to it to appoint some of its members to conduct the enquiry and submit their report. After all the function of the Advisory Board is merely to advise and not to take a decision. That being the position, it is clearly open to the Advisory Board to devise its own procedure for obtaining information necessary for the purpose of discharging its duty of tendering advice to the Government. The argument of Shri Qazi cannot, therefore, be accepted.

Now, as regards the first point raised by Shri Phadke. His contention is that what the Government is authorised to do under the Minimum Wages Act is merely to fix the minimum rate of wages which is to be payable to a worker and that it is not competent to it to frame provisions like those contained in cls. 3 to 7 and the Explanation in the Schedule to the notification, which deal with different matters. According to him, what the State Government has done is to legislate upon a matter which is not within its purview. According to Shri Abhyankar, the Special Government Pleader, this is a conditional legislation and what the Government has done is merely to fulfil the conditions for bringing into effect the legislation, which it is permitted to do under the Act. He also contends that the Government possesses an express power to prescribe matters which are governed by cls. 3 to 7 and that even assuming that it has no express power under the Act it has an implied power to prescribe the matters which are to be found in cls. 3 to 7. As regards express powers reliance was placed by him on s. 12 of the Act which runs thus:

"Where in respect of any scheduled employment a notification under section 5 or section 10 is in force, the employer shall pay to every employee engaged in a scheduled employment under him wages at a rate not less than the minimum rate of wages fixed by such notification for that class of employees in that employment without any deductions except as may be authorised within such time and subject to such conditions as may be prescribed."

Now, Shri Abhyankar placed reliance upon the word 'authorised' occurring in this section and said that the deductions which are dealt with by the impugned clauses could be authorised under s. 12. It seems to me that the word 'authorised' necessarily means authorised by some other provisions of law and that it does not contemplate authorisation under s. 12 itself. This will be clear from the language of sub-s. (2) of s. 12 of the Act which refers to the provisions of the Payment of Wages Act. Section 7 of the Payment of Wages Act deals with deductions which could be made from wages. Where deductions are so made they could be deemed to be authorised deductions and it is deductions of this kind which the Legislature had in view when it used the word 'authorised' in s. 12 of the Minimum Wages Act. Shri Abhyankar, however, contended that the word 'authorised' will also cover deductions authorised by the notification in question. But the notification itself does not purport to authorise any deductions. On the other hand, what it does is to specify the mode for ascertaining the work which has to be paid for. Under the Minimum Wages Act power is given by s. 30(2)(d) to the Government to prescribe the time and conditions of payment of, and the deductions permissible from, wages. This has, of course, to be done by rules. The notification of the kind which we have here cannot be said to contain any rules made under this provision and indeed no reference is made to s. 30 in the aforesaid notification. The argument of Shri Abhyankar cannot, therefore, be accepted.

Shri Dhabe, who was permitted to intervene on behalf of the employees, relied upon the provisions of s. 3(3)(a)(i) and said that since that provision gave Government a power to classify the work and fix the rates of wages, the Government cannot be said to have express power to make provisions of the kind we find in cls. 3 to 7. This provision reads thus:

"The appropriate Government shall, in the manner hereinafter provided,—

(3) In fixing or revising minimum rates of wages under this section,—

(a) different minimum rates of wages may be fixed for—

(i) ...

(ii) different classes of work in the same scheduled employment;"

According to Shri Dhabe, the Government has classified the work into 'good' and 'bad' and it had power to do so under this provision.

In the first place, that is not a classification which has been actually made by the Government. On the other hand, the effect of those clauses is to require an employer to pay for 90 per cent. of the work tendered to him by an employee irrespective of the quality of the work. With respect to the remaining 10 per cent. the provisions are these: Five per cent. of that work is required to be paid for at the full rate if that work is actually accepted by the employer. For the other five per cent. the provision is that if after following a certain procedure the work is found to be below the requisite quality the employer is bound to pay for it at half the rate fixed by the Government if he does not accept it, but at the full rates if he does. Surely, these provisions cannot be regarded as classification of work according to quality for fixing wages for that work. In the circumstances, therefore, it is clear, as already stated, that the State Government has not made a classification of this kind in the notification. Apart from that, it is doubtful whether the Act contemplates classification of work as good and bad for the purpose of fixing the minimum wage. No other provision of the Act was referred to as conferring express power on the Government to make provisions of the kind to be found in cls. 3 to 7.

What is therefore to be ascertained is whether the Government has implied powers to make provisions of this kind. Craies on Statute Law has stated at p. 239 of the 5th edn.:

"Grant of a right implies grant of the means necessary for its exercise. One of the first principles of law with regard to the effect of an enabling Act is that if the Legislature enables something to be done, it gives power at the same time, by necessary implication, to do everything which is indispensable for the purpose of carrying out the purpose in view, 'on the principle' as Parke B. said in Clarence Ry. v. Great N. of England Ry. (13 M. & W. 706) 'that ubi aliquid conceditur, conceditur etiam id sine quo res ipsa non esse potest'."

In *In re Corporation of Dudley*¹, Brett L.J. said that (p. 93):

"The general rule on this head of law is, that where the legislature gives power to a public body to do anything of a public character, the legislature means also to give to the public body all rights, without which the power would become wholly unavailable, although such a meaning cannot be implied in relation to circumstances arising accidentally only."

Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, 10th edn., has stated the legal position thus at p. 361:

"Where an Act confers a jurisdiction, it impliedly also grants the power of doing all such acts, or employing such means, as are essentially necessary to its execution."

Crawford on Statutory Construction at p. 267 has stated:

"One may find numerous situations where statutes have been extended by implication. Thus, a statutory grant of a power, privilege or property carries with it, by implication everything necessary to its enjoyment or exercise: So also the creation of a new duty or obligation or the prohibition of an act formerly lawful, carries with it, by implication, a corresponding remedy to assure its observance..."

On the basis of these statements of law Shri Abhyankar argued that the State Government had power to make the necessary provisions for making the minimum wages fixed by it effective. Shri Abhyankar pointed out that a practice is prevailing in the bidi industry under which employers reject a large quantity of bidis rolled by the employees, and though they actually sell those bidis in the market, they do not pay any wages to the employees for preparing those bidis. It is to prevent the workers or employees losing remuneration for the labour put in by them that the Government has made provisions of the kind to be found in cls. 3 to 7 of the notification. According to him, it will be meaningless to fix a minimum wage and to leave it to the sweet-will of the employers to reject as many bidis as they like, to utilise them by selling them in the market and to pay wages, even the minimum wages fixed by the Government, only for the work approved by them as up to the standard. Shri Phadke's argument is that if there is an evil of this kind there are other ways of remedying it and the Minimum Wages Act was not intended to provide a remedy for preventing a mischief of the kind alleged to exist by the State Government.

On the question of implied powers Shri Phadke referred to the following passage from *Fenton v. Hampton*². That is a decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in which their Lordships have said:

"...After the fullest research which I have been able to bestow, I take the matter to stand thus: Whenever anything is authorised, and especially if, as matter of duty, required to be done by law, and it is found impossible to do that thing unless something else not authorised in express terms be also done, then that something else will be supplied by necessary intendment. But, if, when the maxim comes to be applied adversely to the liberties or interests of others, it be found that no such impossibility exists, that the power may be legally exercised without the doing that something else, or even going a step further, that it is only in some particular instances, as opposed to its general operation, that the law falls in its intention, unless the enforcing power be supplied, then, in any such case, the soundest rules of construction point to the exclusion of the maxim, and regard the absence of the power which it would supply by implication as a casus omissus."

He also referred to a decision in *The Trolly, Draymen and Carters Union of Sydney and Suburbs v. The Master Carriers Association of N. S. W.*³, where the above decision was followed by the High Court of Australia. In that case the question was whether the condition imposed by the Court of Arbitration, functioning under the Industrial Arbitration Act, that the employer should not be allowed to engage a servant without giving notice of his intention to do so was valid. Dealing with it the Chief Justice of the High Court of Australia said (p. 516):

"Such a condition would involve, of course, a remarkable interference with the liberty of the employer, that he should not be allowed to engage a servant without giving notice of his intention to do so. For, whether the prescribed notice was public or private, there would be no difference in principle. In considering the question whether such a provision is to be implied in the Act, it is important to bear in mind that, if it is, the discretion of the Court is unlimited and cannot be controlled. Is it a necessary inference from what the Legislature has said that it did intend to confer such a power? I confess that I cannot see any foundation for the argument... One condition has been laid down by the legislature in regard to the preference to unionists, that it may be ordered as between persons offering their labour at the same time. I am not aware of any principle upon which it can be held that the provision authorizes the Court of Arbitration to give any direction to employers that they shall give notice to one set of persons or another before they proceed to exercise their common law right of engaging any person they see fit. Except so far as they are empowered to do so by the provisions of the Act, the Court cannot control the common law rights of the subject."

In the course of the judgment, the learned Chief Justice quoted the following passage from the decision of Lord Halsbury in *Rossi v. Edinburgh Corporation*⁴:

"...I can only look at the Statute itself and construe it, and when I construe the statute I find there is in the statute a plain prohibition with respect to certain things. The magistrates, of course, are not only empowered but bound to give effect to legislation which has been passed; but when it is argued that because they are given the power to restrict, within certain hours, the sale of ice-creams therefore they have implied power to do all that might be desirable or expedient with reference to the times and circumstances under which ice-creams shall be sold, it seems to me the argument entirely fails. What is sought to be done, whether directly by bye-laws, or indirectly by the language of the licence that is issued, is something that can only be done by the Legislature."

He has also referred to the opinion of Lord Robertson in the same case which is as follows (p. 30):

"...I can find no warrant in the Statute for forcing the dealer to close his premises at the hours during which he is forbidden to sell ice-cream, and I know of no principle upon which the magistrates can be held entitled to eke out what they may consider a weak prohibition by imposing an additional one."

It will be seen from all these decisions that implied power has been negatived only in the following circumstances: In the first place, the liberties or interests of others should be affected, secondly, there should be an impossibility for the exercise of the power conferred by the Legislature and, thirdly, that impossibility must be of a general kind and not restricted to particular instances. It is no doubt true, that in the instant case the liberty of contract of the petitioners is intended to be affected by the exercise of the implied power. But the Minimum Wages Act itself interferes with the existing contracts, at any rate, in the matter of fixation of rates of wages. The Legislature has clearly declared its policy that whatever the contract between the parties may be as to the rates of wages payable to persons engaged in a scheduled industry, the State Government will have the power to alter those rates and thus interfere with the contract between the parties. Now, in order to make the exercise of this power effective it will have to be said that the State Government has also the right to fix the basis upon which the wages should be fixed. If such power could not be implied in favour of the State Government, it seems to me that the effective exercise of that power will be rendered impossible. Now, the State Government does say that in the Nagpur district, for instance, the revised rate for bidis would be Re. 1 and 69 nP. per thousand bidis. The intention of the State Government to enable a bidi worker to get Re. 1 and 69 nP. for 1,000 bidis rolled by him would be frustrated if the employer were to reject 500 bidis out of those 1,000 rolled by him on the ground that they are below standard and then to utilize those very bidis himself by selling them in the market. If the State Government could have no power to prescribe some conditions of the kind to be found in cls. 3 to 7, it would not be able to make effective the rates of wages fixed by it. To my mind, here is a case where the exercise of the power granted by the statute could be rendered impossible not in individual cases but generally unless there was an implied power in the State Government to make ancillary provisions for fixing the basis on which the wages are fixed.

Shri Phadke, however, contended that an implied power to provide a basis on which the minimum wage should operate should be deemed to have been excluded by the Legislature because the Act which deals with various matters therein exhaustively has not given any power to the State Government to provide for such a basis. Now, the very concept of wages necessarily includes the basis with relation to which the wages are to be fixed. As has been pointed out by Crawford at p. 266 of Statutory Construction :

"The implications and intendments arising from the language of a statute are as much a part of it as if they had been expressed."

Upon this principle, therefore, it must be held that the power for fixing a wage can also be laid down by the State Government while exercising its powers under s. 3 of the Minimum Wages Act.

Shri Phadke then referred to the provisions of cl. (a) of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Act which deals with a minimum rate of wages for time work and pointed out that the Legislature has set out in detail the wage periods which could be fixed and also empowered the Government to specify the manner of calculating the wages for different wage periods. According to him, if there were any implied power to provide for these matters the Legislature would not have provided for them specifically. It seems to me that that is not the proper way of looking at the provisions of that clause. What the clause in effect does is to limit the power of the State Government in the matter of fixing wage periods by laying down that the minimum rates of wages may be fixed by the hour and not by any shorter period. It is, however, open to the State Government to fix a longer wage period such as "per day, per month or even a longer period". It is true that the section also says "where such rates are fixed by the day or by the month, the manner of calculating wages for a month or for a day, as the case may be, may be indicated". But it is possible that the Legislature made those provisions by way of abundant caution. Now, had the Legislature not made those provisions and had made provisions only for fixing the wage periods there might have been room for construing the Act in such a way as to exclude the existence of the power to provide for the manner of calculating wages.

Then Shri Phadke argued that the particular power given or exercised must receive a strict construction when it invades contractual rights or imposes new obligations. As a general proposition perhaps no exception could be taken to this statement, but if a particular power conferred by a statute cannot be exercised without an implied power for doing certain other things, the principle stated by Shri Phadke cannot be applied. In other words, the principle stated by him cannot be invoked for stultifying the power conferred and the duty imposed by a statute.

Then Shri Phadke said that an inference of implied power must be drawn slowly in the case of Government. He has not stated why the principle of construction of statutes should be different in the case of Government from that in the case of any other Authority or person. I am afraid I cannot accede at all to this proposition.

Then Shri Phadke said that when other statutes provide for a matter, implied power to do that thing cannot be imported by a statute which is silent about that matter. In other words, according to him, a statute cannot be so construed as to make the provisions operate as to invade the provisions of other Acts. Shri Phadke has not relied upon any Authority in support of his proposition and I feel it difficult to accept it. The reason is that the same topic may be the subject of various enactments but the matters dealt with under that topic may be different in different Acts. Now, it cannot be disputed that the Legislature has power to enact expressly on all matters which fall within its legislative competence. It will, therefore, follow that while construing the provisions of different laws made by the Legislature it will not only be open to the Court but it will be the duty of the Court to so construe those provisions as to effectuate the intention of the Legislature in enacting these laws. Now, where the Legislature has enacted a piece of conditional legislation, but has omitted to make express provisions in regard to certain matters and without implying such provisions the law cannot be brought into force by the Authority upon whom the Legislature has placed the duty to put the law into operation, it will have to be held that that Authority has the implied power to do everything to put the law into operation even though in doing so the Authority may have to do something which is covered by the provisions of other statutes. I know of no principle—and none has been referred to by Shri Phadke—which precludes the Court from presuming in such cases in favour of the existence of an implied power. I will, however, examine the argument of Shri Phadke that the provisions of certain statutes have been invaded by the State Government by enacting cls. 3 to 7 of the Notification.

According to Shri Phadke the provisions of these clauses invade the provisions of the C.P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act, the Standing Orders Act (XX of 1946), Central Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, and s. 20(2) of the Minimum Wages Act itself. Shri Phadke says that the provisions of cls. 3 to 7 really deal with a 'change' in an industrial matter which could be effected after following the provisions of the C.P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act. Therefore, according to him, no power could be implied in the State Government to make those provisions. It is sufficient to say that the C.P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act does not deal with matters which are comprised in the aforesaid clauses.

Then Shri Phadke says that the matter which is dealt with in these provisions could well be dealt with by framing a Standing Order under the Standing Orders Act, 1946. Now, the making of a Standing Order is not obligatory upon an industry or an industrial undertaking. Moreover, Standing Orders could well vary from one bidi factory to another.

Shri Phadke has not been able to show how the matters dealt with in cla. 3 to 7 of the Notification at all fall under the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, and how the provisions of those clauses interfere with the operation of any of the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act.

Finally as regards sub-s. (2) of s. 20 of the Minimum Wages Act. What s. 20 provides for is the machinery for enabling an employee for obtaining redress in respect of his claims. It does not confer any power upon the authorities specified in that section to deal with matters of a general nature, such as those dealt with in the aforesaid clauses. Shri Phadke did not refer to any other enactment, the provisions of which, according to him, could be said to have been invaded by cls. 3 to 7 of the Notification in question and it is difficult to see how the provisions of the four Acts to which he has referred could be said to have been invaded by cls. 3 to 7 of the Notifications.

Shri Phadke referred us to the definition of 'wages' contained in s. 2(h) of the Minimum Wages Act, which runs thus:

"In this Act, unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context,—...

(h) 'Wages' means all remuneration, capable of being expressed in terms of money, which would, if the terms of the contract of employment, express or implied, were fulfilled, be payable to a person employed in respect of his employment or of work done in such employment....", and argued that the conception of wages itself involves the fulfilment of the terms of employment by the worker and one of such terms is to produce work to the satisfaction of the employer and that, therefore, there is no scope for laying down any conditions of the kind laid down by the State Government in the Schedule which would relieve the employee of the necessity of fulfilling those requirements or which will take away from the employer the right to reject the work on the ground that it is not up to the standard. Now, it has to be borne in mind that what is referred to by Shri Phadke is merely a definition and in a sense it is descriptive of the term wages. This definition cannot, in my opinion, be construed as limiting or taking away the implied power of the State Government to make provisions of the kind we find in the Schedule. If Shri Phadke's argument were to be accepted then, as already stated, the purpose of the Act would fail with respect to one of the scheduled industries to which the Act relates. What is more important is to give effect to the intention of the Legislature and not so much to preserve the sanctity of contracts which, as is well-known, is being interfered with time and again by the Legislature for promoting social justice.

The power to correlate the hours of work, the work-load and the basic wages can be exercised by the State Government while fixing minimum wages under s. 5 of the Minimum Wages Act appears to have been accepted by the Supreme Court in *A. M. Allison v. B. L. Sen*⁵. That decision has been understood by the Assam High Court to lay down the law that the State Government has such power. This would appear from the decision in *H. G. Henson v. M. Sultan, Deputy Commissioner*⁶. In the notification with which their Lordships of the Supreme Court had to deal the State Government had fixed As. 12 per day as the basic wages for the male labourers working in the tea garden and As. 11 per day for the female labourers working there. It may be mentioned that in the plantations in which the workers were employed the hours of work in the case of an adult were 9 per day subject to a maximum of 48 hours in a week. Under the contract it was provided that the male labourers were to get As. 8 per day for plucking 16 seers of green leaves and the female labourers were to get As. 6 per day for plucking 12 seers of green leaves. This was the work-load or task in respect of which the basic wages of As. 8 and As. 6 respectively were paid to the male and female labourers. Now, the Government by its notification raised its rate to As. 12 and As. 11 respectively but it also provided that the existing task and hours of work shall continue until further orders. That is to say, in place of the original contract whereunder a male labourer, for instance, was entitled to the wages of As. 8 per day for plucking 16 seers of green leaves and work for 9 hours and a female labourer to As. 6 per day for plucking 12 seers of green leaves and work for 9 hours a day, the Government Notification entitled the labourers to get As. 12 and As. 11 respectively for doing the same amount of work and for working for the same length of time. Thus, according to the original contract each labourer was entitled to 6 pies per seer for the leaves plucked by him. Now, the managers of these tea estates continued to pay to the labourers at the same rate even after the notification and demanded from them an additional out-turn for earning the enhanced wages. The validity of the clause in the Government Notification prohibiting the managers from altering the existing task and hours of work was challenged by the managers. Their contention, however, was negatived by their Lordships who observed in para. 11 of their judgment:

"It is argued that the continuance of the existing work-load or task which was thus provided for had no relation to the basic wages which were fixed for the male and female labourers respectively but was only intended to prevent the employers from increasing the existing work-load or task with a view to make up for the increase in basic wages. This argument, however, does not take count of the fact that there was existing at the date of the notification a work-load or task which was the basis of the payments used to be made to the labourers, the basic wages paid to them being calculated at the rate of 6 ps. per seer of tea leaves plucked by them. The labourers were thus being paid the basic wages of as. 8 for male labourers and as. 6 for female labourers for the work-load or task of plucking 16 seers and 12 seers of tea leaves respectively and the sole intention of the Government in issuing the notification was to increase these basic wages of as. 8 and as. 6 to as. 12 and as. 11 respectively while maintaining the same basic work-load or task assigned to the male and female labourers. If the intention was not to correlate these basic wages to the basic work-load or task which already existed and if the same state of affairs was to continue, viz., that the labourers would continue to be paid the basic wages on the computation of 6 ps. per seer of green leaves plucked by them, there was no sense whatever in increasing the basic wages from as. 8 to as. 12 for male labourers and from as. 6 to as. 11 for female labourers as was sought to be done by issuing the notification in question. The acceptance of the contention of the appellants would mean that no advantage whatever was sought to be conferred by the Government on the labourers engaged in plucking leaves in these tea estates which intention can scarcely be attributed to the Government. We are, therefore, of the opinion that what was fixed by the notification was not merely 'a minimum time rate' irrespective of the existing work-load or task which used to be performed by the labourers but was a minimum wage which, though fixed for time work, was necessarily correlated to the work-load or task then being performed by these labourers so that whatever extra work was done by the labourers in excess of the existing work-load or task of plucking 18 seers of tea leaves in the case of male labourers and 12 seers of tea leaves in the case of female labourers had to be paid for in accordance with practice then prevailing, whether it was based on agreement or tacca or custom, at the rate of 6 ps. per seer."

Following this decision, the Assam High Court held in the case cited:-

"In an earlier case in C.R. Nos. 147 and 148 of 1952, dated 7-7-1953, this Court observed that all the three items, namely, the basic wage, the existing task and the hours of work had to be correlated in order to ascertain the minimum wage payable on the strength of the said Government Notification."

It is true that in the instant case the Government instead of stating that the existing task will be left unaltered or untouched has made some other provisions. But it is clear that what the Government has done is merely to fix the basis for the minimum wage provided for it. In the Assam case it was thought necessary to provide only for not altering the existing task in order to achieve the purpose which the Government had in view. Here, some other provisions had to be made for achieving the same purpose. The power under which the Government acted in the Assam case is however the same as that which is claimed in the instant case, i.e. the implied power.

We would proceed to examine the provisions to which objections have been taken. In so far as cl. 1 is concerned an objection is taken by Shri Qazi that the rates fixed by the Government did not take note of the cost of living index. He referred to the provisions of s. 4 and said that under this section the cost of living index number has to be borne in mind by the State Government while fixing the minimum rate of wages of a worker, and that here as the same rate of wages is fixed for persons working in urban areas as in rural areas, it is clear that the Government has not taken the index figure into consideration. He points out that after all the cost of living is higher in urban areas than in rural areas and asks how is it that the minimum wages could be the same for both the areas. A similar point was raised before a division bench of this Court in Bhikusa v. Sangamner Bidi Kamgar Union.⁷ In that case it was pointed out that the index figure is only one of the matters to be borne in mind by the State Government in fixing the minimum wages and that the law does not require that the minimum wages in the urban areas where the index figure is probably higher than in rural areas, should be higher than in rural areas. I respectfully agree with this view. I may also point out that though certain commodities are more expensive in urban areas than they are in rural areas it does not necessarily follow that the minimum expenditure for living in an urban area must always be higher than that in a rural area. It is well-known that certain commodities, for instance, salt, sugar and tea are more expensive in a rural area than in the urban area, and commodities like foodgrains are more expensive in an urban area than in a rural area. Therefore, it would not be correct to say that where the same minimum wage is fixed for an urban area as that fixed for a rural area, the fixation was arrived at without any reference to the index figure.

It was faintly contended that the rates have increased suddenly to a very considerable extent and the burden which an industry cannot bear has been cast upon it. Whether this is so or not it is difficult to say. But it may be pointed out that even if that is so, it is not a matter which we are entitled to look into for the simple reason that power has been given to the Government and the Government alone to determine what the minimum wages should be and the exercise of that power cannot be properly questioned in any Court.

Then we come to cl. 2. Here a little higher rate is provided for 'Hathnakhun' bidis. It is said that there is no definition of 'Hathnakhun' bidis and, therefore, it may be difficult to give effect to this provision. In this connection we may refer to para. 8 of the return of respondent No. 2 which was not controverted by the petitioner.

Then it was said that there was no justification for fixing a higher rate for 'Hathnakhun' bidis. In the first place, as we have said, it is not our province to determine what particular rate of the minimum wage should be fixed by the Government. Secondly, we may point out that the 'Hathnakhun' bidis require some additional skill and probably a little longer time to make.

Then as regards cl. 3, the contention was that it was not open to the State Government to order destruction of bidis which were rejected by the employers. What is really provided for in this clause is that if the employer rejects bidis up to five per cent. he should destroy them as bidis, that is to say, to destroy their character as bidis. It does not say that he should burn them or do anything of the kind. On the other hand this provision clearly entitles an employer to recover tobacco contained in these bidis and retain it with him. I may also add that it does not prohibit him from retaining the tendu leaves in which the tobacco had been rolled, and using them in any way he liked. All that the provision requires is that the rolled bidis should be unrolled and their character as bidis be destroyed. Thus what is directed to be destroyed is the unpaid work put in by the employees and not any property of the employer. The object of this provision is to prevent an employer from rejecting bidis even up to 5 per cent. and selling them as bidis in the market and thus deprive a worker of his wages for making those bidis. That clause also provides that if an employer retains those bidis as bidis then he must pay full wages to the employee. It seems to me that the Government has clearly power to make a provision of this kind in order to ensure that a worker who has put in his labour gets paid for the labour.

Now cl. 4 at first sight appears to deal with matters which are outside the purview of the minimum wage fixation. However, if we examine that clause carefully it will be seen that all the provisions therein are intended only for securing one result and that result is to effectuate the payment of the minimum wage. Shri Phadke contended that those provisions appear to deal with an industrial dispute and not merely with wage fixation. But, as already stated, though the intention is to settle a matter of difference between the workers and the employers that matter has a bearing solely on the question of the fixation of minimum wages.

Clauses 5 and 6 are ancillary to cl. 4. Shri Phadke took exception in particular to the second part of cl. 6, which runs thus:

He said that by this clause his rights against the workers are limited and that, therefore, this interferes with the contract between him and the workers which is not warranted by the provisions of the Minimum Wages Act. As I look at this provision it only confers certain rights on the employer to proceed against the employees, but it does not in any way affect the employer's right either under the contract or under the standing orders for taking such action against employees as he likes for bad workmanship.

As regards cl. 7, it was urged by Mr. Phadke that the employer could not be restricted to make 'chhat' only once in a day; nor could he be required to make 'chhat' in or near the village where the workers carry on their work. This provision is intended to protect workers who do not work in factories but at their houses. Now, it is well-known that these workers are distributed in various villages. According to the practice of the trade, the agents of the employers (or their contractors as contended for by Shri Phadke) distribute leaves and tobacco to the workers in their villages and then take back bidis in exchange from them and while taking these bidis the agents or contractors, as the case may be, reject some bidis as being below standard. They, however, even take away those bidis with them and then present all those bidis to the employer in his factory. Here the employer or his servant makes a second 'chhat' and rejects some more bidis out of those accepted by the agent or the contractor. Now, this second 'chhat' is invariably carried on behind the back of the employee. Usually, the second 'chhat' is also said to be quite considerable and, therefore, the result is that the employee does not receive any remuneration for a substantial quantity of work done by him. It is to prevent this, that a clause of this kind had to be enacted. As already stated, this clause also has a bearing on the question of the fixation of minimum wages and is, therefore, within the competence of the State Government to make this clause.

Lastly, an objection was taken to the Explanation and it was said that this Explanation goes beyond the definition of 'employer' given in the Act. Now 'employer' is defined thus:

"'employer' means any person who employs, whether directly or through another person, or whether on behalf of himself or any other person, one or more employees in any scheduled employment in respect of which minimum rates of wages have been fixed under this Act, and includes,..."

I fail to see how the Explanation goes beyond the definition. It merely says practically the same thing as is said in the definition though in somewhat different language. By merely giving this Explanation it cannot be said that the State Government has done something which contravenes the express provisions of the Act. In the circumstances, therefore, I am unable to hold that the Schedule is ultra vires of the powers of the State Government.

What remains to be considered is the last point urged by Shri Phadke and that was that art. 19(1)(g) is infringed by the notification. Article 19(1)(g) of the Constitution undoubtedly recognises the fundamental right of every citizen to carry on his trade; but I fail to see how that right is infringed by the making of a notification of the kind we have here. Under this notification, no restriction has been placed or prohibition created against an employer from carrying on his trade. All that the employers are required to do is to pay at certain minimum rates of wages those persons who roll bidis for them. The article does not place any restriction on the power of the Legislature to legislate on the matter and the notification, as already stated, does not transgress the provisions of the Act. I need not say anything further on the point because it was in fact not very seriously pressed in argument. The point which was seriously pressed was the one regarding the vires of the notification itself and with that I have already dealt quite fully.

In this view, therefore, I would dismiss both the petitions with costs.

KOTVAL J. These petitions under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution raise questions of far reaching importance to the bidi industry within the eight districts of the former State of Madhya Pradesh, which for the sake of convenience I shall hereafter refer to as the "Vidarbha Region".

The petitioners claim a writ of certiorari to quash the Notification dated June 11, 1958, published in the Bombay Gazette Extraordinary, dated June 14, 1958, and a writ of mandamus to the Government, directing it not to give effect to that Notification.

It is worthwhile reproducing the entire Notification for convenience of reference. It runs as follows:—

"No. MWA. 1537-J—In exercise of the powers conferred by sub-section (2) of section 5 read with clause (b) of sub-section (1) of that section of the Minimum Wages Act, 1948 (XI of 1948) and after consulting the Advisory Board and in supersession of the former Government of Madhya Pradesh Labour Department Notification No. 564-451-XXIII, dated February 23, 1953, the Government of Bombay hereby revise the minimum rates of wages in respect of the employment in any tobacco (including bidi making) manufactory in the Vidarbha region of the State of Bombay as mentioned in the Schedule hereto annexed and directs that this notification shall come into force with effect from July 1, 1958.

Schedule.

Subject to the other provisions of this Schedule, the revised minimum rates of wages payable to employees per thousand bidis (when leaves are supplied by the employer) shall be as follows: —

Area.	Revised rates in Rs.
(i) Nagpur district	1.60
(ii) Bhandara district	1.62
(iii) Chanda, Akola, Buldana, Yeotmal, Amravati and Wardha districts	1.58

2. For all bidis in which 7 chataks or more of tobacco mixture is used and for those bidis which are known as "Hatnakhun" bidis, there shall be an increase of 12 Naye Paise per 1,000 bidis in the rates mentioned above in all the areas.

3. It shall be within the discretion of the employer to decide which are "chhat" bidis or bad bidis, up to 5 per cent. of the bidis prepared by the employee. If the employer decides that any bidis are "chhat" or bad, the "chhat" or bad bidis up to 5 per cent. shall be destroyed forthwith by the employee and whatever tobacco is recovered from them shall be retained by the employer. If however, the employer wants to retain these "chhat" or bad bidis, he shall pay full wages for the same to the employee.

4. If "chhat" or bad bidis are more than 5 per cent. but less than 10 per cent., and if there is any dispute between the employer and the employee as to whether the "chhat" or bad bidis is done properly or not, equal number of representatives of the employer and the employees shall inspect the "chhat" is done properly or not. If there is any difference of opinion among the representatives of the two sides, the majority opinion shall prevail. If the opinion is equally divided and the employer wants to retain the "chhat" bidis, he shall pay wages for "chhat" bidis between 5 per cent. to 10 per cent. at half the rates fixed above. If the employer does not want to retain these bidis the employee shall destroy them forthwith.

5. The employer shall nominate his representatives and the employees shall elect their representatives.

6. In the case of "chhat" above 10 per cent., the employee shall be entitled to full wages. It shall, however, be open to the employer to take suitable action against the employee if the "chhat" is more than 10 per cent. for 6 continuous working days in a calendar month.

7. The "chhat" shall be made once a day only, at any premises within a distance of not more than 2 miles from the premises where bidis are manufactured.

Explanation:—For the purpose of this Schedule the expression "employer" includes his thekedar, contractor or agent as the case may be.

Prior to the reorganisation of States there were other notifications also issued under the provisions of the Minimum Wages Act (XI of 1958). These Notifications were No. III-132-XXIII dated January 11, 1951, and No. 564-451-XXIII, dated February 23, 1956. These Notifications were superseded by the impugned Notification.

It is to be noticed that the previous notifications exclusively concerned themselves with a fixation of rates of wages per thousand bidis. It is not in dispute between the parties that the standard size of bidis contained six chataks of tobacco per thousand bidis and that the earlier notifications fixed the rates with reference to that standard. The Notification of 1956 provided for additional payment in respect of bidis in which seven chataks or more of tobacco was used. It was also agreed that the same standard has been taken as the basis for the fixation of minimum rates of wages in the present notification.

It may be noted, however, that while cls. 1 and 2 of the Schedule to the present notification fix the minimum rates of wages, cls. 3 to 7 make elaborate provisions for several other matters which were not dealt with in the previous notifications and which constitute the real bone of contention in these petitions.

The attack was primarily directed against cls. 3 to 7 of the Schedule. It was also incidentally urged that the opening words of cl. 1 make cls. 1 and 2 "subject to the other provisions of this Schedule", and, therefore, cls. 1 and 2 cannot be extricated from cls. 3 to 7; and if cls. 3 to 7 are bad, then the whole notification must fail because it is not possible to disentangle the two parts of the notification. This was the only manner in which it was stated that cls. 1 and 2 ought to be declared bad.

It will be seen that cls. 3 to 7 use the word "chhat" and makes elaborate provisions for "chhat". The word "chhat" it was explained, was a convenient substantive used in this particular industry and is derived from the Hindi word "छटन" which means 'to weed out or to pick out and separate'. It may conveniently be translated in English as the right to reject.

Now, curiously enough, the practice of chhat has not been explained in the petition, but the respondents in their returns have adverted to it and the affidavit of respondent No. 2 fully explains it in paras. 3, 4 and 5. There it is explained that for about the last 30 years the system of paying wages to workers employed in the manufacture of bidis is on the basis of piece rates. It was explained that in actual practice, however, the worker was not paid for all the bidis which he prepared. The bidis are subject to scrutiny on two occasions. After bidis are prepared by the workers, they are submitted to a scrutiny of a thekedar in bundles of 25 each. The thekedar rejects bundles which suffer from defect of workmanship and are not of the required standard. Then the thekedar takes the accepted bidis to the employer's factory where the employer scrutinizes the bidis a second time with reference to their quality and workmanship. It was alleged that when the second chhat (rejection) takes place, it is done in the absence of the worker. It was also alleged that the bidis rejected by the employer and not paid for are not returned to the worker but the employer sells them and makes a profit.

It appears from these returns that the bidi industry is mostly carried on as a cottage industry. There are two systems of work. Firstly, the manufacturer has established factories at important places in the areas where the industry is mainly concentrated, viz., Gondia Tahsil and Bhandara District. In these factories workers come and are given tobacco and tendu leaves and thread. They make the bidis and deliver them back each day before leaving the factory. In the case of these factories, the chhat (rejection) is admittedly made only once.

But this is a minor part of the industry. By far the larger part is carried on on a different basis. The employer has established convenient centres in or near the villages from where tobacco, tendu leaves and string are doled out to workers who take these home and manufacture as bidis. Thekedars are appointed to screen the bidis and do the first chhat and then bring the bidis accepted by them for the manufacturer's approval. Thus in this case there is a double chhat.

The practice of chhat as pleaded by the respondents has been admitted on behalf of the employers. At any rate they have not denied the same or the terms thereof and, therefore, the above statements of the respondents must be accepted. It was also admitted that in the case of manufacture at the employee's home (otherwise conveniently referred to as the "घरसाता") there is a double chhat and in respect of bidis manufactured at the factory there is only one chhat. It is clear from these pleadings that these were the terms and conditions on which the work used to be done and constitute the implied contract between the employer and the employees. The arguments of both sides proceeded on that basis.

The other allegations made against the employers regarding exploitation of employees were strongly controverted in the arguments. It was stated on behalf of the employers that they have had to resort to this system in order to provide employment not for any individual worker but for his whole family including his children. One member of the family takes the tobacco, tendu leaves and thread home and gets the bidis manufactured by his wife and children and is thus enabled to utilize the labour of his whole family which otherwise would not be able to earn anything. It was stated that most of these workers were really agriculturists and that they supplemented their meagre incomes from agriculture by this useful cottage industry. In support of this Mr. Phadke also invited our attention to the fact that at one time so much of agricultural labour took to the manufacture of bidis that agriculture declined and the then Government of Madhya Pradesh had actually to intervene by getting legislation passed, prohibiting the migration of agricultural labour to the bidi industry. That was the C.P. and Berar Regulation of Manufacture of Bidis (Agricultural Purposes) Act (LXIV of 1948), which was challenged before the Supreme Court of India in *Chintamanrao v. State of M. P.*¹ and declared ultra vires of art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution by that Court.

It was urged on behalf of the petitioners that in such a system the standard of work is necessarily very low and leads to such damage and waste of materials supplied by the employers because if children and unskilled labour, male and female, work under conditions where there is absolutely no supervision, the work would necessarily not be of a high standard. Therefore it is essential that the employer should scrutinize with care the bidis manufactured because they have to sell their goods in a highly competitive market. What is more, it was stated that most of these "Gharkhata" workers dishonestly pilfer the tobacco, which is the most valuable ingredient in a bidi, put in less tobacco in the bidis offered to the employer, and out of the pilfered tobacco privately manufacture bidis and sell them, thus making illegal gain for themselves. This again is absolutely without restriction or supervision it was urged.

That these were the conditions under which the industry was functioning and gave rise to its own problems and disputes is clear from the documents placed on record on behalf of the Government itself, i.e. from Annexure A which is a report made by the Assistant Commissioner of Labour (Administration), Bombay, (of which date is not clear) and Annexure D, which is the report of the Committee appointed under s. 5 by the Advisory Board from amongst their members for enquiry into the revision of minimum wages. The rival points of view are neatly set forth therein under the heads "Employer's and Employees' points of view".

With the merits of these respective points of view we are not here concerned, but I have stated them at some length in order to show the conditions under which the impugned notification came into being and the peculiar problems which it intended and purported to solve.

There is no doubt that it was in order to check or control the employer's right of chhat and compel him to do the chhat only at a factory, that the provisions of cls. 3 to 7 of the Schedule to the impugned notification were made. This is clear from para. 7 of the affidavit on behalf of respondent No. 2 wherein, after reciting details of the system and its evils from the employees' point of view, it was stated—

"It was in order to avoid this arbitrary and capricious exercise of the powers of employer that the State Government have made provision in clauses 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7 of the Impugned Notification."

To the same effect is the return on behalf of respondent No. 1, State of Bombay. Paragraph 3(a) of their return is as follows:—

"There have been constant disputes among bidi employers and the bidi workers regarding the payment of minimum wages fixed in the Vidarbha region. It is complained that the employers do not pay full value of wages for the bidis prepared by workers. A certain percentage of bidis is rejected on the ground that it is of a sub-normal standard of quality. Constant disputes arise regarding the reasonable percentage of such rejection and the mode, time and place where this selection or rejection should take place. The State Government was, therefore, required to institute an enquiry into these complaints to find out whether it was necessary to revise the minimum wages payable under the Act and the mode of determining such wages."

A similar further statement is to be found in para. 4(e).—

"...it is denied that Government has no power to make provision to fix wages according to the work done in such employments. It is denied that the Government has no power to make provisions for deciding the extent to which the 'chhat' (Reduction) will be permissible or to give directions as to the action to be taken by the employers and the employees in case of disputes regarding the quality of bidis liable to such reduction or rejection. It is submitted that the Government is empowered and is duly bound to fix effective minimum rates of wages in any specified industry. In the bidi industry in Vidarbha region and especially in Bhandara district and factories in Gondia tahsil, there is a recognised practice of making payments on the basis of bidis accepted by employer as coming up to a certain standard of skill. The employers have insisted on their right in principle of rejecting the sub-normal or sub-standard bidis prepared by the employees."

In para. 6(g) it was stated—

"It is submitted that the clauses (3) to (7) of the Schedule makes provision for incidental and supplementary matters connected with the fixation of minimum rates of wages. The minimum rates of wages liable to be fixed under the Act ought to be effective rates of wages. The rates of wages which are paid according to work cannot be effective unless adequate and sufficient provision is made for determining the quantum of outturn liable to rejection on the basis of which the payment is made. Fixation of rates of minimum wages payable for sub-standard bidis or for their rejection is thus an ancillary part of scheme for fixation or revision of the minimum rates of wages in case of bidi manufacturers."

And in para. 6(h)—

"It is further submitted that it is fully within the competence of the authority entitled to fix rates of wages under the Minimum Wages Act, to make adequate provisions for resolution of disputes arising in the mode of calculation of such minimum wages for work done."

It will thus be clear that the notification was issued and is sought to be justified expressly on the ground that the employer's right of chhat had to be checked or controlled and that disputes between employers and employees had to be settled in regard to the right of chhat.

I have reproduced these pleadings at some length because one of the points argued was that these powers are absolutely essential in order to make the revision of the rates of minimum wages effective and that, therefore, they must be deemed to be conferred on the State Government by implication. The only point I may here stress is that it was not alleged by Government that the previous notifications operating till then had become wholly ineffective or nugatory because they did not contain provisions analogous to cls. 3 to 7 of the present notification. On the contrary, what is alleged is that several disputes continued to arise because of those notifications, which can only imply that they were partially effective. As I shall show hereafter, the whole foundation of the rule as to implied powers is the absolute necessity or essentiality for implying them.

The first two clauses of the Schedule to the notification lay down the revised minimum rates of wages for two classes of bidis. The rates are prescribed districtwise. In the notification which was operative immediately prior to the present notification the rates were fixed in greater detail, and, if I may say so, townwise or according to centres of business. The standard employed was also the same viz., thousand bidis containing 6 chhataks of tobacco. The difference in rates between better qualities of bidis containing 7 chhatakas per thousand was also the same viz., now 12 Naye Paise or (what is its equivalent) 2 annas.

These clauses are, in my opinion, a clear and legitimate exercise of the power to fix or revise minimum wages under the Act. Indeed, this much was virtually conceded on behalf of the petitioners. The only argument on which it was claimed that these clauses should be struck down was, as I have stated, that they had been inseparably linked with the remaining cls. 3 to 7 by virtue of the opening words of cl. 1 "Subject to the other provisions of this Schedule". Therefore, that argument would depend upon the view taken in respect of cls. 3 to 7.

Now, it was not disputed by either side that when the bidi is prepared the tendu leaf in which the tobacco is wrapped is more or less green and flexible. It is at this stage that the bidi must be wrapped. After a few days the leaf dries up and becomes brittle and, therefore, once a bidi is rolled it is impossible to salvage the tendu leaf. Therefore it is implicit in the provisions of cl. 3 that if the employer makes a chhat which can only be upto 5 per cent., and decides to accept the first option offered to him, he must lose 5 per cent. of the tendu leaves which he has doled out for the purpose of manufacture to the employee because it is impossible to unroll the tendu leaf after it is dry. It was also suggested that in the process of breaking up the bidi, the most valuable ingredient of the bidi, viz., the tobacco, could not all be retrieved, and that there must be a substantial percentage of wastage and also some mixture with tendu leaf particles and powder. Therefore, by the acceptance of the so-called option the employer stood the risk of (a) definitely losing 5 per cent. of the tendu leaves without payment, (b) getting back the tobacco which he is supposed to recover, of a slightly inferior quality, and (c) not of the identical weight but somewhat less. He may accept these consequences, otherwise he has the second option which only means that he must accept all the rejected bidis and pay full wages for them. The clause clearly controls the right of the employer to reject goods which are of bad workmanship or not marketable, or to pay for the goods according to quality, which was admittedly the system prevailing till the date of the notification.

Clauses 4 and 5 must be read together. Clause 4 deals with rejection of bad bidis of a percentage of more than 5 per cent. but less than 10 per cent. If there is a dispute as to the bidis rejected in this slab, then a sort of domestic tribunal has been set up to try the issue. The tribunal is to consist of equal number of representatives of employees and the employer who are to inspect whether the rejection was properly done or not, and in the event of difference of opinion, the opinion of the majority is to prevail. If the opinion of the tribunal is divided, then the employer has an option to retain the 5-10 per cent. chhat and pay half the rates fixed or an alternative option not to retain it, in which case the employees should destroy the bidis forthwith. Clause 5 deals with the manner of selection of the personnel of the domestic tribunal.

Incidentally, there was a short point raised as to the interpretation of the last paragraph of this clause. The learned Special Government Pleader urged that it could not be the intention of the clause that bidis should be wholly destroyed, but it must be read in terms of a similar provision in cl. 3, that is to say, that 5-10 per cent. chhat bidis qua bidis should be destroyed, but that the employer is to get back the tobacco. That may have been the intention of the framer of the notification, but the language used does not warrant such a construction. It says "If the employer does not want to retain these bidis the employee shall destroy them forthwith". The use of the word "them" can only refer to the bidis inclusive of the tobacco and not give the employer the right to retrieve the tobacco.

Now, it was urged that the provision for this so-called domestic tribunal is wholly illusory. Conditions being what they are, the representatives of the employer and the employees will never see eye to eye and, therefore, the employer must accept the goods paying half rates to them though they may be absolutely worthless or have the bidis destroyed entirely.

For the purposes of the decision of the questions arising in these cases, however, these contentions are not all germane. What it is necessary to emphasize is that cls. 4 and 5 of the Schedule to the notification again control the right of the employer not to pay for bad workmanship or at any rate to pay according to quality. These clauses also give power to set up domestic tribunal and to adjudicate a dispute which is essentially an industrial dispute. These powers will, therefore, have to be examined.

Turning to cl. 6, it provides that where the chhat is above 10 per cent. the employee shall be paid full wages. But here again the employer is given an option. He can take action against a bad workman provided the chhat in the case of that workman is "more than 10 per cent. for 6 continuous working days in a calendar month". If he cannot take such action he is bound to pay for all the bidis above 10 per cent. even if they be of bad workmanship or contain little or no tobacco and whether they are suitable for purposes of smoking or not.

Now, it was argued that under law every seventh day must be a holiday. Therefore, under the second part of cl. 6 the workman can continue to do as much bad work as he likes for five days in a week provided he does good work on the sixth day, in which case the option cannot be availed of by the employer. I find much substance in this contention. The right of action given to the employer is wholly illusory. What action should be taken is also not shown. Presumably, it could only be action according to law, that is to say, under the Standing Orders which in their turn do not justify imposition of a penalty except for gross negligence which has to be established in a departmental enquiry. All this is provided where the "chhat" is more than 10 per cent. for six continuous working days in a calendar month, which will be a rare occasion.

Again I emphasize that with these minor details of the notification I am not immediately concerned. What is of importance to note is that cl. 6 of the Schedule to the notification virtually enjoins that the employer cannot reject goods above 10 per cent. In other words, it is clear that the employer has to pay for 90 per cent. of the bidis even though they are of bad workmanship, defective for any reason such as little or no tobacco in some of them or the leaves broken so that it cannot be smoked. I shall advert to this clause again. It was really on these cls. 3, 4 and 6 that the learned Special Government Pleader found the greatest difficulty in justifying the notification under the express powers conferred by the Act and was, therefore, impelled to support them under the doctrine of implied powers.

Clause 7 prescribes that chhat shall be made only once in a day by the employer and it shall be at any premises within two miles from the premises where bidis are manufactured. This is an incidental provision intended to hit the double right of chhat to which I have referred above—once by the thekedar and once at the factory—which the employer used to exercise in case of bidis manufactured by the employee at his home, and to stop the practice of chhat at any place other than a factory. The clause does not say this, but having regard to the existing conditions it was urged that it has that effect. The worker works in his home which is separate in every village and the factories or centres established by the employer are not within two miles of the majority of villages. So the employer can never do the second chhat at the factory (a) because the factory or centre is beyond two miles of the worker's home, and (b) because he cannot remove the goods from the home to the centre or factory within a day. The provision, therefore, inevitably and directly affects the existing terms and conditions of work and the right to reject goods of bad quality or workmanship or to pay only according to the quality of the work.

Then there is the explanation which defines "employer" and includes his thekedar, contractor or agent as the case may be. As to this clause it was urged that there is no power to define the very word which is defined by the Act. On behalf of the State, however, the learned Special Government Pleader supported the explanation by urging that it was not in conflict with the definition in the Act, and was merely in terms thereof. He urged that it may be regarded as mere surplusage. No doubt, comparing the two definitions of "employer" in the Act and in the notification, it could be said that the notification does not go beyond the definition in s. 2(e) of the Act. But there is a vital difference and that difference is brought out if we consider the opening words of the interpretation clause in s. 2 "Unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context". Those crucial words are omitted in the notification and, therefore, so far as the definition in the notification is concerned, whether the context otherwise implies or not, the word "employer" shall always include thekedar, contractor or agent. This is, in my opinion, a substantial departure from the provisions of the Act and in this light the power to do so will have to be examined.

To summarise, an analysis of the provisions of the notification shows the exercise of the following powers:—

(a) The power to compel the employer to accept all bidis up to 90 per cent. and so to circumscribe the employer's right to reject bad or worthless goods, not to pay for unsaleable goods or to pay only according to the quality of the work or goods. (Clauses 3, 4, 5 and 6 of the Schedule to the notification).

(b) To provide for the settlement of disputes (clauses 4 and 5).

(c) To constitute an arbitral tribunal for the settlement of those disputes (clauses 4 and 5).

(d) To prescribe the mode and place of rejection of goods, or in other words, the right of the employer to select the place where his business shall be carried on (clause 7).

(e) To alter the definition of the word "employer" as given in the Act. (the Explanation).

Mr. Phadke on behalf of the petitioners urged that none of these powers are conferred upon the State Government by the provisions of the Act and that, therefore, the notification in ultra vires of the powers under the Act. He also urged that the promulgation of this notification has affected the employer's right to carry on his occupation, trade or business under art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution. He further urged that the procedure prescribed by the Act in s. 5 read with ss. 7, 8 and 9 had not been complied with and, therefore, the notification was bad. The learned Special Government Pleader on behalf of the State; Mr. M. N. Chandurkar on behalf of respondent No. 2, the Independent Labour Party's the C.P. and Berar Bidi Workers' Union, and Mr. S. V. Dhabe on behalf of the Intervenor, the M. P. Rashtriya Bidi Majdoor Sangh, controverted these points. Mr. Abhyankar raised an additional issue, namely, that even if the notification could not be justified under the express powers under the Act, those powers were implied. They must be regarded as ancillary to the powers under the Act and, therefore, the notification would be justified as a legitimate exercise of the implied powers of the Government. With the arguments of Messrs Qazi and Dhabe, my learned Brother has amply dealt, and I am in respectful agreement with his conclusions.

Thus, five points arise for decision in these cases:—

(1) Are any of the clauses of the Schedule to the notification ultra vires of the powers of Government under the Minimum Wages Act (XI of 1948)?

(2) If any of them cannot be justified under the express powers under the Act, can the notification or any of its provisions be justified under the implied powers under the Act?

(3) Is the notification ultra vires of art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution?

(4) Was the procedure laid down by the Act for the promulgation of such a notification followed, and if not, what is its effect?

(5) If one or more clauses of the notification are found ultra vires what should be the effect?

So far as the first point is concerned, my learned Brother has held that none of the provisions of the notification or its Schedule can be justified under the express provisions of the Act. On this point I am, with respect, in complete agreement with him so far as cls. 3 to 7 of the Schedule to the notification are concerned. None of those clauses can be justified under the provisions of the Act. But, in my opinion, cls. 1 and 2 of the Schedule are good and directly flow from the express powers granted under the Act. My learned Brother has, however, held the entire notification valid and has justified it under the doctrine of implied powers. On both the questions it is, therefore, necessary to refer to the scope and object of the Act and to some of its important provisions.

In *S.I.E.L.R. Organisation v. Madras State*²—a case which was referred to by the Supreme Court of India in *Bijay Cotton Mills Ltd. v. The State of Ajmer*³—Venkatarama Aiyar J. traced the genesis of the Minimum Wages Act, 1948 (XI of 1948). He said that it was passed in consequence of the "Minimum Wage Fixing Machinery Convention" held at Geneva in 1928 and certain resolutions passed at the Convention which were embodied in arts. 223 to 228 of the International Labour Code, Vol. I, pages 167 to 174. He stated that—

"The object of these resolutions was to fix minimum wages in industries 'in which no arrangements exist for the effective regulation of wages by collective agreement or otherwise, and wages are exceptionally low.' Article 224(1), p. 169. The Minimum Wages Act was passed for giving effect to these resolutions. The preamble to the Act states that 'It is expedient to provide for fixing minimum rates of wages in certain employments'; and they are specified in Part I of the Schedule. As remarked in 'Industrial Awards in India, an Analysis'

"The Act aims at making provision for the statutory fixation of minimum rates of wages in a number of industries wherein 'sweated labour' is most prevalent or where there is a big chance of exploitation of labour."

"Thus the object of the Act is to provide for fixation of wages in trades in which labour is not organised and that will be clear from the list of trades enumerated in Part I to the Schedule."

Now, a scrutiny of the provisions of the Act will indicate that it is just this and no more that the Act gives power to do. The power and indeed the duty on the part of the appropriate Government to fix minimum rates of wages in employments specified in parts I and II of the Schedule to the Act is laid down in s. 3(1)(a) and the proviso permits the appropriate Government to fix such rates for a part of the State or for any specified class or classes of such employments in the whole State or part thereof. Clause (b) of sub-s. (1) of s. 3 gives the power under certain conditions to review and revise the minimum rates if necessary. Sub-section (2) of s. 3 describes the kinds of rates that may be fixed. They are minimum rates of wages for

(a) Time work—called "a minimum rate."

(b) Piece-work—called "a minimum piece-rate".

(c) The minimum rate of remuneration in the case of employees employed on piece-work for the purpose of securing to them a minimum rate of wages on a time work basis—called "a guaranteed time-rate".

(d) In respect of over-time work—called "an over-time rate".

While the duty to fix rates under sub-s. (1) of s. 3 is preceded by the word "shall" and is, therefore, mandatory, the power to review and revise under cl. (b) of sub-s. (1) of s. 3 as also the power to fix different kinds of rates in sub-s. (2) of s. 3 are preceded by the word "may" giving a discretion to the appropriate Government. Then follow the provisions of s. 3, sub-s. (3), which are as follows:—

"(3) In fixing or revising minimum rates of wages under this section,—

(a) a different minimum rates of wages may be fixed for—

(i) different scheduled employments;

(ii) different classes of work in the same scheduled employment;

(iii) adults, adolescents, children and apprentices;

(iv) different localities;

(b) minimum rates of wages may be fixed by any one or more of the following wage periods, namely:—

(i) by the hour,

(ii) by the day,

(iii) by the month, or

(iv) by such other larger wages period as may be prescribed and where such rates are fixed by the day or by the month, the manner of calculating wages for a month or for a day, as the case may be, may be indicated.

Provided that where any wage-periods have been fixed under section 4 of the Payment of Wages Act, 1936 (IV of 1936), minimum wages shall be fixed in accordance therewith."

Thus s. 3, sub-s. 3(b)(iv) expressly prescribes "the manner of calculating" wages in particular cases. The necessary implication is that in other cases e.g. in the case of piece rates, no power to prescribe the manner of calculation or mode of payment is granted.

Section 4 indicates the components of the minimum rates of wages that the appropriate Government has been empowered to fix depending on the cost of living index number and the cash value of concessions in respect of supplies of essential commodities at concession rates.

These provisions prescribing the duties and powers of the appropriate Government to fix, review and revise the minimum rates of wages are governed by the definition of "wages" in s. 2(h). That definition is as follows:—

"2. In this Act, unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context,—

(h) 'wages' means all remuneration, capable of being expressed in terms of money, which would, if the terms of the contract of employment, express or implied, were fulfilled, be payable to a person employed in respect of his employment or of work done in such employment, and includes house-rent allowance but does not include—

(i) the value of—

(a) any house-accommodation, supply of light, water, medical attendance; or

(b) any other amenity or any service excluded by general or special order of the appropriate Government;

(ii) any contribution paid by the employer to any Pension Fund or Provident Fund or under any scheme of social insurance;

(iii) any travelling allowance or the value of any travelling concession;

(iv) any sum paid to the person employed to defray special expenses entailed on him by the nature of his employment; or

(v) any gratuity payable on discharge;"

The definition is plenary and overriding. It defines wages with reference to the contract of employment, express or implied, and states that wages shall mean all remuneration, capable of being expressed in terms of money, which would, if the terms of the contract of employment, express or implied, were fulfilled, be payable etc. Therefore, the definition, in my opinion, indicates clearly that the Act does not intend to abolish or give a complete go-by to the terms of the contract of employment subsisting between the employer and the employee. The effect of this definition is on the other hand to recognize the contract except in so far as the provisions of the Act modify it. Thus, the Act seeks to establish within its scope and object, a balance between the rights under the contract and the statutory rights curtailing the contract. My learned Brother has in para. 24 of his opinion held that that the definition cannot be construed as limiting or taking away the implied power of the State Government to make provisions of the kind we find in the Schedule to the notification, and that "in a sense it is descriptive of the term wages."

With respect, I am unable to accept this interpretation which is, in my opinion, contrary to the very terms of s. 2(h). Section 2(h) says "Wages means" which can only connote that a definition is intended and not a description. I shall show hereafter that the implied powers can only flow from the express powers and then too by necessary intendment alone and that in no case can powers be implied which are contrary to the express provisions of the statute.

In both ss. 3 and 4 the words used throughout are "minimum rates of wages" and, therefore, a point was taken by the learned Special Government Pleader that the word "wages" which is defined in s. 2(h), has not the same connotation as the word "wages" in the expression "minimum rates of wages" and, therefore, the definition should not be incorporated into all the clauses of ss. 3 and 4 which speak of minimum rates of wages.

I am unable to accept this contention. In the first place, it will render the definition virtually nugatory because it will cease to apply to ss. 3(1)(a) and (b), s. 3(2) and s. 3(3), so that the very purpose for which the definition was incorporated would fail. In the second place, the argument advanced suggests that the expression "minimum rates of wages" is a term of art in contradistinction with the definition of "wages". The expression "minimum rates of wages" is not defined in the Act, and, in my opinion, there is no warrant for the suggestion that it has some peculiar connotation other than that implied by plain English. In my opinion, wherever the word "wages" occurs in the expression "minimum rates of wages" it must be read as defined in s. 2(h). Thus it seems clear to me that the duty and power of the appropriate Government (a) to fix, review and revise minimum rates [Section 3(1)]; (b) to fix the classes of rates [section 3(2)]; (c) to apply them to different employments in classes of work [section 3(3)]; and (d) to different wage periods [section 3(3)(b)]—are all subject to the contract between the employer and the employee. It is a fundamental provision under the Act, therefore, that the contract between the employer and the employee governs and shall continue to govern save and except that it is modified by the exercise by the appropriate Government of the express powers given under the Act. I stress this point here because it seems to me that it must have a most decisive effect on the question of the implied powers of Government.

Section 5, sub-a. (1) deals with the procedure for fixing minimum rates and the two methods to be followed by the appropriate Government viz. (a) either to appoint committees or sub-committees to hold enquiries and advise the Government in the fixation or revision of minimum rates of wages or (b) to publish its proposals for the information of persons likely to be affected thereby and specify a certain date—not less than two months from the date of the notifications on which the proposals will be taken into consideration. Sub-section (2) requires a notification to be issued by the appropriate Government fixing or revising the minimum rates of wages and makes provision for the coming into force of the notification. The proviso to sub-a. (2) of s. 5 makes it obligatory on Government to consult the Advisory Board when it has not appointed a committee or committees to hold enquiries and advise it. Upon the provisions of this section was founded the argument under point No. 4 mentioned above. Sections 7, 8 and 9 provide for the setting up and powers of the Advisory Board, the Central Advisory Board and the committees and sub-committees. Section 10 provides for correction of errors, omissions, and accidental slips in Government notifications. Then we come to s. 12 on which the greatest reliance was placed on behalf of the State to justify the provisions of their notification under the express powers conferred by the statute. I need not refer to its provisions because my learned Brother has fully dealt with that argument and negatived any power in the State Government to make provisions such as are contained in the Schedule under s. 12.

Then I turn to ss. 20 and 21 of the Act which, in my opinion, are again important. They run as follows:—

"20. (1) The appropriate Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, appoint any Commissioner for Workmen's Compensation or any officer of the Central Government exercising functions as a Labour Commissioner for any region, or any officer of the State Government not below the rank of Labour Commissioner or any other officer with experience as a Judge of a Civil Court or as a stipendiary Magistrate to be the Authority to hear and decide for any specified area all claims arising out of payment of less than the minimum rates of wages or in respect of the payment of remuneration for days of rest or for work done on such days under clause (b) or clause (c) of sub-section (1) of section 13 or the wages at the overtime rate under section 14, to employees employed or paid in that area.

(2) Where an employee has any claim of the nature referred to in sub-section (1) the employee himself, or any legal practitioner or any official of a registered trade union authorised in writing to act on his behalf, or any Inspector, or any person acting with the permission of the Authority appointed under sub-section (1), may apply to such Authority for a direction under sub-section (3):

Provided that every such application shall be presented within six months from the date on which the minimum wages or other amount became payable;

Provided further that any application may be admitted after the said period of six months when the applicant satisfies the Authority that he had sufficient cause for not making the application within such period.

(3) When any application under sub-section (2) is entertained, the Authority shall hear the applicant and the employer, or give them an opportunity of being heard, and after such further inquiry if any as it may consider necessary, may, without prejudice to any other penalty to which the employer may be liable under this Act, direct;

(i) in the case of a claim arising out of a payment of less than minimum rates of wages, the payment to the employee of the amount by which the minimum wages payable to him exceed the amount actually paid, together with the payment of such compensation as the Authority may think fit, not exceeding ten times the amount of such excess;

(ii) in any other case, the payment of the amount due to the employee, together with the payment of such compensation as the Authority may think fit, not exceeding ten rupees; and the Authority may direct payment of such compensation in cases where the excess or the amount due is paid by the employer to the employee before the disposal of the application.

(4) If the Authority hearing any application under this section is satisfied that it was either malicious or vexatious, it may direct that a penalty not exceeding fifty rupees be paid to the employer by the person presenting the application.

(5) Any amount directed to be paid under this section may be recovered—

(a) if the Authority is a Magistrate, by the Authority as if it were a fine imposed by the Authority as a Magistrate, or

(b) if the Authority is not a Magistrate, by any Magistrate to whom the Authority makes application in this behalf, as if it were a fine imposed by such Magistrate.

(6) Every direction of the Authority under this section shall be final.

(7) Every Authority appointed under sub-section (1) shall have all the powers of a civil Court under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (V of 1908), for the purpose of taking evidence and of enforcing the attendance of witnesses and compelling the production of documents, and every such authority shall be deemed to be a civil Court for all the purposes of section 185 and Chap. XXXV of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898 (V of 1898).

21. (1) Subject to such rules as may be prescribed, a single application may be presented under section 20 on behalf or in respect of any number of employees employed in the scheduled employment in respect of which minimum rates of wages have been fixed and in such cases the maximum compensation which may be awarded under sub-section (3) of section 20 shall not exceed ten times the aggregate amount of such excess, or ten rupees per head, as the case may be.

(2) The Authority may deal with any number of separate pending applications presented under section 20 in respect of employees in the scheduled employments in respect of which minimum rates of wages have been fixed, as a single application presented under sub-section (1) of this section and provisions of that sub-section shall apply accordingly."

I have reproduced these sections verbatim in order to show that the Act has made the most detailed provisions for the settlement of all claims arising out of payment of less than the minimum rates of wages. It is impossible to overlook the amplitude of the powers conferred upon the Authority set up to hear and decide disputes regarding minimum wages.

The remedy provided for the employee is so simple that not only an illiterate employee but any legal practitioner, any official of a registered trade union, any Inspector, or even any person acting with the permission of the Authority could move in the matter. By cl. (i) of sub-s. (3) of s. 20, the Authority makes a summary enquiry into a claim arising out of a payment of less than the minimum rates of wages, has the power to reimburse short payment to the employee together with such compensation as the Authority may think fit, not exceeding ten times the amount unpaid. It has also got the power under s. 20, sub-s. (3), sub-cl. (ii); to hear and decide a dispute in "any other case" and to order the payment of the amount due to the employee, together with such compensation as the Authority may think fit, not exceeding Rs. 10. Sub-section (5) of s. 20 gives the Authority the power to recover the amount ordered to be paid to the employee as if it were a fine imposed, or to entrust it to a Magistrate to recover it as such. Sub-section 6 of s. 20 makes every direction of the authority final. Section 20 permits one application to be made in respect of any number of employees and the Authority is given the power by sub-s. (2) of s. 21 to consolidate any number of separate pending applications in respect of employees and treat them as a single application.

Thus the Act has given the most anxious consideration to providing a very effective, speedy and cheap remedy for the enforcement of the rights of the employees to receive minimum wages and in "any other case" also. So wide are the powers of the Authority that it can adjudicate upon almost any and every claim in relation to wages and grant redress. It may do so not merely in the case of an individual employee, but, if need be, in the case of any number of employees. It is even possible to decide questions relating to the entire industry itself, by virtue of s. 21.

I shall show hereafter that almost everyone of the provisions of cls. 3 to 7 of the notification Schedule would fall within the provisions of ss. 20 and 21 and would really be questions which the Act says the Authority alone shall decide. By thus defining the power and jurisdiction of the Authority to whom special jurisdiction is given the sections necessarily delimit the power of the Government to decide or deal with the same questions by a mere notification. These considerations, in my opinion, have an important bearing on the question of implied powers.

The so-called doctrine of implied powers is, in my opinion, not a rule of substantive law. It is merely a rule of construction or interpretation. The leading case is *Fenton v. Hampton*⁴, an authority which my learned Brother has referred to and relied upon. At page 41 of the Revised Reports, after quoting the Latin maxim 'Quando lex aliquid concedit concedere videtur et illud sine quo res ipsa esse non potest' (the equivalent of which Broom has translated for us 'Whoever grants a thing is deemed also to grant that without which the grant itself would be of no effect'—See pages 309 and 313 of Broom's Legal Maxims, 10th ed.) Pollock, C.B., states the rule thus:—

"It becomes, therefore, all important to consider the true import of this maxim, and the extent to which it has been applied. After the fullest research which I have been able to bestow, I take the matter to stand thus: whenever anything is authorized, and especially if, as a matter of duty, required to be done by law, and it is found impossible to do that thing unless something else not authorized in express terms be also done, then that something else will be supplied by necessary intendment. But, if, when the maxim comes to be applied adversely to the liberties or interests of others, it be found that no such impossibility exists, that the power may be legally exercised without the doing that something else, or even going a step farther, that it is only in some particular instances, as opposed to its general operation, that the law falls in its intention, unless the enforcing power be supplied, then, in any such case, the soundest rules of construction point to the exclusion of the maxim, and regard the absence of the power which it would supply by implication as a casus emissus." (Italics are mine.)

To the same effect are the observations in *The Trolly Draymen and Carters Union of Sydney and Suburbs v. The Master Carriers Association of N.S.W.*⁵ That was a case wherein an award made under the Industrial Arbitration Act (N.S.W.), 1901, by a Court of Arbitration appointed under the Act was called in question. Clause 27 of the Award prescribed that the employer shall employ members of the claimant Union in preference to strangers (that is to say persons who were not members of the Union) other things being equal, and it was argued on behalf of the employers that this meant that the employer had to give notice to the Union before they could engage a servant and amounted to an undue interference with the liberty of the employer to engage a servant without giving notice. This contention was sought to be met, on behalf of the Workers' Union, by suggesting that such a provision must necessarily be implied in order to make the Act and the award effective. Chief Justice Griffith, in delivering the judgment, negatived the implied power in the following words (p. 516) :—

"Such a condition would involve, of course, a remarkable interference with the liberty of the employer, that he should not be allowed to engage a servant without giving notice of his intention to do so. For, whether the prescribed notice was public or private, there would be no difference in principle. In considering the question whether such a provision is to be implied in the Act, it is important to bear in mind that, if it is, the discretion of the Court is unlimited and cannot be controlled. Is it a necessary inference from what the Legislature has said that it did intend to confer such a power? I confess that I cannot see any foundation for the argument... Except so far as they are empowered to do so by the provisions of the Act, the Court cannot control the common law rights of the subject." (Italics are mine.)

I may also here usefully refer to the following passages from Maxwell's Interpretation of Statutes (the italics are throughout mine) :—

At p. 361: "Where an Act confers a jurisdiction, it impliedly also grants the power of doing all such acts, or employing such means, as are essentially necessary to its execution."

At p. 362: "In the same way, when powers, privileges, or property are granted by statute, everything indispensable to their exercise or enjoyment is impliedly granted also as it would be in a grant between private persons."

But after stating these propositions Maxwell states a further qualification in the following words :—

At p. 364: "But when an Act confers such powers, it also impliedly requires that they shall be exercised only for the purposes for which they were given and subject to the conditions which it prescribes, and also with due skill and diligence and in a way to prevent a needless mischief or injury."

There is also the following powerful statement of the rule as to implications in Crawford on "Statutory Constructions" at page 266, Article 168 :—

"168. Implications.—The implications and intendments arising from the language of a statute are as much a part of it as if they had been expressed. But it is only necessary implications which may thus be read into the statute. Mere desirability or plausibility alone will not meet the test. And while the implication does not need to shut out every other possible conclusion, or be one from which there is no escape, it must be one, which, under all the circumstances, is compelled by a reasonable view of the statute, and the contrary of which would be improbable and absurd. In order to meet the test, the implication must be so strong in its probability that the contrary thereof cannot be reasonably supposed. Nor can implications contradict the expressed intent of the statute, for obviously the intent as expressed must prevail over the intent reached by implication. If the intent is expressed, there is nothing that can be implied. Nothing further is needed to reveal the legislative intent."

The reason for allowing the Court to give effect to necessary implications is quite apparent. Many matters of minor detail are often omitted from legislation. If these details could not be inserted by implication, the drafting of legislation would be an interminable process and the legislative intent would likely be defeated by a most insignificant omission. Consequently, these minor details are considered as if included in the general terms of the enactment as well as in the purpose sought to be achieved by the legislature, and therefore, are regarded as actually intended by the legislature. In a broad sense, true implications are as much a part of the language which makes up the statute as the meanings of the various words are a part of it. Viewed from this standpoint, no exception is created to the general rule that the intent of the law-makers must be derived from the language used in the enactment. And the court in ascertaining a necessary implication is simply determining and making effective the legislative will."

It is, in my opinion, clear from these passages that the doctrine can be applied only where the following conditions are fulfilled:—

- (1) There must be a duty imposed or power prescribed.
- (2) On a reasonable construction of the statute there must be an impossibility in the exercise or fulfilment of that power, resulting in making its object or purpose nugatory.
- (3) The impossibility must be such that it is not an impossibility in an individual case because then the law cannot permit powers by implication but the impossibility must be of a general nature so that the purpose and object of the duty or power is rendered impossible of achievement in every case. It is only then that powers by implication may be inferred.

These points, I believe, are the same as my learned Brother has deduced from the decided cases and other statements of law. But with all respect to him, I would add a fourth condition which is also deducible from the statement of Maxwell at page 364 and the passage from Crawford. I would formulate the fourth condition as follows:—

- (4) The implication cannot contradict the expressed intent which must always prevail and where it becomes necessary to read an implication into an enactment the scope of the implication must be limited only to what is reasonably necessary and no more.

It is in the recognition of the 4th and the application of the last three conditions that my learned Brother and I differ.

Now, I have already indicated that the purpose and object of the Act is to provide minimum wages for employees and no more. For achieving this limited object the Act makes exhaustive provisions. It states what Government shall and shall not do in its duty to fix and in the exercise of its powers to revise and review minimum wages.

Government must initially have regard to the terms of the contract of employment. This is fundamental and implicit in the definition of "wages." Government can certainly affect and modify the contract so long as it exercises its express powers. Indeed, every time a minimum rate is prescribed the contract must be affected. But the right to affect or modify the contract is expressly limited to the powers under the Act. Government must confine itself to the four classes of rates specified in sub-s. (2) of s. 3. Government may prescribe different rates for different scheduled employments or for different classes of work in the same scheduled employment; or for different localities; it may prescribe different rates for adults, adolescents, children and apprentices; it may fix the rates by the hour, the day, the month or a longer period. But save and except these express powers the Act prescribes that the contract shall continue to operate. Therefore there is no scope for any implication. It is never assumed that the Legislature has given powers which would infringe existing rights, even though the Act would be inoperative without them—See Halsbury Vol. 31, page 545, Article 723. Government has not been given the power to modify the contract of employment to such an extent as to give them the power to order the employer to accept bad work and pay full wages for it as is done in cls. 3 to 6 of the Schedule to the notification; or to set up a domestic tribunal as is done in cl. 4; or to decide an industrial dispute (Clause 4 again); or to define "employer" in any manner different from the Act. Secondly, if the Legislature has intended to confer these powers on Government, it is reasonable to presume that they would have done so, in clear language, especially when they conferred several other powers. Therefore, in my opinion, there is no scope for implication of any further powers. The Act confers powers and delimits them itself by its express provisions.

The Legislature moreover was not unaware that consequent upon the provision of minimum rates of wages in any employment several incidental and ancillary problems and disputes would arise. For these also the statute has made every provision. It has relegated all such problems and disputes for decision by the Authority constituted under s. 20. The Legislature was aware that such ancillary problems and disputes would arise and would be infinite in their variety. It is clear that the Legislature did not intend that Government should have the power to solve all such problems and resolve all such disputes through the simple expedient of a notification. If such power can be attributed to Government, even by implication, then the provisions of ss. 20 and 21 would be rendered largely nugatory and the wide jurisdiction conferred upon the Authority rendered practically useless. The very constitution of the Authority, the wide jurisdiction conferred upon it, the amplitude of its powers and the efficacy and expeditiousness of the remedies it can provide are indicative of no other intention but that the Authority alone shall be the forum where all such ancillary disputes and "claims" shall be decided. That necessarily excludes the inference of any power in Government to do so by notification.

The statute creates new duties and imposes new obligations and liabilities and at the same time prescribes a new remedy and creates a new forum for its enforcement. In such cases the general rule is "that no remedy can be taken but the particular remedy prescribed" and only before the particular forum. (See Article 740, page 551 of Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. 31).

In *Barracrough v. Brown*⁶ Lord Watson stated the rule as follows (p. 622):—

"...The right and the remedy are given uno flatu, and one cannot be dissociated from the other. By these words the Legislature has, in my opinion, committed to the summary court exclusive jurisdiction, not merely to ~~assess~~ the amount of expenses to be repaid to the under-taker, but to determine by whom the amount is payable; and has therefore by plain implication, enacted that no other Court has any authority to entertain or decide these matters."

These remarks would a fortiori apply to a case where the question is whether a special quasi-judicial tribunal has a certain jurisdiction or whether it vests in executive Government to provide for the same matters by notifications.

The power to revise minimum wages has, in my opinion, been well and truly exercised by the State Government in cls. 1 and 2 of the Schedule to the notification. These clauses are justified under their powers under s. 3 read with s. 5(2). But the further argument is that unless the several provisions incorporated in cls. 3 to 7 of the Schedule are made, it will be impossible to give effect to cls. 1 and 2 and the duties and powers of Government under s. 3 of the Act. It was urged that having regard to the circumstances of this industry and the terms and conditions on which work was being done, these powers were absolutely necessary to be implied.

I have already adverted to the provisions of the Act and especially to ss. 20 and 21, and I have there shown that these sections were advisedly so widely expressed that the Authority has the power to investigate all claims arising out of payment of less than the minimum rate of wages. In view of the setting up of such an authority by the Act itself, was it really essential for Government to have made the provisions contained in cls. 3 to 7? If Government found that the employer was exercising his power of rejection to an unconscionable degree or was illegally taking the bad bidis and clandestinely selling them for gain, it was a clear case where the employer by these practices was depriving the employee of the minimum rate of wages prescribed by cls. 1 and 2; because under cls. 1 and 2, the employer would be bound to pay for all bidis, manufactured by the employee. Therefore, if the employer only accepted good bidis; took away free of charge the bad bidis and sold them, he did not pay for them. Therefore that would result in a non-payment or payment of less than the minimum rate of wages. That would immediately give rise to a claim that less than the minimum rate of wages has been paid and so give jurisdiction to the Authority. Similarly, if the employer unduly or excessively rejected bidis acceptable by the standards of any reasonable man, the employer was either not paying or paying less than the minimum rate of wages. For all such claims the Act has provided a remedy and a forum for adjudication, in ss. 20 and 21.

But by the notification Government is virtually adjudicating the dispute which properly falls within the purview and powers of the authority under s. 20 in anticipation of its having arisen. It virtually assumes that the employer will continue to do excessive "chhat" and that a dispute on that score is bound to arise and therefore the notification proceeds to lay down that the employer shall not reject more than five per cent. If he rejects between five and ten per cent. it shall be adjudicated by the arbitral tribunal set up, and lastly that the employer shall in no case reject more than 10 per cent. and pay for 90 per cent. of the bidis whatever their quality. That in my opinion is the true meaning of cl. 6 though it may be couched in a language which may make it appear innocuous. The employer is enjoined to pay full wages in case of chhat above 10 per cent., which can only mean that he must accept the work even if bad. He has hardly an option of rejection when he must pay for it, in any case.

A notification is never an adequate substitute for an adjudication judicial or quasi-judicial. A notification is rigid and inelastic and can never have regard to the merits and demerits of individual cases or classes or categories of employments, whereas a tribunal can always take peculiar circumstances into account—circumstances which may be special to an individual or a class of workmen or to a class or classes of work. It is not surprising therefore that the Legislature advisedly chose to grant the latter remedy for adjudication of disputes and by implication negatived the former. In these very cases, to take an example, if in the case of an individual worker should the employer reject, say 50 per cent. of the bidis, it may be that the employer is right because work can be as bad as that in given cases. In such a case, under the Act the tribunal can adjudicate whether such a rejection is proper and fair, but the notification makes that impossible, and leads to the possible, but none the less alarming, result that all the bad work of whatever kind upto 90 per cent. must be paid for in full.

On behalf of the State the learned Special Government Pleader pointed out a number of difficulties in the implementation of cls. 1 and 2, in view of which, he said, cls. 3 to 7 became necessary. He urged that most of the labour is illiterate and uneducated, that they are left to the mercy of unscrupulous and scheming employers who have the means to litigate and harass the worker, and therefore the machinery set up under ss. 20 and 21 is in most cases rendered useless to make the rates of minimum wages effective. In my opinion, it is precisely for this reason that the Legislature made the powers of the Authority so wide and all embracing, and the procedure so simple that even an ignorant employee could easily avail of it, and what is more necessary to emphasize is that any Inspector could move on their behalf. Therefore, Government has merely to maintain vigilance and order the Inspector to take immediate action on behalf of the employees if any one or more of these practices continued, resulting in payment to employees of anything less than the minimum rate of wages. That is the way indicated by the Act and not by a notification which can hardly take into account the variety of cases that may arise. There is also in the industry a trade union which can move through any of its officers. There is no reason to suppose therefore that the rates of minimum wages fixed by cls. 1 and 2 of the Schedule to the notification will not be made effective without cls. 3 to 7. A similar attempt to prescribe the mode or procedure was made in a notification dealt with in the case in *P. G. Chakravarty v. Manager, Bewan Tea Estate*⁷ and was rightly struck down. The case is very apposite here.

But, as I have said, the question here is not a question of a nice balancing of probabilities. Having regard to the rule as to implied powers, the question here is whether it will be impossible to ensure the payment of minimum wages prescribed by cls. 1 and 2 unless cls. 3 to 7 are there. I have already said that in my opinion all these are really questions which may only give rise to disputes and do not show that the rates would be impossible to enforce. Thus these questions fall within the purview of the authority under ss. 20 and 21, which provide a cheap, effective and adequate remedy. It seems to me then entirely unnecessary to concede such powers in favour of Government, quite apart from the fact that it would also be contrary to the clear intention of the Legislature.

In para. 14 of his opinion my learned Brother has stated that "the intention of the State Government to enable a bidi worker to get Re. 1 and 60 nP for 1000 bidis rolled by him would be frustrated if the employer were to reject 500 bidis out of those rolled by him on the ground that they are below standard and then to utilize those bidis himself by selling them in the market."

With the greatest respect, I am unable to see how in the face of ss. 20 and 21 the intention of Government will be frustrated because the employer rejects 500 out of 1,000 bidis and then sells them privately. The Inspector of Government or the worker or any of the other agencies mentioned, has only got to lay the facts before the Authority and the question whether the employer rightly or wrongly rejected the 500 bidis would be immediately decided and the Authority can undoubtedly find that the employer cannot retain those bidis and not pay for them; it can order full payment if need be and what is more, order payment of some compensation also—so that the rate of minimum wages fixed could become at once effective and not be frustrated. Indeed, a mere notification cannot effectively do this because there may be a case where the employer may be right in rejecting even 500 out of a 1,000 bidis.

After the passage I have referred to above, my learned Brother has held that "If the State Government could have no power to prescribe some conditions of the kind to be found in clauses 3 to 7, it would not be able to make effective the rates of wages fixed by it."

With all respect, I have already said that in my opinion the rates could be made effective by virtue of ss. 20 and 21. But I may also point out that the test for the grant of implied powers is not that the express power granted will become merely "ineffective" but that it will become "impossible" of enforcement. That, in my opinion, is a cardinal distinction. Of course, if "ineffectiveness" is the test, then it is so elastic a standard that I conceive that almost any power can be claimed to be implied as a result of the express power to fix minimum wages e.g. to control the managements of companies in various ways; to check their expenditure and profits and to order how they shall carry on the working. All these can be said to be matters which makes rates of minimum wages effective under conceivable circumstances. I do not think that that was the intention of the Legislature, when it passed the Minimum Wages Act.

My learned Brother has referred to two cases, namely, *A. M. Allison v. B. L. Sen*⁸ and *H. G. Beason v. H. Sultan, Deputy Commissioner, Lakhimpur*⁹. Both these cases arose out of proceedings taken under s. 20 of the Act. This itself will show that all such disputes could and actually were within the jurisdiction of the Authority under that section and could be decided by it. These cases were cited in order to show to what extent the contract between the employer and the employee can be interfered with by Government, but it is essential to emphasize that these cases themselves show that the proper remedy for the decision of such disputes is the Authority and not Government by issuing a notification.

None of the two cases moreover is an authority on the implied powers of Government. They do not consider the question of implied powers at all. They merely considered if the notifications in each case were justified under the Act. Thirdly, in neither case was the notification in pari materia with the notification in the present cases. In none of the notifications made in those cases were provisions analogous to cls. 3 to 7 incorporated. On the contrary, the notifications in each of these cases prescribed that the existing tasks and hours of work-load shall continue. In the present cases what was done is precisely the reverse. The existing tasks were directly and sweepingly interfered with.

In the Supreme Court case the managers of the tea gardens were paying their labour as follows:—

To males	—	at 8 annas	per day for plucking 18 seers of green leaves.
To females	—	at 6 annas	per day for plucking 12 seers of green leaves.

That was the work-load or task, in respect of which the basic wages were 8 annas and 6 annas respectively. The notification merely increased this basic wage to 12 annas and 11 annas respectively. There was no dispute about this fixation. But the dispute was about something else. If the labourers plucked larger quantities of green leaves, they used to be paid prior to the notification, by way of extra wages at the rate of 6 pies per seer in excess of 16 seers and 12 seers respectively. Now, as soon as the notification came, what the employers did was that they raised the quantum of work on the basis of which the extra payment was being made. In other words, they refused to make the extra payment to their labour on the old basis unless the green leaves plucked by them exceeded 24 seers and 22 seers respectively. Previously, be it noted, these figures were 16 seers and 12 seers respectively.

The notification as amended, after prescribing the minimum rates of wages had also prescribed that the existing tasks and hours of work shall continue until further orders, and the point that arose for decision was whether this was a proper exercise of the power to fix minimum wages. Their Lordships held that the sole intention of Government in issuing the notification was to increase the basic wages while maintaining the same basic work-load or task assigned to male and female workers. They observed that no doubt in the fixation of minimum wages there must necessarily be some interference with the work-load or task and they held that the basic wages fixed by that notification were merely "correlated to the existing work-load or task" and were, therefore, justified. This case was the basis for the decision of the subsequent Assam case referred to above.

Applying the principle of these decisions to the present case, there is no doubt that the task or work-load, or to put it generally the contract, can be interfered with in the performance of Government's duty to fix or revise minimum wages. There is also no doubt that in the fixation of minimum wages the rates may be correlated to the task or work-load. But in the present case the notification does much more than was indicated by their Lordships or was done by the notifications impugned in these cases. Here the notification interferes and directly seeks to control the relationship of employer and employee, the right of the employer to see to the quality of the work, and prescribes that the employer shall take 90 per cent. of such work as is proffered or tendered even though the bidis may be bad or defective or virtually no bidis at all, e.g. not containing any tobacco or much less than the normal quantity of tobacco. Similarly, it sets up a tribunal of adjudication; it directly purports to decide an industrial dispute and provides machinery to determine it; and it changes the definition of "employer" so as to make it applicable in some more instances than the Act contemplated. All this, it is claimed, can be done because of the implied powers. In my opinion, this cannot possibly be said to amount to correlation of wages to the existing work-load or task within the meaning of the principle laid down by their Lordships of the Supreme Court.

Mr. Dhabe in the course of his arguments on behalf of the interveners referred to the decision of a division Bench of this Court in M. P. Min. Industry

*Ass'tion v. Reg. Lab. Commr.*¹⁰ (to which I was a party) and he urged that there Mr. Justice Tambe and I had held that the Minimum Wages Act was a piece of social legislation. He, therefore, urged that we should give it a wide interpretation so that its beneficial object should be achieved and not be frustrated.

In that case the Division Bench was concerned with the question whether a person engaged in stone-breaking operations in a manganese mine could be deemed to fall within the entry "employment in stone-breaking or stone-crushing". In that case the question was one of interpretation of an express provision of law in regard to which there was doubt and we construed an entry in the Schedule in consonance with the object and purpose of the Act. There is no question here of the express powers under the Act. These express powers have been considered and negatived by my learned Brother and I am, with respect, in complete agreement with him. The ground that a legislation is a piece of social legislation cannot be germane in considering the vires of a notification or in considering the implied powers of Government to make one or more of the clauses of the notification. I do not think that in the name of social justice and social legislation we can alter the rule as to implied powers the scope of which I have already discussed above. Apart from the normal, well-established rules of interpretation, considerations of social justice are irrelevant. See remarks in *Central India Spg., Etc. Co. v. State Ind. Court.*¹¹

I have given my best consideration to the question whether it is not possible to uphold one or more of the provisions of cls. 3 to 7 and extricate them from the provisions which are bad. But looking at it from any point of view it seems to me that the provisions of cls. 3, 4 and 6 form part of one integrated scheme and are inextricably bound up together, so that it becomes impossible to cut out one or more sentences from those clauses without doing violence to the intention of the scheme and also rendering it in large measure incomprehensible.

The same, however, cannot be said regarding the first two clauses of the notification Schedule. They are, as I have already held, a proper exercise of the power to revise minimum rates of wages, and reading them alone it is clear that those rates can be given effect to.

No doubt, the first clause is preceded by the opening words "Subject to the other provisions of this Schedule." It was argued by Mr. Phadke that if cls. 3 to 7 are struck down, then cls. 1 and 2 must go because they are subject to cls. 3 to 7. In my opinion, however, cls. 1 and 2 are capable of enforcement by themselves and the striking down of cls. 3 to 7 will not render cls. 1 and 2 in the least bit ineffective or nugatory. It seems to me that it is immaterial whether I also hold that the words "Subject to the other provisions of this Schedule" should be removed from cl. 1 or not. The words would still operate at least so far as cl. 2 is concerned. I would, therefore, not interfere with any part of cls. 1 and 2 at all but would declare cls. 3 to 7 ultra vires and order them to be deleted from the notification.

In practice also I have already shown that cls. 1 and 2 are capable of enforcement. If the employer still persists in the reprehensible practice of excessive chhat the Authority can always be moved immediately, if necessary by the Government Inspector, not only on behalf of any individual but also on behalf of sections of the industry and so all the disputes referred to in the provisions of cls. 3 to 7 could be adjudicated, and the right of chhat effectively controlled, thus ensuring the payment of the minimum rates fixed.

I may now usefully summarise my conclusions as to why I hold that cls. 3 to 7 of the Schedule to the impugned notification are ultra vires of the implied powers of Government. The reasons are:

(1) That the Act is a comprehensive enunciation of the express powers and, therefore, the necessary inference is of the exclusion of implied powers.

(2) The Act itself makes an express provision in s. 3, sub-s. 3(b)(iv), regarding the manner of calculating wages and limits it to only two cases. Therefore there can be no power implied in calculating the rates of wages for work on piece-rate, as in the present case.

(3) The particular power claimed must be essential to the purpose and object of the Act, and in the present case it is impossible to hold that all these powers invoked to support cls. 3 to 7 are so necessary that otherwise the fixation of minimum wages would not be possible.

(4) Ample provision is made in ss. 20 and 21 of the Minimum Wages Act and other laws for the implementation of the rates fixed and for decision of all these questions which cls. 3 to 7 virtually decide. Therefore, implied powers cannot be conceded to Government to do so by a mere notification.

Upon this view, it is unnecessary for me to decide the third point set forth by me above regarding the notification being ultra vires of the powers under art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution. As to the fourth point, I am in respectful agreement with the opinion of my learned Brother that the procedure laid down by the Act for the promulgation of the notification was substantially followed.

In the result I would partly allow the petitions and declare that cls. 1 and 2 of the Schedule to the notification are valid but that cls. 3 to 7 thereof are ultra vires of the powers of Government under the Minimum Wages Act. In view of the partial success and failure of either party I would make no order as to costs.

In view of this difference of opinion between Mudholkar and Kotval JJ. the matter was placed before Tambe J. under the orders of the Chief Justice. The following was the opinion of Tambe J. which his Lordship gave on September 12, 1958.

TAMBE J. On difference of opinion between Mr. Justice Mudholkar and Mr. Justice Kotval, these cases have been placed before me under the orders of my Lord the Chief Justice of date August 12, 1958.

The question raised relates to the vires of the notification dated June 11, 1958, issued by the State Government of Bombay (Labour and Social Welfare Department) in exercise of the powers conferred on it by sub-s. (2) of s. 5 read with cl. (b) of sub-s. (1) of that section of the Minimum Wages Act, 1948, (hereinafter called the Act). By this notification the State Government revised the minimum rates of wages in respect of the employment in any tobacco (including bidi making) manufactory in the Vidarbha region. The said notification reads as follows:

"Minimum Wages Act, 1948.

No. MWA. 1537-J—In exercise of the powers conferred by sub-section (2) of section 5 read with clause (b) of sub-section (1) of that section of the Minimum Wages Act, 1948 (XI of 1948) and after consulting the Advisory Board and in supersession of the former Government of Madhya Pradesh Labour Department Notification No. 564-451-XXIII, dated the 28th February 1958, the Government of Bombay hereby revise the minimum rates of wages in respect of the employment in any tobacco (including bidi making) manufactory in the Vidarbha region of the State of Bombay as mentioned in the Schedule hereinto annexed and directs that this notification shall come into force with effect from 1st July 1958.

SCHEDULE.

Subject to the other provisions of this Schedule, the revised minimum rates of wages payable to employees per thousand bids (when leaves are supplied by the employer) shall be as follows:—

Area	Revised rate in Rs.
(i) Nagpur District.	1.69
(ii) Bhandara District.	1.62
(iii) Chanda, Akola, Buldhana, Yeotmal, Amraoti and Wardha District.	1.56

2. For all bids in which 7 chataks or more of tobacco mixture is used and for those bids which are known as "Hathnakhum" bids, there shall be an increase of 12 Naye Paise per 1,000 bids in the rates mentioned above in all the areas.

3. It shall be within the discretion of the employer to decide which are "chhat" bids or bad bids, up to 5 per cent. of the bids prepared by the employee. If the employer decides that any bids are "chhat" or bad, the "chhat" or bad bids up to 5 per cent. shall be destroyed forthwith by the employee and whatever tobacco is recovered from them shall be retained by the employer. If, however, the employer wants to retain these "chhat" or bad bids, he shall pay full wages for the same to the employee.

4. If "chhat" or bad bids are more than 5 per cent. but less than 10 per cent. and if there is any dispute between the employer and the employee as to whether the "chhat" or bad bids is done properly or not, equal number of representatives of the employer and the employees shall inspect the "chhat" is done properly or not. If there is any difference of opinion among the representatives of the two sides, the majority opinion shall prevail. If the opinion is equally divided and the employer wants to retain the "chhat" bids, he shall pay wages for "chhat" bids between 5 per cent. to 10 per cent. at half the rates fixed above. If the employer does not want to retain these bids, the employee shall destroy them forthwith.

5. The employer shall nominate his representatives and the employees shall elect their representatives.

6. In the case of "chhat" above 10 per cent. the employee shall be entitled to full wages. It shall, however, be open to the employer to take suitable action against the employee if the "chhat" is more than 10 per cent. for 6 continuous working days in a calendar month.

7. The "chhat" shall be made once in a day only, at any premises within a distance of not more than 2 miles from the premises where bids are manufactured.

Explanation:—For the purposes of this Schedule the expression "employer" includes his thekadar, contractor or agent as the case may be.

By order and in the name of the Governor of Bombay.

Sd/- B. B. Brahmabhatt,
Deputy Secretary to Government."

This notification was challenged on various grounds. Only two out of them are material for purposes of this reference. They are:

(1) Clauses 1 to 7 of the schedule of the notification are bad as they are ultra vires of the Minimum Wages Act.

(2) In the alternative, clauses 1 to 7 are bad as they infringe on the rights conferred on the bidi manufacturers under art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution.

Mr. Justice Mudholkar held that the Legislature in framing the Minimum Wages Act clearly declared its policy that whatever the contract between the parties may be as to the rates of wages payable to persons engaged in a scheduled industry, the State Government will have the power to alter those rights and thus interfere with the contract between the parties. In order to make the exercise of this power effective it will have to be said that the State Government has also the right to fix the basis upon which the wages should be paid. If such power could not be implied in favour of the State Government, the effective exercise of the power of fixing minimum wages would be rendered impossible. And in this view of the matter he held that the impugned clauses of the schedule of the notification were intra vires of the Act they being provisions for fixing basis on which the wages are fixed. He also further held that these clauses did not infringe the rights conferred on the bidi manufacturers under art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution of India. He, therefore, held that the petition should be dismissed.

Mr. Justice Kotval held that cls. 1 and 2 were intra vires of the Act and were not open to challenge. He, however, held that the Act does not authorise the Government to interfere with the contract save and except fixing the rate of minimum wages. Clauses 3 to 7 inevitably and directly affect the existing terms and conditions of the work and the right of the bidi manufacturers to reject bidis of bad quality and workmanship or to pay for those bidis according to the quality of the work. He further held that ample provisions are made in ss. 20 and 21 of the Minimum Wages Act and other laws for the implementation of the rates of wages fixed. The State Government, therefore, was not competent to constitute a domestic tribunal to decide the dispute between the employer and the employee as is done in cls. 4 and 5 of the schedule of the notification. He also held that sub-s. 2(b)(iv) of s. 3 of the Act makes express provision regarding the manner of calculating wages and limits it only in two cases, namely where such rates are fixed by the day or by the month. It, therefore, necessarily follows that such a power was not intended to be conferred on the State Government in fixing "minimum piece rate". And in this view of the matter, in the opinion of Mr. Justice Kotval, implied powers to make provisions as are made in cls. 3 to 7 of the schedule of the notification cannot be conceded in favour of the State Government. He, therefore, held that cls. 3 to 7 of the schedule of the notification are ultra vires of the Act. On the second question, namely, the notification being bad as infringing on the rights conferred on the bidi manufacturers under art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution, he has expressed no opinion.

Thus, the difference of opinion between Mr. Justice Mudholkar and Mr. Justice Kotval relates to vires of cls. 3 to 7 of the schedule of the notification. According to Mr. Justice Mudholkar, the State Government had implied powers to make provisions as are made in cls. 3 to 7, while, according to Mr. Justice Kotval, such implied powers cannot be conceded in favour of the Government.

Mr. M. N. Phadke, learned counsel appearing for the bidi manufacturers in Special Civil Application No. 205 of 1958, and Mr. M. Q. Qazi, learned counsel appearing for the bidi manufacturers in Special Civil Application Nos 214 of 1958, attacked the vires of cls. 3 to 7 of the schedule of the notification generally on the reasoning adopted by Mr. Justice Kotval in his opinion, while Mr. N. L. Abhyankar, Special Government Pleader appearing for the State, contended that cls. 3 to 7 of the Schedule of the notification are intra vires of the Act generally on the reasoning of Mr. Justice Mudholkar. Mr. Phadke contends that under the contract which the bidi manufacturers had with their employees the bidi manufacturers had an absolute right of rejecting bidis which were found to be below the requisite standard without making any payment to the employees for such bidis; the employers had further a right to retain these bidis which are found to be below the requisite standard and sell them in market. He further contends that the employers have a right to do the business at a place of their own choice; as a result of cls. 3 to 7 of the schedule of the notification these rights of the employers have been seriously interfered with; the employers are now required to pay for 90 per cent. of the work of the employees irrespective of the qualities of bidis; as regards the remaining 10 per cent., even if the bidis are found to be below the requisite standard, the employers are required to make either full payment or half payment for the bidis retained; further the employers cannot do their business of inspecting the bidis at their own places of business but will have to inspect the bidis at places within two miles of the places where the employees work; this serious interference with the contractual and other rights of the employers by the State Government cannot be justified either under the express powers conferred on the Government by the statute or under the implied powers.

On behalf of the State Government, cls. 3 to 7 are justified on the ground that the State Government had implied power to make provisions which the State Government has made under cls. 3 to 7 of the schedule of the notification.

It is, therefore, necessary to see the scope and ambit of the doctrine of implied powers. The question has been elaborately dealt with by both Mr. Justice Mudholkar and Mr. Justice Kotval and the authorities relating to the question have also been fully discussed by them in their opinions. I do not, therefore, feel that any useful purpose will be served by going over the same grounds again. As regards the principles, I do not find that there is any material difference between both my learned brothers. Those principles have been summarised by Mr. Justice Kotval in para. 49 of his opinion, and those principles, in the words of Kotval J., are:

"The doctrine (the doctrine of implied powers) can be applied only where the following conditions are fulfilled:—

- (1) There must be a duty imposed or power prescribed.
- (2) On a reasonable construction of the statute there must be an impossibility in the exercise or fulfilment of that power, resulting in making its object or purpose nugatory.
- (3) The impossibility must be such that it is not an impossibility in an individual case because then the law cannot permit powers by implication but the impossibility must be of a general nature so that the purpose and object of the duty or power is rendered impossible of achievement in every case. It is only then that powers by implication can be inferred.

(4) The implication cannot contradict the expressed intent which must always prevail and where it becomes necessary to read an implication into an enactment the scope of the implication must be limited only to what is reasonably necessary and no more."

I am in respectful agreement with my learned brother Mr. Justice Kotval with the aforesaid summary of the doctrine of implied powers given by him. The question is as regards its application to the facts and circumstances of the present case. For that purpose it is first necessary to consider the extent and scope of the express powers conferred on the State Government under the Act. The Minimum Wages Act is enacted to provide for fixation of minimum rates of wages in certain employments mentioned in the schedule of the Act. It is well known that in certain employments the labour is exploited and an undue advantage is taken of them by the employers. The labour being not organised is incapable of fighting against their exploitation by the employers, and to secure to them a minimum wage, the Minimum Wages Act was enacted. The concept of the minimum wage is referred to by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in *Express Newspaper Ltd. v. Union of India*¹ in para. 53 of their Lordships' judgment in the following words (p. 601):

"The concept of the minimum wage:

The International Convention of 1928 prescribes the setting up of minimum wage-fixing machinery in industries in which "no arrangements exist for the effective regulation of wages by collective agreement or otherwise and wages are exceptionally low"...

As a rule, though the living wage is the target, it has to be tempered, even in advanced countries, by other considerations, particularly the general level of wages in other industries and the capacity of industry to pay. This view has been accepted by the Bombay Textile Labour Inquiry Committee which says that "the living wage basis affords an absolute external standard for the determination of the minimum" and that "where a living wage criterion has been used in the giving of an award or the fixing of a wage, the decision has always been tempered by other considerations of a practical character."

In India, however, the level of the national income is so low at present that it is generally accepted that the country cannot afford to prescribe by law a minimum wage which would correspond to the concept of the living wage as described in the preceding paragraphs. What then should be the level of minimum wage which can be sustained by the present stage of the country's economy? Most employers and some Provincial Governments consider that the minimum wage can at present be only a bare subsistence wage. In fact, even one important All India organisation of employees has suggested that "a minimum wage is that wage which is sufficient to cover the bare physical needs of a worker and his family." Many others, however...consider that a minimum wage should also provide for some other essential requirements such as a minimum of education, medical facilities and other amenities. We consider that a minimum wage must provide not merely for the bare sustenance of life but for the preservation of the efficiency of the worker. For this purpose, the minimum wage must also provide for some measure of education, medical requirements, and amenities."

1 [1958] A.I.R. S.C. 578.

Turning to the provisions of the Act, s. 3(1)(a) empowers the appropriate Government (here the State Government) to fix the minimum rates of wages payable to the employees employed in an employment specified in Part I and Part II of the Schedule of the Act in the manner hereinafter provided in the Act. Sub-section (2) provides that minimum rate of wages may be fixed for time work called "a minimum time rate" or piece work called "a minimum piece rate" or a minimum rate of remuneration to apply in cases of employees employed on piece work for the purpose of securing to such employees a minimum rate of wages on a time work basis called "a guarantee time rate" or overtime rate in respect of overtime work done by the employees. Sub-section (3) authorises the Government to fix different minimum rates of wages for different scheduled employments, for different classes of work in the same scheduled employments, for adults, adolescents, children and apprentices, for different localities. Provisions of s. 4 of the Act indicate that the minimum rate of wages fixed or revised under s. 3 may, at its best, consist of a basic rate of wages, a special allowance called "cost of living allowance", i.e. an allowance at a rate to be adjusted at such intervals and in such manner as the appropriate Government may direct to accord as nearly as practicable with the variation in the cost of living index number applicable to such workers and cash value of the concessions in respect of supplies of essential commodities at concession rates, where so authorised.

Looking to the component parts of the minimum rate of wages mentioned in s. 4 of the Act it appears that the minimum rate of wage which is fixed under the Act is of the nature of securing to the employees a bare subsistence wage. There is hardly any scope in it to provide for some measure of education, medical requirements and amenities to the employees. It is next to be considered in relation to what work the minimum rates of wages are to be fixed. This brings me to the definition of "wages" contained in cl. (h) of s. 2 of the Act. That definition shows that a wage means a remuneration payable to the employee in respect of his employment or in respect of the work done by him in the employment when the terms of the contract of employment, express or implied, are fulfilled by him.

Considering the provisions of ss. 2(h), 3 and 4 of the Act together, in my opinion, the Act casts a duty on appropriate Government to fix a minimum rate of wage (which, as already stated, is only a bare subsistence wage) which should be paid to the employee in respect of his employment or in respect of the work done by him in such employment on his fulfilment of the terms of the contract of employment, express or implied. The power thus conferred on the appropriate Government must necessarily include the power to interfere with the terms of the contract between the employer and the employee so far as they relate to the fixation of the wage rate. It also must necessarily follow that the appropriate Government would have powers by necessary implication to do all acts necessary to so fix the minimum rate of wage as would effectively compensate or remunerate the employee in respect of his employment or in respect of the work done by such employee in his employment. In this connection, the observations from the judgment of the Supreme Court in *Bijay Cotton Mills Ltd. v. The State of Ajmer*² may usefully be cited (p. 755):

"It can scarcely be disputed that securing of living wages to labourers which ensure not only bare physical subsistence but also the maintenance of health and decency, is conducive to the general interest of the public. This is one of the Directive Principles of State Policy embodied in article 43 of our Constitution. It is well known that in 1928 there was a Minimum Wages Fixing Machinery Convention held at Geneva and the resolutions passed in that convention were embodied in the International Labour Code. The Minimum Wages Act is said to have been passed with a view to give effect to these resolutions (vide S. I. Est., etc. v. The State of Madras [(1954) 1 M.L.J. 518, 521]). If the labourers are to be secured in the enjoyment of minimum wages and they are to be protected against exploitation by their employers, it is absolutely necessary that restraints should be imposed upon their freedom of contract and such restrictions cannot in any sense be said to be unreasonable. On the other hand, the employers cannot be heard to complain if they are compelled to pay minimum wages to their labourers even though the labourers, on account of their poverty and helplessness, are willing to work on lesser wages."

Now, the petitioners have not in their petition thrown any light on the circumstances prevailing in the industry at the time the notification was issued. The State Government, however, in its return, has mentioned those circumstances.

Before I proceed to those details it will be convenient to give in brief the general idea of the industry. The bidi manufacturers supply tendu leaves, tobacco and threads to the employee. He then rolls the bidi by putting the tobacco in the tendu leave. After it is rolled it is tied by the thread. The bidi manufacturers in some cases maintain factories where the labour goes every morning for doing the work. In the evening bidis rolled by the employees are inspected by the manufacturers. Bidis which are found to be sub-standard are rejected by the manufacturers and the labour is only paid for the accepted bidis. While in other cases the labour periodically goes to the place of the manufacturer, collects tendu leaves, tobacco and threads and then goes back to their respective places and rolls the bidis at their home. It appears that the work is not done by that man alone but the entire family members help him in rolling the bidis. It also appears that periodically the bidi manufacturer's men called thekedars or contractors go to the places of the workers, inspect the bidis, reject such bidis as they consider to be below the standard and thereafter collect both the rejected as well as accepted bidis and carry them to the place of business of the bidi manufacturers. There the second inspection is held by the bidi manufacturers themselves. They only inspect those bidis which, according to the contractors or thekedars, are of requisite standard. The bidi manufacturers also reject certain bidis out of those bidis which, according to them, are not up to the requisite standard. The labour is only paid for the bidis which ultimately are accepted by the bidi manufacturers. The latter part of operation, i.e. where bidis are rolled by the labour at their respective places, is called "gharkhata". It is not in dispute that a large percentage of work of rolling bidis is done in "gharkhata" and not in the factory. It is pertinent to note that though in both these kinds of operations certain number of bidis rolled by the labourers are rejected by the bidi manufacturers, yet they are not returned to the labour but are retained by the manufacturers and are also sold by them in the market though no payment is made to the labour in respect of these rejected bidis. This practice of rejecting bidis is popularly known as practice of "chhat". It is also not in dispute that though the former Madhya Pradesh Government had fixed minimum rates of wages under the Act, no provision was made thereunder to secure payment of remuneration to the labour in respect of the bidis rejected under the practice of "chhat".

Turning now to the material statements made by the State Government in its return, they are as follows:—

"Para 4(a) of the petition: ...In the bidi industry in Vidarbha region and especially in Bhandara district and factories in Gondia Tahsil, there is a recognised practice of making payment on the basis of bidis accepted by employer as coming up to a certain standard of skill. The employers have insisted on their right in principle of rejecting the sub-normal or sub-standard bidis prepared by the employees. The complaint of the employees is that the employers reject an unreasonable proportion of bidis dubbing them as of substandard quality or sub-normal quality without paying anything for their labour spent in rolling such rejected bidis. Such bidis are retained without paying for labour to the employees and they are sold by the employers in the market. Thus it is complained that while the employers get profit out of the rejected bidis sold by them in the market, the employees are deprived of any labour charges in respect of these bidis. It was also complained that the bidis are subjected to 'chhat' once by the Thekedar or the contractor and again by the employer for whom the Thekedar works. Thus an employee suffers considerably and does not get the benefit of even the minimum wages fixed under the Act on account of 'chhat' system...

(F) In view of the nature of work done by the employees in making bidis and the mode in which the payments have been made in Vidarbha region, and the reduction of bidis to which the employees are subjected, it was necessary to fix minimum wages after making due provision regarding the problem of rejection of bidis. In some cases it was found that as much as 20% of the labour of the worker in preparing bidis is not paid for under one guise or the other by the employer. It was further found that the decision regarding the number of bidis to be rejected (Chhat) was taken arbitrarily by the employer without knowledge of the employee and in his absence." [Italics mine].

These averments made by the State Government in its return have not been controverted by the petitioners. The vires of the impugned clauses of the schedule of the notification therefore, in my view, will have to be judged in the light of the aforesaid facts stated in the return. The problem which the State Government had to meet was that the bidi manufacturers were in their own discretion rejecting certain number of bidis rolled by the workers on the ground that they were of sub-standard quality or of sub-normal quality. These rejected bidis were retained by the bidi manufacturers and were ultimately sold by them in the market, and yet no payment was made by the manufacturers to the workers in respect of the so-called rejected bidis. These facts clearly show that the conditions prevailing in the industry was that labour expended by the employees in the bidi industry in rolling the bidis, which ultimately were rejected by the bidi manufacturers, was not being paid for by the employers even though the product of their (employees') labour was retained and utilised by the employers to their benefit, and it is to meet this problem that the State Government claims that the impugned notification was issued. As already stated, in my opinion, the Act casts a duty on the State Government to fix minimum rates of wages in such a manner that the employees are compensated or remunerated for the work done by them, notwithstanding any contract to the contrary between the employer and the employee in that respect.

Turning now to the impugned clauses, it is next to be seen how far the State Government had acted within the limits of its powers in making the provisions it has made in cls. 3 to 7.

Clause 3 provides that the employer in his discretion could reject up to 5 per cent. of the bidis prepared by his employee without making any payment therefor to his employee, and it would be open to him to destroy them retaining the tobacco contained in those bidis with himself, but if he does not want to destroy them and keep them with himself then he has to pay full wages for these bidis to his employee. The provisions made in this clause clearly are for securing payment to the employees in respect of the work done by them when the same is retained by the employer. This clause, therefore, for reasons already stated above, in my opinion, is within the powers of the State Government and cannot be said to be ultra vires of the Act.

Clause 4 provides for two things. Firstly, it provides that if the employer wants to reject bidis which exceed the aforesaid 5 per cent. limit but are less than 10 per cent., then he has two options. The first option is that he may decide to retain those bidis. In that case he is required to pay half of the minimum rates fixed by the State Government. The other option given to him is that he may choose not to retain those bidis. In that event those bidis are to be destroyed by the employee. In the second instance, this clause provides for the settlement of disputes between the employer and the employee as regards rejection of bidis between 5 to 10 per cent. If there is any dispute about it between the employer and the employees as regards the quality of work then the question is to be decided by a joint body of the representatives, in equal number, of the employer and the employees. The decision of the majority is to be final and binding on both the parties. In the event the decision of this body being equally divided then the employer is permitted to exercise either of the two options referred to above.

The provisions of cl. 4 are vehemently attacked by Mr. Phadke. He contends that the State Government had no jurisdiction under the Act to constitute a tribunal; if there is a dispute as regards the quality of work the employees must go to the Authority appointed under s. 20 of the Act. He further contends that the provision of s. 20 itself shows that the intention of the Legislature was that all the disputes between the employer and the employees relating to the payment of wages have to be decided by the Authority appointed under the Act; it necessarily follows that the Legislature never intended to confer on the State Government powers to constitute any other authority to decide the disputes between the employer and the employee; the constitution of such a body under cl. 4 of the schedule of the notification cannot, therefore, be justified under the doctrine of implied powers. I find it difficult to accept this contention. In my view, the disputes which are intended to be decided by the domestic tribunal constituted under cl. 4 of the schedule of the notification do not fall within the purview of the provisions of s. 20 of the Act, as they are disputes relating to ascertainment and fixation of wages, while the jurisdiction which is conferred on the Authority constituted under s. 20 of the Act is to decide four kinds of disputes which might arise between the employer and the employee subsequent to fixation of minimum wage payable to the employee. They are: Where the employee claims that (1) he has been paid less than the fixed minimum rate of wage, (2) he has not been paid remuneration for the day or days of rest, (3) he has not been paid for the work done by him on the days of rest, and (4) he has not been paid for the overtime work done by him at the overtime rate (sub-s. (1) of s. 20 of the Act). Sub-section (2) of s. 20 provides the period of limitation within which an application in respect of any one or more of the aforesaid four claims could be made and the person by whom such claims could be made. Sub-section (3) provides the procedure to be followed and the powers of the Authority in dealing with such applications. Clause (1) of sub-s. (3) deals with the claim relating to a payment of less than the fixed minimum rate of wage. Clause (iv) relates to the other three types of claims mentioned in sub-s. (1). In my view, the words "in any other case" in cl. (iv) relate only to the three types of claims other than the claims arising out of a payment of less than the fixed minimum rate of wage, mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 20. These words are not used with an intention to confer jurisdiction on the Authority constituted under s. 20 to deal with all and every kind of wage dispute arising between the employer and the employee. Thus, in my view, the provisions of s. 20 being limited in their scope, it cannot be inferred from those provisions that the legislative intentment was that the disputes between the employer and the employee relating to the ascertainment and fixation of minimum rate of wage payable to the employee should be decided by the Authority constituted under s. 20 of the Act. The Legislature has enjoined a duty and conferred a power on the appropriate Government to fix minimum rates of wages, and in the absence of any provision in the Act for a decision of disputes between the employer and the employee relating to the ascertainment and fixation of minimum rate of wage payable to an employee, by necessary implication it has to be assumed that the Legislature has left it to the State Government to constitute a tribunal for the said purpose wherever found necessary. The contention raised by Mr. Phadke, therefore, fails.

The other ground of attack by Mr. Phadke on this clause, namely 'cl. 4 of the schedule of the notification, was that this clause provides that where the employer decides not to accept the bidis, the employee has been given a right to destroy these bidis; the employer is not allowed to retain even the tobacco contained in the bidis. This, according to Mr. Phadke, is a very unjust provision and would work to the prejudice of the employer. On account of the bad workmanship of the employee the employer is not accepting the work. There is no reason why he should be made to lose his property also, i.e. the tobacco contained in the bidis. In my view, the construction which is sought to be put by Mr. Phadke on the sentence "If the employer does not want to retain these bidis, the employee shall destroy them forthwith" in cl. 4 of the schedule of the notification is not warranted. This sentence has to be read in its context. What is destroying the bidis has been explained in cl. 3 of the schedule of the notification and it means that the bidi qua-bidi is to be destroyed, but the tobacco contents thereof are to be retained by the employer, and it is in this sense that the aforesaid sentence in cl. 4 has to be understood. It is difficult to assume that the intendment of the State Government was that both the bidis qua-bidis as well as the tobacco contents thereof are to be destroyed by the employee. The second contention of Mr. Phadke also, therefore, fails. Thus the provisions of cl. 4 relate only to the question of ascertainment and fixation of minimum rate of wage payable to the employee and are, therefore, not ultra vires of the Act or the powers of the State Government.

Clause 5 of the schedule of the notification only deals with the constitution of the tribunal for the purpose of deciding the disputes between the employer and the employee referred to in cl. 4. For the same reasons as are given for upholding the validity of cl. 4, this clause also is upheld.

Clause 6 of the schedule of the notification is also in two parts. The first part of the clause debars the employers from rejecting bidis on the ground of bad workmanship beyond 10 per cent. of the total work done by the employee. In other words, this clause secures payment at the full rate fixed by the State Government in respect of 90 per cent. of work. These provisions and the provisions of cls. 3 and 4 are also very vehemently attacked by Mr. Phadke on the ground of interference with the right of the employer under the contract to reject the bidis which are, in his opinion, of bad workmanship. He contends that the State Government cannot force the employer to pay to the employee for the bad work at the rate fixed for good work done by the employee. He says that the contract between the employer and the employee was that the employer could, in his discretion, reject bidis which, according to him, were of bad workmanship. He has a further right to retain these bidis without making any payment to the employee. This right under the contract has been seriously interfered with by the aforesaid provisions contained in cls. 3, 4 and 6 of the schedule of the notification. Under the Act the State Government could fix the minimum rate of wages. It has no right to interfere with the terms of the contract and force the employer to pay at the full rate for bad workmanship. Now, in my view, it would not be correct to assume that the minimum rate of wage fixed by the appropriate Government is necessarily a rate fixed for any particular standard of work done by the employee. The rate fixed is the minimum rate of wage and that, as already stated by me, is a bare subsistence wage, which, the Government considers, should be paid to the employee for the work done by him for the employer during the course of the employment irrespective of whatever the contract between the employer and the employee was. And this is all what the State Government has done in the instant case. Now here what is claimed is that the employer has a contractual right not to pay for the bidis rejected by him, and yet retain them and sell them. Assuming for a moment that there was such a term in the contract between the employer and the employee, the State Government had full powers under the Act to interfere with that term of the contract and fix a minimum rate of wage which would include payment to the employee for the alleged sub-standard work done by him during the course of his employment, when it is found that the alleged sub-standard bidis were retained by the employer and sold by him in the market to his benefit. What was happening in the industry really was that for a part of the work done by the employee during the course of his employment, the employer was making no payment to the employee, yet utilising the fruits of his labour to his (employer's) advantage. This undoubtedly was nothing but exploitation of labour, and the primary objective of the Act is to grant protection to the labour against exploitation and secure to them payment in respect of the work done by them. Further, I find it difficult to accept the contention of Mr. Phadke that there really was such a contract. No doubt the practice prevailed that no payment was made to the labour for the rejected bidis, but it is difficult to assume that the labour had voluntarily agreed that no payment need be made to them for such rejected bidis even though the employer was retaining and utilising those bidis. It is difficult to assume that the labour intended to deliver to the employer these bidis gratuitously allowing the employer to enjoy the benefits thereof. In the circumstances of this case, in my opinion, the employers were clearly liable under s. 70 of the Contract Act to compensate their employees for the labour expended by them in rolling the alleged sub-standard bidis. What the State Government has done in framing cls. 3, 4 and the first part of cl. 6 is to fix the amount which, in its opinion, should be paid to the employee in the bidi industry for the work done by him. The following sentence from the observations of their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Bijay Cotton Mills Ltd. v. The State of Ajmer, already referred to, is a complete answer to the argument raised (p. 755):

"...On the other hand, the employers cannot be heard to complain if they are compelled to pay minimum wages to their labourers even though the labourers, on account of their poverty and helplessness, are willing to work on lesser wages."

Thus, even assuming that the labour had voluntarily agreed to deliver gratuitously to the employer bidis rejected by him on the ground of bad workmanship, the State Government has full powers under the Act to make the employer pay for that work. The aforesaid contention of Mr. Phadke, therefore, in my opinion, fails.

The other attack of Mr. Phadke on the provisions contained in cls. 3, 4, 5 and the first part of cl. 6 is that what the State Government has provided in these clauses is the manner of calculating the wages. Under sub-cl. (iv) of cl. (b) of sub-s. (3) of s. 3, the appropriate Government is authorised to indicate the manner of calculation only when the minimum rate of wage is fixed by the day or by the month. According to Mr. Phadke, the necessary inference is that the appropriate Government has no power to indicate the manner of calculating the wage in other cases. I find it difficult to accept this contention of Mr. Phadke. In my opinion, cls. 3, 4, 5 and the first part of cl. 6 deal with the manner in which the minimum rate of wage payable to a particular employee is to be ascertained and fixed in respect of the particular work done by him. Section 3(3)(b)(iv) does not relate to a fixation of wage. What it does is to direct the appropriate Government to indicate the manner of calculation for purposes of conversion of the rate fixed by it per month into a rate per day and vice versa. This provision appears to have been made to meet the situations that are likely or bound to arise during the course of business. For example, minimum rate of wage is fixed per month; the employee remains absent for a certain number of days in a month; deductions are to be made from the wages for the period of absence; on what basis the deductions are to be made? This argument of Mr. Phadke, in my view, therefore, fails.

Mr. Phadke also contends that the provisions contained in cls. 3, 4, 5 and first part of cl. 6 cannot be justified on the ground of implied powers, because it has not been shown by the State Government that it was impossible for it to fix the minimum rate of wage in any other manner. He says that if really the State Government had wanted that the employee should be paid for the rejected bidis then it had ample powers to do so by fixing a guaranteed time rate under s. 3(2)(c) of the Act. The State Government could also have achieved its objective by fixing one rate for the accepted bidis and another rate for the rejected bidis. It has not done so. What the State Government has done is to compel the employer to pay to his employee at least for 90 per cent. of his work irrespective of the quality produced by him. It is also not possible for me to accept this contention. Clause (c) of s. 3(2) reads as follows:

"The appropriate Government may fix a minimum rate of remuneration to apply in the case of employees employed on piece work for the purpose of securing to such employees a minimum rate of wage on a time work basis (hereinafter referred to as 'a guaranteed time rate')."

In my view, in the instant case it was not possible for the State Government to follow this course. As already stated, a majority of the work done by the employees is not done in any factory for any given number of hours. The work is chiefly done by the employees in their respective houses during their leisure time. Maybe that the State Government could have fixed a guaranteed time rate in respect of the employees who were working in the factory, but the percentage of work done in the factory being practically negligible, the problem facing the State Government could not have been solved by taking resort to the provisions of s. 3(2)(c) of the Act. Mr. Phadke next suggests that though the employees working in their respective homes were not working for any fixed hours Government could have fixed a guaranteed time rate even for them by laying down a scale, say for example, manufacturing 500 bidis would be equal to six hours work or eight hours work. Now, again that would not be a practical solution. Some workers may take five hours for rolling 500 bidis. Others may take eight hours for doing it. Some workers may do it within seven hours. Adopting such a course, therefore, would not have been a fair solution of the problem. In these circumstances, in my view, it does not appear that the alternative courses suggested by Mr. Phadke were open for the State Government to effectively secure to the employees remuneration for the work done by them which the employer had been retaining and utilizing to his advantage.

As regards the other part of the argument, I have already stated that the wage fixed by the State Government under the notification of June 11, 1958, is not a wage fixed for any particular standard of work. It is a minimum rate of wage, and that being so, it cannot be said that the State Government is compelling the employers to pay to their labour for the bad quality of work done by them at the rate fixed for a good quality of work done by them. This contention raised by Mr. Phadke also, in my opinion, therefore, fails.

The second part of cl. 6 reads as follows:

"It shall, however, be open to the employer to take suitable action against the employee if the 'chhat' is more than 10 per cent. for 6 continuous working days in a calendar month."

It is really difficult to understand what is meant by the words "suitable action". I asked Mr. Abhyankar, learned Special Government Pleader, who appears for the State, as to what is meant by the words "suitable action" and what powers really are intended to be conferred on the employer to take action against the employee. Mr. Abhyankar pointed out to me that the "suitable action" means the action which the employer can take against the employee under cl. (h) of the Standing Order framed under s. 30 of the Industrial Disputes Settlement Act of 1947 for the bidi factories. He has placed on record a copy of that Standing Order and has referred me to cl. (h) thereof relating to the "acts and omissions constituting misconduct". The clause reads:

"Gross neglect of work causing loss and damage to the employer."

Mr. Abhyankar says that the "suitable action" referred to in the second part of cl. 6 is the action which the employer can take against his employee for gross neglect of work causing loss and damage to the employer. Now, when power had already been conferred under the aforesaid cl. (h) on the employer to take action against the employee for manufacturing bidis of bad workmanship which caused damage to him, then where was the necessity of making provision therefor in second part of cl. 6? Further in cl. (h) there are no limitations like those contained in second part of cl. 6. To prove gross neglect of work causing loss to the employer under cl. (h), it is not necessary for him to show that for six continuous working days in a week the sub-standard bidis manufactured by the employee exceeded 10 per cent. For example, he may show that in a month the employee has manufactured sub-standard bidis for say 15 days resulting in a loss to him. Those 15 days need not necessarily be continuous. There need be no period of six continuous days in those 15 days. The provisions of the second part of cl. 6, therefore, in my view, undoubtedly interfere with the rights of the employer conferred on him under the Standing Order. In fact, the second part of cl. 6 results in amending cl. (h) to a great extent and to the prejudice of the employers. In my opinion, it is not open to the State Government to do so purporting to act under the Minimum Wages Act. It amounts to interference with the terms of the contract other than the terms relating to the fixation of wages. The aforesaid second part of cl. 6 is, therefore, liable to be struck down as ultra vires of the powers of the State Government under the Act.

The seventh clause provides that the "chhat", i.e. the rejection of bidis on the ground of being of sub-standard or sub-normal quality, shall be made once in a day only, at any premises within a distance of not more than two miles from the premises where bidis are manufactured. Mr. Phadke contends that this clause interferes with the rights of the bidi manufacturers under the contract whereunder they had a right to inspect and reject the bidis at their places of business. In my view, this contention has a considerable force. As already stated, the rolling of bidis by the employees in certain cases is carried on in the factories of the bidi manufacturers, but that percentage is very low. In other cases bidis are manufactured by the employees at their respective places which is known as 'gharkhata'. Where the bidis are manufactured in the factory itself, the chhat or the rejection takes place only once at the end of the day in the factory itself. This clause hardly affects such manufacturers. But in the other cases, i.e. in 'gharkhata', the chhat is performed twice, once by the contractors or 'thekedars' at the place of the employee and the second time by the bidi manufacturers at their respective places of business. The first chhat, i.e. chhat by contractors or 'thekedars' being at the houses of the employees, themselves; it is done in the presence of the employees themselves, but the second chhat being at the place of business of the manufacturer which usually is at a far away distance from the houses of the employees usually takes place in the absence of the employees, and there is a good deal of agitation about it by the employees. The employees claim that the chhat must be done in their presence. Clause 7 is obviously intended to redress this grievance. Undoubtedly the grievance of the employees appears to be real. In fairness to the employees the chhat should take place in their presence, but the question that arises is whether the State Government has powers, either express or implied, to redress such a grievance under the provisions of the Minimum Wages Act. As already stated, in my view, the powers conferred on the appropriate Government under the Act to interfere with the terms of the contract between the employer and the employee are limited. Those powers are to interfere with the terms of the contract so far as they relate to fixation of wage for the work done in the employment. It is, therefore, not open to the State Government in fixing minimum rate of wages to interfere with the other terms of the contract between the employer and the employee. In framing cl. 7 the State Government has interfered with the contract between the parties as regards the place where the inspection of the work of the employee is to be made by the manufacturer. It has no direct bearing on the fixation of wages. In my opinion, this clause, therefore, is ultra vires of the powers of the State Government and is, therefore, liable to be struck down.

At the foot of the notification, an explanation is given. It is in the following terms:

"Explanation:—For the purposes of this Schedule the expression 'employer' includes his thekedar, contractor or agent as the case may be."

Mr. Phadke contends that s. 2(e) of the Act itself defines "employer", and, therefore, it is not open to the State Government to define that expression differently. Mr. Abhyankar, on the other hand, says that the definition of "employer" as given in the explanation is the same as that given in s. 2(e) of the Act and is, therefore, not bad. I find it difficult to accept the contention of Mr. Abhyankar. If really the definition of "employer" given in the explanation is the same as given in s. 2(e) of the Act, it is not necessary to incorporate it in the Schedule. Further, reading the explanation and the definition of "employer" contained in s. 2(e) of the Act together, it appears that the definition of "employer" as given in the explanation is wider in terms than the definition of "employer" contained in s. 2(e) of the Act. It is intended to include thekedars, contractors and agents of the bidi manufacturers in the term "employer", irrespective of the fact as to whether such thekedar, contractor, or agent has, in fact, employed the labour or not; while the definition contained in cl. (e) of s. 2 of the Act shows that the employer is the person who employs labour either directly or through another person whether on behalf of himself or on behalf of any other person. The expression "employer" having been defined in the Act, it is not open to the State Government to enlarge its scope in absence of any provision to that effect in the Act. The explanation contained in the Schedule, therefore, is also liable to be struck down.

For reasons stated above, in my opinion, cla. 3, 4, 5 and first part of cl. 6 are good, while the latter part of cl. 6, cl. 7 and the explanation are bad and are liable to be struck down. The question then that arises is whether the parts which are liable to be struck down are severable from the parts which are good. The tests that have to be applied in deciding such question are, given by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in *R.M.D.C. v. Union of India*³. Applying those tests to the present notification, in my view, the parts thereof, which are held to be good by me, are clearly severable from the parts held to be bad by me. Clauses held to be good by me relate to the fixation of wages, while clauses held to be bad by me have no direct bearing on the question of fixation of wage but relate to matters other than the fixation of wage. They are intended, if I may say so, to confer additional benefits on the employees. It cannot be said that the State Government had no intention of securing to the employees payment at the minimum rate of wage fixed by it in the event it was not in a position to confer the said additional benefits on the employees. In my view, therefore, my conclusions in holding the latter part of cl. 6, cl. 7 and the explanation ultra vires of the Act or the power of the State Government under the Act cannot have the effect of striking down the entire notification.

It is next necessary to deal with the two decisions referred to by Mr. Phadke in the course of his argument. They are: *Thomas v. Travancore-Cochin State*⁴ and P. C. Chakravarty v. Manager, D.T. Estate.⁵ In Thomas v. Travancore-Cochin State (supra) it is held that the provisions of the Minimum Wages Act do not appear to confer any power on the appropriate Government to insist that an employer employing workers on time-rates should pay them on piece-rates. The principle enunciated in this case has hardly any application to the facts of the present case. I have already stated that under the Minimum Wages Act, the appropriate Government has powers to interfere with the contract between the employer and the employee only to the extent of its term relating to fixation of wages. It has no power to interfere with other terms.

In insisting that the employer employing workers on time-rates should pay them on piece-rates, the State Government of Travancore-Cochin was interfering with the other terms of the contract between the employer and the employee.

In P. C. Chakravarty v. Manager, D.T. Estate (supra) it appears that on March 11, 1952, the State Government of Assam issued a notification in exercise of powers conferred by s. 3 read with sub-s. (2) of s. 5 of the Minimum Wages Act and fixed the minimum wages and dearness allowance of various classes of employees in the Tea Plantation. The schedule attached to the notification divided the workers into two classes—unskilled labour and the staff and artisans. On May 12, 1952, another notification was issued by the Government of Assam in modification of the earlier notification of March 11, 1952, by which the word “artisan” has been defined as meaning fitters, engine drivers, masons, electricians, black-smiths, carpenters, etc. By notification of September 24, 1952, the Government of Assam appointed the Principal of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales Technical School, Jorhat, to be the authority to conduct necessary trade tests to decide doubtful cases arising out of the definition of the word “artisan” as defined in the earlier notification dated May 12, 1952. By another notification dated December 12, 1953, a committee was constituted for purposes of laying down the qualifications of artisans and providing the machinery, regional or otherwise, to undertake the trade tests. The petitioners in that case made an application under s. 20 claiming that they were entitled to get minimum rates of wages fixed for the artisan. The Deputy Commissioner of Kachar, who heard the application, held that the application was premature and the petitioners were not entitled to claim the minimum wages and the dearness allowance fixed by the Government under the notification of March 11, 1952, unless they were either admitted as artisans by the opposite party or they passed a trade-test held by the committee set up for the purpose. This order of the Deputy Commissioner was challenged before the High Court and it was contended that the notifications issued by the Government of Assam subsequent to March 11, 1952, were bad as the Government had no power to constitute a committee to decide who was artisan within the meaning of the notification and who was not. That power exclusively lay with the Authority constituted under s. 20 of the Minimum Wages Act. This contention was upheld by the High Court and the learned Judges held that the Authority appointed under the Act had to decide whether the petitioner was or was not entitled to any payment under the notification issued by the Government under s. 5 which had fixed the minimum wages. This power necessarily implies power to determine whether a particular employee falls within the category of artisan as defined under the notification. That power cannot be taken away by the State Government. This decision also, in my view, has no application to the facts of the present case. As already stated, the domestic tribunal constituted by the State Government is for purposes of deciding the disputes arising out of ascertainment and fixation of rate of minimum wage payable to the employee for his work and not for purposes of deciding the disputes that arise between the employer and the employee after the minimum wage payable to an employee is ascertained and fixed.

This brings me to the last contention raised by Mr. Phadke. He contends that even if it is held that the notification or any part thereof is intra vires of the Act, yet it is bad as it interferes with the fundamental rights conferred on the bidi manufacturers under art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution. As already stated, the part of the notification held good by me relates exclusively to the question of fixation of minimum rate of wages and the State Government was acting within its powers conferred on it by the Act either expressly or by necessary implication. Their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Bijay Cotton Mills Ltd. v. The State of Ajmer have held that though the provisions of the Act interfere with the freedom of trade or business guaranteed under art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution, the restrictions imposed are reasonable and being imposed in the interests of general public are protected in terms of cl. (6) of art. 19. Their Lordships observed (p. 756):

"...In our opinion, the restrictions, though they interfere to some extent with the freedom of trade or business guaranteed under Article 19(1)(g) of the Constitution, are reasonable and being imposed in the interests of general public are protected by the terms of clause (6) of Article 19."

It necessarily follows that so long as the State Government acts within the limits of its powers conferred on it under the Act, its action is not open to challenge on the ground that it interferes with the rights conferred on the bidi manufacturers under art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution. This contention also, therefore, fails.

In the result, in my opinion, cls. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and the first part of cl. 6 of the Schedule of the notification are intra vires of the Act, while the latter part of cl. 6, cl. 7 and the explanation are ultra vires of the Act. The case may now be placed before the appropriate Bench for further orders.

The matter was then placed before a bench composed of Kotval and V. S. Desai JJ. for passing formal orders in the petitions. Kotval J. delivered the following judgment.

M. N. Phadke, W. K. Sheorey and V. M. Golwalkar, for the petitioners.

N. L. Abhyankar, Special Government Pleader, and M. N. Chandurkar, for respondents Nos. 1 and 2.

KOTVAL J. We should have thought that after the decision of the third Judge we would be called upon to pass merely formal orders in these petitions, but Mr. M. N. Phadke on behalf of the petitioners has raised several contentions which it becomes necessary to deal with.

His first argument is founded upon the provisions of cl. 36 of the Letters Patent of this Court, and the point he takes is that it was necessary for the Division Bench which referred the matter to a third Judge to have formulated the point or points for decision by the third Judge, and that in the absence of any such point being formulated, the third Judge had no jurisdiction to give his opinion. In the first place it seems to us that the argument is founded upon a wrong interpretation of the order, referring the petitions for decision to the third Judge. At the conclusion of the hearing before the Division Bench Mr. Justice Mudholkar and I had announced (Mr. Justice Mudholkar in full and I, only the conclusion) our decision. According to Mr. Justice Mudholkar, all the clauses of the impugned notification were valid under the implied powers of Government. In my view, clauses 3 to 7 of the Schedule to the notification were ultra vires of the express and implied powers of Government. Thereupon Mr. Justice Mudholkar passed the following order:—

"In view of the difference of opinion between us, the matter will now have to go before a third Judge to be appointed by the Chief Justice."

It seems to us that it is clear upon that order of Mr. Justice Mudholkar that the matters in difference between my learned Brother and myself were referred. It was clear from the opinions delivered by either of us as to what were the points which called for decision by the third Judge. Moreover, both parties have clearly understood what the points of difference were and have fully argued them before Mr. Justice Tambe and the result is reflected in the opinion delivered by him. We do not think, with all respect to him, that there is any failure of jurisdiction in the third Judge giving his opinion.

The other contention raised by Mr. Phadke is based upon the decision given by Mr. Justice Tambe in para. 28 of his opinion read with paras. 8, 13 and 15. What Mr. Phadke says is that the only difference of opinion between the Judges of the Division Bench was on the scope and applicability of the implied powers of Government. But the decision of Mr. Justice Tambe hinges upon a consideration of the express powers and to that extent that was a point not referred to him and not within his jurisdiction to decide.

As we read the opinion of Mr. Justice Tambe, it is impossible to accede to the argument of Mr. Phadke. Mr. Justice Tambe no doubt considered the express powers under the Act. He did so only with a view to ascertain what were the implied powers which could flow from the provisions of the Act. This is clear from paras. 8 and 10 of his opinion. At no stage has he referred to the express powers directly in considering the validity of the notification; nor has he justified any of its provisions under any express power contained in the Act. The argument is founded upon a misreading of the opinion of Mr. Justice Tambe.

The third point raised is as to the decision which Mr. Justice Tambe gave upon the point arising under art. 19 of the Constitution. It was urged before the Division Bench that the notification was ultra vires under art. 19(1)(g). On that point it was contended that Mr. Justice Mudholkar decided that the notification was intra vires, but that I had considered it unnecessary to give an opinion and, therefore, it was not open to Mr. Justice Tambe to consider that question as there was no difference of opinion on the point.

In the first place, it seems to us that if one of the Judges of a Division Bench held the notification intra vires under the article, and the other Judge declined to give an opinion, that itself was a difference of opinion. Secondly, the point of difference between the Judges of the Division Bench was with regard to the validity of cls. 3 to 7 of the Schedule to the notification and the third Judge had to hear and decide the case on the point as to the validity of the said clauses. In pronouncing his opinion on that point the third Judge had to consider and decide the several arguments that were raised before him for and against the validity of the impugned clauses of the notification, and the argument under art. 19(1)(g) was one of such arguments which he had to consider and decide. Thirdly, the parties have argued their case before the third Judge on the basis that the opinion of the third Judge on the validity of the impugned clauses required also his decision on the question whether the said clauses were hit by art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution. In these circumstances, we are of the view that no grievance can be made by Mr. Phadke that Mr. Justice Tambe's opinion on the point of the attack under art. 19(1)(g) is without jurisdiction.

The last point raised by Mr. Phadke is that there is a conflict of opinion on the question of the severability of cls. 3 to 7 of the impugned notification. On this point, of course, Mr. Justice Mudholkar having taken the view that the entire notification was intra vires could not, in the nature of things, pronounce any opinion. So far as my opinion was concerned, I held that it was not possible to extricate any of the provisions of cls. 3 to 7 from the portions of the notification which may be held valid except cls. 1 and 2; and, therefore, I declared the entire provisions of cls. 3 to 7 ultra vires. What is now sought to be argued is that Mr. Justice Tambe in para. 28 of his opinion has held that the second part of cl. 6, cl. 7 and the Explanation to the notification are clearly severable from the parts held good by him. To that extent the decisions conflict and, therefore, it is urged that cl. 36 of the Letters Patent which prescribes that the opinion of the majority of the Judges who have heard the case, including those who first heard it, shall prevail, cannot be given effect to. In our opinion, the portions of the opinion of Mr. Justice Tambe, to which Mr. Phadke has referred, do not contain the points in the case. They are merely the grounds or reasons which the learned Judge gave for coming to his ultimate conclusion that part of cl. 6, cl. 7 and the Explanation were ultra vires. That conclusion was directly upon the points in difference before the Division Bench; and, therefore, in compliance with cl. 36 of the Letters Patent. None of the contentions urged by Mr. Phadke, therefore, can be upheld.

We may also generally observe that none of these contentions were raised before Mr. Justice Tambe, but on the contrary it appears from his opinion that both the parties freely and without objection argued all the points before him. That being so, one of the parties cannot now turn round and urge that the third Judge ought not to have decided a point or that he exceeded his jurisdiction in doing so, or had no jurisdiction to decide it. The first of the contentions of Mr. Phadke moreover ought properly to have been raised before the Division Bench itself, but no indication was given to the Division Bench that either party desired specific points to be stated.

Moreover, all these points have been argued before us as if we were sitting as an appellate Court which we are not. On the contrary, it seems to us that the conclusions reached by Mr. Justice Tambe are binding on us and we must give a decision in accordance therewith. We have already indicated that on a perusal of his opinion we have no doubt as to the conclusions reached by him. They have been made amply clear in the opinion itself.

In the net result, therefore, in accordance with the opinion of the third Judge,

(1) We hereby declare the following clauses of the Schedule to the notification, dated June 11, 1958, published in the Bombay Government Gazette of June 14, 1958 (Notification No. MWA-1557-J) to be ultra vires of the powers of the State Government—

(a) The following portion of cl. 6 of the Schedule:

"It shall, however, be open to the employer to take suitable action against the employee if the 'chhat' is more than 10 per cent. for 6 continuous working days in a calendar month."

(b) Clause 7 of the Schedule.

(c) The Explanation appended at the foot of the notification.

We prohibit the State Government from giving effect to any one or more of the above-mentioned provisions and order that they shall be deleted from the impugned notification.

(2) The remaining provisions of the notification are held intra vires of the powers of Government and, therefore, valid and effective.

(3) The petitions are thus partly allowed to the extent indicated in para. (1) above.

There then remains the matter of costs. The main justification offered in support of the notification at the hearing before the Division Bench was upon the express powers of Government under the Minimum Wages Act, and it was only when that contention failed that the implied powers were invoked. Even upon the implied powers some portions of the notification have now been held to be ultra vires. We think that in these circumstances the proper order to pass as regards costs is that each party shall bear its own costs.

Order accordingly.

DARBAR SHRI MERAMWALA BHAYAWALA v. BAI SHRI VALBAI SADUL.*

Saurashtra Barkhali Abolition Act (XXVI of 1951), Sec. 2(1)—Jiwal grant by subordinate Girassia—Whether grantee of such grant "Barkhalidar" within definition in Act.

A limited grant such as a grant as Jiwal by a subordinate Girassia is covered by the definition of "Barkhalidar" in s. 2(1) of the Saurashtra Barkhali Abolition Act, 1951.

*Khan Shri Nizam Mahomad Khanji Fais Mahomad Khanji v. The State of Bombay,*¹ distinguished.

Laxman Rana, Bhura Bhagwan, Mepa Manga and Patel Khoda Keshav applied in Form No. 11 for grant of occupancy certificate in respect of the lands

*Decided, December 10, 1958. Special Civil Applications Nos. 26, 27, 28 and 29 of 1958. of 1958, decided by M. C. Shah and Shelat JJ., on February 19, 1957, (Unrep.).

in their respective possessions as tenants under the Barkhali Abolition Act, 1951. They had described Bai Valbai (opponent No. 1) as the Barkhalidar. The Mamlatdar granted the applications. D. S. Meramwala (applicant), who was not a party to the proceedings before the Mamlatdar, being aggrieved by this order, filed appeals before the Deputy Collector on the ground that the lands were girasdari lands comprised in his estate and, therefore, the four tenants who had applied in Form 11 for occupancy certificates as tenants were liable to pay six times the assessment etc. under the Saurashtra Land Reforms Act, 1951. The Collector remanded the cases to the Mamlatdar for re-inquiry ordering the joinder of the applicant as a party. Against this order of joinder of the applicant the tenants filed revision applications which were dismissed. The Mamlatdar thereafter held fresh inquiry and again ordered grant of occupancy certificates to the tenants on the basis that the lands were Barkhali. Against this decision appeals were filed by the applicant and the cases were again remanded to the Mamlatdar for re-inquiry and taking fresh evidence particularly as it was alleged that there was a Lekh by which the lands in question were given to Bai Valbai as "Jiwai". On remand the alleged Lekh was not produced but other evidence in support of the Barkhali nature of the tenure was adduced. The Mamlatdar held that as the Lekh was not produced there was nothing to show that the lands were held on a Barkhali tenure and that the tenants could not obtain occupancy certificates without payment of six times the assessment under the Land Reforms Act. Bai Valbai filed four appeals over this order of the Mamlatdar before the Deputy Collector who disposed of them by a single order holding that the lands were Barkhali tenure and, therefore, the tenants were entitled to occupancy certificates without the payment of six times the assessment under the Barkhali Abolition Act. Thereupon the applicant filed four Revision Applications before the Bombay Revenue Tribunal, Rajkot Bench. The Revenue Tribunal dismissed the revision application on the ground that the non-production of the Lekh was immaterial and that there was other sufficient evidence on record to establish the creation of a Barkhali tenure within the meaning of the Barkhali Abolition Act. It also held that as the finding of the Deputy Collector was a finding of fact the Revenue Tribunal could not interfere with the same. In answer to a further contention by the applicant that as Bai Valbai had abandoned the lands and left the village in 1950 the lands should be deemed to have been resumed by him as a Talukdar, the Revenue Tribunal held

"that a Talukdar loses his right of resumption after he has signed the Merger Agreement because the right of resumption could only be exercised as a Talukdar in the administration of the Taluka and such administration would vest in the Saurashtra Government formerly called the United State of Saurashtra under clause (5) of the Merger Agreement".

The applicant filed the present applications on the grounds inter alia that the Revenue Tribunal committed an apparent error of law in holding that the decision of the Bombay High Court in C.M.A. No. 24 of 1955 did not apply to the present case as the applicant in that case was himself a girasdar and the applicant in the present case is a Talukdar, a reasoning which was contrary to the definition of "Girasdar" which included a Talukdar as defined in s. 2(15) of the Land Reforms Act, and that as Bai Valbai had adduced no evidence to establish that she was a Barkhalidar as defined in s. 2(1) of the Barkhali Abolition Act, a writ of certiorari should be issued.

The applications were heard.

V. G. Hathi, for the applicant.

J. L. Doshi, for opponent No. 1.

PATEL J. These four Special Civil Applications arise out of proceedings under the Barkhali Tenure Abolition Act of 1951. The tenants made four separate applications for occupancy certificates under the provisions of this Act, alleging that they were the tenants of the Barkhalidar Bai Valbai, and that under the provisions of the Act, they were entitled to occupancy certificates on payment of compensation provided under the Act. First, when these applications were made, the present applicant was not made a party to the proceedings. In his absence, the Mamlatdar dealing with these applications, made an order in favour of the tenants. The applicant filed an appeal to the Collector, and because he was not a party and an order was made in his absence in all these proceedings, the proceedings were remanded for retrial. Thereafter, after a finding was received, there was a further remand and it is after that remand that the matters came before the Deputy Collector in appeal and before the Revenue Tribunal in revision. It is from the order of the Tribunal dismissing the revision application of the applicant that the present petitions have been filed.

The contentions of the respective parties appear to be that Valbai alleged that she was a Barkhalidar in so far as these lands were assigned to her by the Talukdar while it is the case of the applicant that the lands were not given to her but they were given to her husband only for his life. It also appears that his contention was that even there, there was no grant of land but merely of the income of the properties, and after the death of the husband, this was being continued until Valbai left the place and went to Rampur in 1950. According to him, therefore, in any case, on and from that date, the lands reverted to the original grantor. He, therefore, contended that she could not be held to be a Barkhalidar nor were the tenants entitled to occupancy certificates under the Barkhali Abolition Act.

After the remand, the Mamlatdar held, as shown by his order dated June 28, 1957, on a consideration of the evidence, that Bai Valbai had not proved that she was a Barkhalidar. He, therefore, dismissed the applications. When the matter went before the Deputy Collector, he went into the evidence, as he should have done, and after considering the entire evidence, came to the conclusion that it was proved these lands were held by Valbai in Jiwai and they continued to be so held upto Samvat 2006. He also held that since 1950 the income was not paid to Valbai, but he said that as the Talukdar could not make any change in the nature of grant of land after the Revenue Orders 41/49 and 2/50 coming into force and could not resume the lands and amalgamate the same with his own lands in any manner, mere non-payment of the income after 1950 made no difference. In the result, he reversed the decision of the Mamlatdar and ordered that occupancy certificates should be issued to the tenants. In revision, the Tribunal, after considering the whole evidence while agreeing with the finding of the Deputy Collector, held that the question was one of fact and was not assailable before the Tribunal. It, therefore, dismissed the applications.

In these applications, the first ground that has been made before us by Mr. Hathi is that it was an error on the part of the Collector and the Tribunal to have considered this question afresh, because, according to him, at the time when the matter was remanded to the Mamlatdar by the Collector by his first order, the direction was that only the Lekh had to be proved, if it could be proved, with due regard to the provisions of s. 65 of the Indian Evidence Act. He says that it was not open to them to consider the whole question again. This contention has no substance. A reference to the order of remand dated December 26, 1956, shows that after summarising the arguments made by the learned advocate appearing before the Collector, he remanded the case for recording whatever evidence respondent No. 2 Bai Valbai may desire to adduce for proving that this grant was of Barkhali nature and directed him to take the same into consideration and hear both parties and give a fresh decision. Right or wrong, that order was made and is binding on the parties, and that being so, if after the decision of the Mamlatdar when the matter came up afresh before the Deputy Collector, he went into the merits of the question and decided those facts for himself, it cannot be said that he had gone beyond his powers or beyond the order of remand which was made previously.

It is argued that the grant was merely a grant as Jiwai, and being in its nature unalienable and unhereditary, it would not be covered by the definition of 'Barkhalidar' under the Saurashtra Barkhali Abolition Act of 1951. Before I refer to the relevant provision of this section, it is desirable to consider the conditions in Saurashtra, which necessitated the enactment of that provision. It appears, at the opening of the 19th century all landed proprietors in Kathiawar from the Chief to the subordinate Girassia were in possession and exercise of uncontrolled power over the people of their Estates. It was in these circumstances that Col. Walker effected a permanent settlement of the tributes in 1807 and 1808. Many small proprietors, who freed themselves from the control of the superior States, were treated as separate tributaries and enjoyed that position after the Settlement. A few others were treated as subordinate Girasdars to one or the other principal Chiefs and were included in the tribute arrangement made with their lords.

It appears that there was a system of Girasdari in existence at the time of the Settlement and continued thereafter. The word 'Girasdari' had a definite connotation and that term included Talukdars, Bhagdars, Mulgirassias and Bhayats, who were considered to be landholders and had proprietary rights over their estates, big or small. There was another kind of tenure which was known as that of Barkhalidars. This term included within its fold Inamdars, Jiwaidars, Dharmada or Kherati grantees and holders of service tenures such as Chakariyats and Passaitas and they were entitled to the usufructs of the land granted to them. 'Barkhalidar' means a person holding land, who was in independent enjoyment of the produce and had not to carry the produce to the common Khala for being apportioned between the superior holder and himself.

It also appears from the accounts given by Col. Walker and decisions in Giras cases that the smallest Talukdar was as independent in the enjoyment of his estate as the biggest Chief. The classification of the full-powered States, semi-jurisdictional States and non-jurisdictional States and Talukas did not affect the natural autonomy in the land revenue administration and enjoyment of their landed possession. It also appears that the proprietary rights of the Subordinate Girasdars were not only recognised but also safeguarded. It also appears that subject to the payment of the tribute and various contributions referred to above, as the case may be, and subject also to the performance of various political and social obligations, a necessary consequence of the feudal system, Talukdars, Bhagdars, Mulgirassias and Bhayats, meaning thereby the subordinate Girassias, were entirely free in the administration and enjoyment of their lands.

The second category of landholders, the Barkhalidars, had evidently no proprietary rights in the estates. The lands were granted for enjoyment of usufructs either by the Paramount Power or the independent Chiefs or the subordinate Girassias. This included Inamdars, Jiwaidars, and Dharmada which included Kherati grantees and holders of service tenures. Some of the principal States of Kathiawar had their Alienation Settlement Rules and the interests and the respective obligations of all grantees were defined in accordance with those rules. It, however, does appear that in a far larger number of States and Estates there were no such rules. It also appears that the most common feature of these grants was that they were resumable by the grantor at will, though in actual practice grants were resumed under exceptional circumstances only, and it appeared these grants were, by their very nature, resumable. Jiwai grants were made for the maintenance of the grantees. These grants were also made as 'Hathgharna' grants to daughters at the time of marriage. Some of these grants ended with the life time of the grantees, while in some cases they were continued to the heirs of the grantees. It may also be mentioned that the subordinate Girassias were not entitled freely to make grants as they chose. They were free to make grants according to custom or usage or in due consideration of service rendered; even so they were not free to fritter away their resources. In some cases, if the grants were unreasonable, they were liable to be modified by the Paramount Power.

In almost all these landed estates only a very small quantity of the estates were actually cultivated by the landholders themselves, whether they were Girassias or Barkhalidars. The condition of tenants was very miserable and far from satisfactory. It was, therefore, thought necessary to abolish these classes of tenures and make the tenant the direct occupant under the Government. The Commission that was appointed collected certain statistics and it appears that the percentage of Girasdar landholders whose holdings were less than 80 acres was 72.7 per cent, those who held between 80 and 800 acres was 24.4 per cent. and those who held more than 800 acres was about 2.9 per cent. It appears, therefore, that the Barkhalidars even of the subordinate Girassias could not have been too many, because small holders could not have made any sub-grants.

It is in this background that we must consider the provisions of the Barkhali Abolition Act and the Saurashtra Land Reforms Act, 1951. The Land Reforms Act was intended to deal with the Girasdars. It provided for their abolition and it also provided for land which would be allowable to a Girasdar for his personal cultivation. It was provided that if he had reserved any land for Gharkhed on or before a particular date, he was entitled to the reserved land. For the purpose of allotment of Gharkhed land the Girasdars were divided into three classes, A, B, and C, and provision was made for different acreage to be allotted to each class in proportion to his holding. Occupancy rights were given to the tenants on the land of a Girasdar.

The Barkhali Abolition Act dealt with the Barkhalidars. The word 'Barkhalidar' has been defined in s. 2 as follows:—

"(1) 'Barkhalidar' means a person who, holds a tenure as Barkhalidar, Jiwaitdar, Chakariyat, Kherati, or Dharmada and includes—

(a) any person who has been granted any such tenure;"

The rest of the section is not relevant for the purpose of this case. Section 8 makes a provision for allotment of land for personal cultivation. It clearly brings out the distinction between a Barkhalidar whose tenure was heritable and alienable and one whose tenure was inalienable and for life. It provides for allotment of land to a Barkhalidar in whose estate agricultural land is equal to two economic holdings or less and who is not a Chakariyat, Dharmada Institution or Jiwaitdar for life. Section 18 makes a provision for payment of cash annuity to Barkhalidar and appears to be in the nature of a rehabilitation grant in proportion to their holdings. It is also provided that in the case of a widow or a Hathgharna grantee, the payment was to be continued for the lifetime of the holder, since these grants were generally for the life of a grantee.

In these sections no distinction has been made between grantees of independent State or estate and subordinate Girasdar and none could have been apparently intended as it would lead to manifest injustice and contrary to the purpose for which the Acts were enacted. The Legislature must be presumed to have known the meanings of the different terms that they have employed, and the provisions in the sections leave no room for doubt that for the purposes of Barkhali Abolition Act even limited grants by a subordinate Girassia were included. A remedial statute cannot be cut down in its effect by limitation not imposed by the Legislature. There is, therefore, no substance in the contention raised by Mr. Hathi that the grant was not covered by the definition of "Barkhalidar" in the Barkhali Abolition Act and, therefore, was not subject to it.

Mr. Hathi has also relied on a decision of this Court in *Khan Shri Nizam Mahomad Khanji Fais Mahomad Khanji v. The State of Bombay*¹, wherein of 1956, decided by M. C. Shah and Shelat JJ.,

lands were given by a subordinate estate-holder to Usmanbakhte Sahab for her pocket expenses under an agreement which also provided that in case the income of the village fell short of the sum of Rs. 2,500 a year, the grantor had to make good the amount. The tenants of the village had made applications for occupancy certificates. The tribunals below had granted those applications. It was held by the High Court that the grant to Usmanbakhte Sahab was not covered by the then Alienation and Settlement Rules of the Junagadh State and was, therefore, not covered by the definition of 'Barkhali Land' of the Junagadh Land Revenue Code. It was also held that the grant was given to her for her maintenance for life in which she had not heritable or alienable rights and that no tenure as a Jiwaidar was created in her favour, the lands remaining as Giras lands for all the time, and therefore she would not fall under the definition of 'Barkhalidar' in the Barkhali Abolition Act. The Court relied on s. 2(13) of the Land Reforms Act, which defined the word 'Estate' to mean all land of whatever description or undivided share thereof held by a Girasdar. It seems doubtful that merely because, for the purpose of computation of Gharkhed land to a Girasdar a grant of such a nature may be included in his holding, it must necessarily follow as a corollary that it could not fall within the definition of the Barkhali land in the other Act. No limitations of any kind are contained in the statute itself. In this case as held by the Deputy Collector and the Tribunal, the grant was given to the husband of Valbai and was continued to her. No limitations of any kind have been proved. The applicant is a Talukdar and he must necessarily have his record and they would have shown the actual nature of the grant. But none has been produced. Therefore, the decision referred to is clearly distinguishable and this case does not fall within the ratio of that case. In our judgment these lands are covered by the Barkhali Abolition Act and the tenants are entitled to the certificates.

A further argument has been made by learned counsel that since the land was not in possession of Valbai at least from 1950, the Act would not be applicable to this land. It appears from the judgment of the Tribunals below that Valbai became a widow at a very young age. It also appears that even during the life time of the husband of Valbai, the manager of the estate was managing these lands in the name of her husband, and as shown by the receipts, after her husband's death, the lands continued to be managed in the name of Valbai. It may be, as pointed out by the learned counsel, that since 1950, the income has not been paid. Even so, it cannot be said that the rights which she had in this property came to be extinguished merely by non-payment of the income by the manager to her. There is no order of resumption in this case. Even if it were permissible to resume the land, there being no order of resumption, merely because there is non-payment of income, it cannot be inferred that she was not in possession of the property. Possession in this case all along had been her husband's and thereafter hers. The property has been managed in their names by the manager of the estate.

The second answer to this argument is that after the merger agreement, the over-riding sovereign powers became vested in the State and they could not be exercised by the applicant. It is no doubt true that his proprietary rights are kept intact, but it cannot mean that it included a right of resuming lands once granted to others. The right of resumption was a right of the sovereign power, and the Girasdars being virtually independent exercised their power, if they did, only as sovereigns, whatever may be the limitations on their sovereignty. Even if, therefore, in this case there had been any resumption order, it could not have been valid. The present contention also must, therefore, fail.

The applications fail and are dismissed with costs.

Applications dismissed.

MAHARANA SHRI JAYAVANTSINHJI RANMALSINHJI v. THE STATE OF BOMBAY.*

Bombay Land Revenue Code (Bom. V of 1879), Sec. 117R—Gujarat Taluqdars' Act (Bom. VI of 1888), Secs. 22, 23(1)—Bombay Taluqdari Tenure Abolition Act (Bom. LXI of 1949), Sec. 5(2)—Expression "settlements of land revenue" in s. 117R, B. L. R. Code whether includes declaration under s. 22 or agreement of jama mentioned in s. 23(1) of Bom. Act VI of 1888.

The declaration under s. 22 of the Gujarat Taluqdars' Act, 1888, or the agreement of jama mentioned in s. 23(1) of the Act, is not a settlement of land-revenue within the meaning of s. 117R of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879.

THE facts are stated in the judgment.

A. V. Viswanatha Sastri, with S. S. Shukla, for the appellants and the petitioners.

C. K. Daphtary, Solicitor-General of India, with H. J. Umrigar and R. H. Dhebar, for the respondent.

SUBBA RAO J. These are three appeals by Special Leave from the judgment of the High Court of Judicature at Bombay dismissing the petitions filed by the appellants for writs in the nature of prohibition restraining the respondents from realising from the appellants land revenue in respect of their estates at an enhanced rate for the year 1955-56. The petitioners in the two petitions also asked for similar relief against the respondents. The appeals as well as the writ petitions were heard together, as they raised a common question of law.

The material facts in Civil Appeal No. 254 of 1958 may be briefly stated: The appellant was a taluqdar owning several taluqdari villages situate in the Dholka Taluka of Ahmedabad district. In the year 1922-23 there was a revision settlement of land revenue of the lands situate in the said taluka including the said taluqdari villages. Under that settlement the aggregate of the land revenue payable in respect of the lands comprised in the said taluqdari villages was fixed in a sum of Rs. 62,627-2-6. In the year 1925-56, in exercise of the powers conferred under s. 22 of the Gujarat Taluqdars' Act, 1888 (Bom. VI of 1888) (hereinafter referred to as the Taluqdars' Act), the Government of Bombay ascertained and declared that a jama of Rs. 32,643-3-0 was payable in respect of the said taluqdari villages and the said declaration was to remain in force for a period of thirty years from the year 1925-56. In the year 1949, the Bombay Legislature passed the Bombay Taluqdari Abolition Act, 1949, hereinafter referred to as the Abolition Act, and it came into force on or about August 15, 1950. By s. 8 of the Abolition Act, the taluqdari tenure was abolished and all the incidents of the said tenure attaching to any land comprised in the taluqdari estate were extinguished. Under the Abolition Act, the appellant became an occupant of the lands. After the expiry of the thirty-year period, the talatis of the respective villages called upon the appellant to pay the full land revenue assessment in respect of the lands comprised in the said villages. The appellant contending that he was only liable to pay jama declared to be payable by him by the Government in 1925-26 filed a writ petition in the High Court of Bombay for the aforesaid relief.

The appellant in Civil Appeal No. 255 of 1958 was a taluqdar owning several taluqdari villages situate in Dholka and Dhandhulka talukas of Ahmeda-bad District. The facts in this case are similar to those given in Civil Appeal No. 254 of 1958 except in regard to the fact that the jama ascertained and declared to be payable by the appellant in this appeal by the Government in 1925-26 was about Rs. 5,734 as against the settlement amount of Rs.14,452-11-0.

The appellant in Civil Appeal No. 256 of 1958 was a taluqdar owning several taluqdari villages situate in Dholka taluka in Ahmedabad district. The facts in this appeal also are similar to those in the other two except in regard to the fact that in this case the Government ascertained and declared the jama payable by the appellant to be Rs. 21,877 as against the settlement amount of Rs. 44,551.

Writ Petition 66 of 1957 filed by the appellant in C. A. No. 254 of 1958 relates to the demand of enhanced revenue in respect of his Sanand estate. The facts in this petition are similar to those in appeals except that the Government ascertained and declared the jama payable by him at Rs. 20,886 as against the settlement amount of Rs. 48,247-18-0. The writ petition relates to the demand made for the year 1956-57.

Writ Petition No. 18 of 1957 was filed by Thakur Vikramsinhji Manhar-sinhji of Gumph Estate, Ahmedabad district, Bombay State, who was a taluqdar of Gumph Estate in Ahmedabad district comprising of seven taluqdari villages. The facts in this petition also are similar to those in the appeals. In this case the jama ascertained and declared was Rs. 16,499-4-0 whereas the assessment was fixed at Rs. 30,223-12-0. This writ petition also relates to the demand made for the year 1955-56.

The appellants in the appeals and the petitioners in the writ petitions afore-said will be, for the sake of convenience, described hereafter as the appellants.

Mr. A. V. Viswanatha Sastri, the learned counsel for the appellants, contends that the jama ascertained and declared to be due from the appellants for a period of thirty years was fixed at the revenue settlement, that by reason of s. 117B of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879 (hereinafter referred to as the Code), they were liable to pay only the said assessment till there was re-settlement and that, therefore, the respondents have no right to make a demand for an amount higher than that declared to be due from them in 1925-26. The learned Solicitor General counters this argument by contending that under the Taluqdars' Act, there was an essential distinction between revenue settlement and the ascertainment and declaration of the jama; that after the Abolition Act, the amount of jama was payable only till the expiry of the thirty-year period and that thereafter the appellants who had become mere occupants would be liable to pay the entire land revenue assessment already fixed in respect of those lands. The question is which of the two contentions should prevail having regard to the relevant provisions of the Taluqdars' Act, the Abolition Act and the Code.

It will be convenient to read the relevant provisions from the two Acts. Gujarat Taluqdars' Act, 1888:

"2. (1) In this Act, unless there be something repugnant in the subject or context,—

(a) ...

(b) ...

(c) 'jama' means land-revenue payable by a taluqdar to the Provincial Government;...

4. It shall be lawful for the Provincial Government, whenever it may seem expedient, to direct a revenue survey or a revised revenue survey of any taluqdari estate, under the provisions of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879, applicable to such surveys.

5. The settlement register prepared by the Survey officer under section 108 of the said Code on the occasion of making any such survey shall, unless the Provincial Government otherwise direct, contain, in lieu of the particulars specified in the said section, the following particulars (namely):—

(a) the area and the assessment of each survey-number;...

22. (1) If a taluqdar's estate, or any portion thereof, is not wholly or partially exempt from land-revenue and its liability to payment of land-revenue is not subject to special conditions or restrictions, the jama payable to Government in respect of such estate or person thereof shall, if a survey-settlement has been extended thereto, be the aggregate of the survey-assessments of the lands composing such estate or such portion thereof, minus such deduction, if any, as Government shall in each case direct.

(2) The Governor in Council may declare the amount of jama so ascertained fixed for any term not exceeding thirty years."

Bombay Taluqdari Tenure Abolition Act LXII of 1949:

"3. With effect from the date on which this Act comes into force,—

(i) the taluqdari tenure shall wherever it prevails be deemed to have been abolished; and

(ii) save as expressly provided by or under the provisions of this Act, all the incidents of the said tenure attaching to any land comprised in a taluqdari estate shall be deemed to have been extinguished.

4. All revenue surveys or revised revenue surveys of taluqdari estates directed by the State Government under section 4 of the Taluqdars' Act and all settlements made shall be deemed to have been made under Chapters VIII and VIII-A of the Code and the settlement registers and other records prepared of such surveys shall be deemed to have been prepared under the corresponding provisions of the Code.

5. (1) Subject to the provisions of sub-section (2),—

(a) all taluqdari lands are and shall be liable to the payment of land revenue in accordance with the provisions of the Code and the rules made thereunder, and

(b) a taluqdar holding any taluqdari land or a cadet of a taluqdar's family holding any taluqdari land hereditarily for the purpose of maintenance, immediately before the coming into force of this Act, shall be deemed to be an occupant within the meaning of the Code or any other law for the time being in force.

(2) Nothing in sub-section (1) shall be deemed to affect—...

(b) the right of any person to pay jama only under any agreement or settlement recognised under section 23 or under a declaration under section 22 of the Taluqdars' Act so long as such agreement, settlement or declaration remains in force under the provisions of this Act.

17. The enactments specified in Schedule II are hereby repealed:

Provided that the repeal of the said enactment shall not in any way be deemed to affect,—

(a) ...

(b) ...

(c) any declaration made or any agreement or settlement recognised, any partition confirmed and any management of the taluqdari estate assumed under the provisions of any of the enactments hereby repealed, and any proceedings connected with such partition or management instituted before the aforesaid date shall be continued and disposed of, as if this Act had not been passed."

The position emerging from the aforesaid provisions may be summarized thus: The Taluqdars' Act was enacted to make special provision for the revenue administration of the estates held by certain superior land-holders in the districts of Ahmedabad, Kaira, Broach and the Panch Mahals. Section 4 enabled the Governor in Council to direct a revenue survey or revised revenue survey of any taluqdari estate under the provisions of the Bombay Land Revenue Code. In regard to such an estate, survey would be made under s. 108 of the Code and the Settlement Officer would prepare a register to be called the "Settlement Register", which would contain the particulars mentioned in s. 5 of the Taluqdars' Act in lieu of the particulars specified in s. 108 of the Code. Under s. 22 of the Taluqdars' Act, the jama payable by a taluqdar would be the aggregate of the survey assessments of the lands composing such an estate or such portion thereof minus such deduction, if any, that the Government in each case should direct. Under sub-s. (2), the Governor in Council was empowered to declare the jama so ascertained fixed for any term not exceeding thirty years. In 1949, the taluqdari tenure was abolished by the Bombay Taluqdari Tenure Abolition Act. By s. 5 of the Abolition Act, the taluqdars became occupants within the meaning of the Code, i.e., they were deemed to be holders in actual possession of unalienated lands other than the tenants; with the result that all the taluqdari lands became liable to the payment of land revenue in accordance with the provisions of the Code and the rules made thereunder. Sub-section (2) of s. 5 saved the right of any person to pay jama only under an agreement or settlement recognized under s. 23 or a declaration made under s. 22 of the Taluqdars' Act so long as such agreement, settlement or declaration remained in force. Shortly stated, the combined effect of the provisions was that the taluqdari tenure was abolished and that the taluqdar became the occupant with liability to pay land revenue in accordance with the provisions of the Code.

If there was no other relevant provision indicating a contrary intention, it is manifest from the aforesaid summary that the appellants would be liable to pay land revenue in accordance with the provisions of the Code after the period fixed in the declaration expired; i.e., from the year 1955-1956.

The learned counsel for the appellants contends that by reason of s. 117R of the Code, the declaration made by the Governor in Council fixing the amount of jama for a period of thirty years would continue to be in force even after the expiry of the said period till a revision settlement was made and, therefore, the saving clause would preclude the Government from demanding higher amount of revenue than the jama ascertained and fixed in the declaration till the date of the revised settlement. Section 117R of the Code reads:

"All settlements of land revenue heretofore made and introduced and in force at the date of the commencement of the Bombay Land Revenue Code (Amendment) Act, 1939, shall be deemed to have been made and introduced in accordance with the provisions of this Chapter and shall, notwithstanding anything contained in section 117E, be deemed to continue to remain in force until the introduction of a revision settlement."

If the declaration of the Governor in Council is a settlement of land revenue within the meaning of this section, it would continue to be in force till the introduction of the revision settlement. It is, therefore, necessary to ascertain the meaning of the words "settlement of land revenue" in the section. Settlement is defined by s. 117C(1) to mean the result of the operations conducted in a zone in order to determine the land revenue assessment. What is the scope of the operations conducted to arrive at the said result? The provisions of Ch. VIII-A lay down the successive steps to be followed by the authorities concerned to fix the land revenue. Under s. 117D, the Government may at any time direct a settlement of the land revenue of any land of which revenue survey has been made under s. 95 or not. It may also direct at any time a revised settlement of the land revenue of such lands. A settlement once made remains in force for a period of thirty years unless the State Government directs that it should remain in force for any period less than thirty years. In a case where a revised settlement of land revenue has not been made for one reason or other, the Government may extend the term of the settlement for such period as it may think fit. The land revenue assessment shall be determined by dividing the lands to be settled into different groups and fixing a standard rate for each group. Groups are ordinarily formed on a consideration of various factors such as physical configuration, climate, rain-fall, price and yield of principal crop and other relevant considerations. Land revenue of individual survey numbers and subdivisions shall be based on their classification and value in the manner prescribed. The Settlement Officer, who is entrusted with the duty of making the settlement, shall follow the prescribed procedure and fix a standard rate for each class of land in each group on a consideration of the relevant factors. A hierarchy of Tribunals are created for the persons aggrieved to take the matter in appeal. Finally the State Government passes orders approving the standard rates or varying them. After the State Government has passed orders and the notice of the same has been given in the prescribed manner, settlement will be deemed to have been introduced and land revenue according to such settlement will be levied from such date as the State Government may direct. It will be seen from the aforesaid summary of the scheme of land revenue settlement that land revenue is fixed for each land, having regard to the group within which it falls. All such settlements of land-revenue made before the Bombay Land Revenue (Amendment) Code, 1939, will be deemed to remain in force until the introduction of a revised settlement.

Part II of the Taluqdars' Act provided for survey and settlement. Under s. 4 of the Taluqdars' Act, the Governor in Council might direct a revenue survey of the taluqdari estate under the provisions of the Code. The settlement register prepared under that Code was directed to contain particulars mentioned in s. 5 such as area and assessment of such survey-number etc. Presumably, under that Act a settlement was made in regard to the taluqdari estates and settlement registers were prepared fixing the assessment of each survey-number. That settlement would certainly be a settlement of land revenue within the meaning of s. 117R of the Code and that would continue to be in force till a resettlement was made.

Part IV of the Taluqdars' Act dealt with Revenue Administration. Section 22 laid down that in a case where survey-settlement had been extended to a taluqdari estate, the jama payable by the taluqdar to Government in respect of such an estate shall be the aggregate of the survey-assessments of the lands composing such estate or such portion thereof minus such deduction, if any, as Government shall direct in each case. Under sub-s. (2) of s. 22, the Governor in Council could declare the amount of jama so ascertained fixed for any term not exceeding thirty years. Under s. 23, nothing in the Act was deemed to affect the validity of any agreement thereto-before entered into by or with a taluqdar and still in force as to the amount of his jama, nor of any settlement of the amount of jama made by or under the orders of Government for a term of years and still in force. Sections 22 and 23 provided for the arrangements entered into or to be entered into with the Governor in Council in respect of the jama payable by the taluqdars. Section 23 saved the previous agreements or settlements in respect of the jama. Section 22 authorized the Government to fix the jama, having regard to the aggregate of the survey assessments of the lands and to declare the same fixed for a period of years not exceeding thirty. The declaration under s. 22 or the agreement or settlement of jama mentioned in s. 23(1) might be described broadly as a settlement entered into between the Government and a taluqdar but it was not a settlement of land-revenue within the meaning of s. 117R of the Code, for settlement of revenue was the result of operations carried on in respect of different classes of lands in the manner prescribed by Ch. VIII-A of the Code or the settlement in respect of such lands in accordance with the pre-existing laws. It was beyond the scope of Ch. VIII-A to ascertain the jama, though the rates fixed under such a settlement were taken as the basis by the Government in ascertaining the jama payable by the taluqdar. The jama payable by the taluqdar was distinct from the revenue assessment of the land comprised in the taluqdari estate and they could not be equated.

Section 17 of the Abolition Act repealed the Taluqdars' Act and expressly provided that the repeal of the said enactment shall not affect any declaration made or any agreement or settlement recognized in respect of the taluqdari estates. Section 5(2)(b) of the Abolition Act expressly saved the agreement or settlement recognized under s. 23 or a declaration made under s. 22 from the operation of the Act till such agreement, settlement or declaration remained in force. It is, therefore, manifest that the declaration made under the Taluqdars' Act enured to the advantage of the taluqdars, notwithstanding the repeal of the Taluqdars' Act, till such time it was in force. When the Abolition Act came into force, the time mentioned in the declaration in the cases before us, i.e., thirty years, had not run out and, therefore, the declaration made by the Government under the Taluqdars' Act continued to be in force till 1955-56. After the expiry of the time, the appellants would be liable to pay the entire land revenue according to the settlement register.

The entire scheme of the Abolition Act was that after the passing of that Act, the taluqdars became occupants with the result that they would be liable to pay land revenue in accordance with the provisions of the Land Revenue Code. If sub-s. (2) was not inserted in s. 5, they would be liable to pay land-revenue under the Code, notwithstanding the declaration made or the agreement entered into by the Government with them in regard to the jama payable by them. Sub-section (2) was only enacted to preserve to them the concession till the period fixed had expired. We, therefore, hold that the declaration made by the Governor in Council in 1925-26 expired in 1955-56 and the appellants became liable to pay the entire land-revenue according to the settlement registers from the year 1955-56.

In the result, all the appeals and the writ petitions are dismissed with costs, the State of Bombay and the Collector of Ahmedabad, who are the respondents herein, getting one set of hearing costs in all.

Appeals and petitions dismissed.

THE WESTERN INDIA THEATRES LTD. v. THE CANTONMENT BOARD, POONA, CANTONMENT.*

Government of India Act, 1935 [25 & 26 Geo. V, Ch. 43], Sec. 100, Sch. VII, List II, entries 50, 46—Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act (Bom. XVIII of 1925), Sec. 73—Whether entry 50 contemplates law restricted to imposing taxes on persons who receive or enjoy the luxuries or the entertainments or the amusements—Section 73 of Bom. Act XVIII of 1925 whether law with respect to matters enumerated in entry 46.

The words "taxes on luxuries or entertainments or amusements" in entry 50, List II, Seventh Schedule to the Government of India Act, 1935, have not a restricted meaning so as to confine the operation of the law to be made thereunder only to taxes on persons receiving the luxuries, entertainments or amusements. The entry contemplates luxuries, entertainments and amusements as objects on which the tax is to be imposed. Therefore, a law which imposes tax on the act of entertaining is within the entry whether it falls on the giver or the receiver of that entertainment.

Section 73 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, is a law with respect to matters enumerated in entry 50 and not entry 46, List II, Seventh Schedule to the Government of India Act, 1935, and the Bombay Legislature had ample power to enact this law.

The facts leading up to this appeal may shortly be stated. The appellant is a public limited company registered under the Indian Companies Act, 1913.

Decided, January 16, 1959. Civil Appeal 1 [1955] I S. C. R. 829, s.c. 57 Bom. L.R. No. 145 of 1955. 628.

It is a lessee of two cinema Houses known respectively as "West End" and "Capitol" situated within the limits of Poona cantonment area. It exhibits in the said two Houses cinematograph films, both foreign and Indian.

On March 20, 1947, a notice was issued by the respondent whereby, in exercise of the powers conferred on it by s. 60 of the Cantonments Act, 1924 (II of 1924), the respondent proposed to make, with the previous sanction of the Central Government, certain amendments in the notification of the Government of Bombay in the General Department No. 4160 dated June 17, 1918, and intimated that the draft amendments would be considered by the respondent on or after April 21, 1947, and invited objection in writing within 30 days from the publication of that notice. One of the items of amendments was as follows:—

"(H) 'V-Tax on Entertainments'

- | | |
|-------------------------------|---|
| 1. Cinemas, Talkies or dramas | { Rs. 5-0-0 per show.
Rs. 10-0-0 per show. |
| 2. Circus | Rs. 2-0-0 per show. |
| 3. Horse Races | Rs. 100-0-0 per day of race meetings. |
| 4. Amusement park | Rs. 20-0-0 per day. |

1. The said tax shall be levied at the rate of Rs. 10-0-0 per show in the case of the West End and Capitol Talkies and at the rate of Rs. 5-0-0 per show in other cases."

It appears that the Cinematograph Exhibitors Association of India submitted certain objections to the proposals. The Cantonment Executive Officer, Poona, by his letter dated July 8, 1947, informed the Secretary of the Cinematograph Exhibitors Association of India that the latter's letter had been submitted to the Government of India in original along with the respondent's proposals and that the imposition of the entertainments tax on cinemas had been approved by the Government of India, Defence Department notification No. 1463 dated May 7, 1947. On June 17, 1948, a notification was issued by the Government of Bombay to the effect that in supersession of the notifications of Government noted on the margin and of all other notifications on the same subject, the Governor-in-Council, with the previous sanction of the Governor General-in-Council, was pleased to impose certain taxes in the Cantonment of Poona with effect from July 15, 1948. One of the taxes thus imposed was as follows:—

"V-Tax on entertainments.

- | | |
|---|---------------------------------------|
| 1. Cinemas, Talkies or dramas | Rs. 10-0-0 per show. |
| in the case of the West End and Capitol | |
| In other cases | Rs. 5-0-0 per show. |
| 2. Circus | Rs. 2-0-0 per show. |
| 3. Horse Races | Rs. 100-0-0 per day of race meetings. |
| 4. Amusement park | Rs. 20-0-0 per day." |

The appellant paid the tax under protest and on or about April 19, 1950, filed a suit (being suit No. 89 of 1950) against the respondent in the Court of the Civil Judge, Senior Division, Poona, for a declaration that the levy, collection or recovery of the said tax by the respondent was illegal and invalid, for a permanent injunction restraining the respondent from levying, collecting or recovering the said tax, for refund of the sum of Rs. 45,802-0-0 being the total amount of tax collected from the appellant, for costs and interest on judgment. By its judgment dated July 31, 1951, the trial Court decreed the suit in full. The respondent preferred an appeal before the High Court against the said judgment and decree of the trial Court, and the High Court by its judgment and decree dated February 10, 1953, allowed the appeal and dismissed the appellant's suit with costs throughout. The High Court, however, granted to the appellant a certificate of fitness for appeal to this Court and hence this final appeal questioning the validity of the said tax.

At all times material to this appeal the respondent was governed by the Cantonments Act, 1924 (Act II of 1924). Section 60 of that Act runs as follows:—

"60. (1) The Board may, with the previous sanction of the local Government, impose in any Cantonment any tax which, under any enactment for the time being in force, may be imposed in any municipality in the province wherein the Cantonment is situated.

(2) Any tax imposed under this section shall take effect from the date of its notification in the official gazette."

The enactment under which, shortly after the date of passing of the Cantonments Act, 1924, tax could be imposed by the municipal boroughs in the province of Bombay was the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925 (Bom. XVIII of 1924). Therefore, the powers of the respondent to levy and collect taxes under the provisions of the Cantonments Act were co-extensive with the powers of the Borough Municipalities under the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925. Section 73 of the last mentioned Act specified the taxes which might be imposed by a municipality. The relevant portions thereof, prior to its present adaptation, were as follows:—

"(1) Subject to any general or special orders which the Provincial Government may make in this behalf and to the provisions of sections 75 and 76, a municipality may impose for the purposes of this Act any of the following taxes, namely:—...

(xiv) any other tax (not being a toll on motor vehicles and trailers, save as provided by section 14 of the Bombay Motor Vehicles Tax Act, 1935) which under the Government of India Act, 1935, the Provincial Legislature has power to impose in the Province."

The question is whether the provincial Legislature of Bombay had power to impose the tax which is under consideration in this appeal.

Under s. 100 of the Government of India Act, 1935, read with entry 50 in Sch. VII thereto the provincial Legislature had power to make law with respect to "taxes on luxuries, including taxes on entertainments, amusements, betting and gambling". Learned counsel for the appellant contends that the impugned tax is not covered by this entry at all. This entry, according to him, contemplates a law imposing taxes on persons who receive or enjoy the luxuries or the entertainments or the amusements and, therefore, no law made with respect to matters covered by this entry can impose a tax on persons who provide the luxuries, entertainments or amusements, for the last mentioned persons themselves receive or enjoy no luxury or entertainment or amusement, but simply carry on their profession, trade or calling. Learned counsel urges that the impugned law is really one with respect to matters specified in entry 46, namely, taxes on professions, trades, callings and employments and, therefore, cannot exceed Rs. 100 per annum under s. 142A of the Government of India Act, 1935, and Rs. 250 per annum under art. 276(2) of the Constitution. We are unable to accept this argument as sound.

As pointed out by this Court in Navinchandra Mafatlal v. The Commissioner of Income Tax, Bombay City,¹ following certain earlier decisions referred to therein, the entries in the legislative list should not be read in a narrow or restricted sense and that each general word should be held to extend to all ancillary or subsidiary matters which can fairly and reasonably be said to be comprehended in it. It has been accepted as well-settled that in construing such an entry conferring legislative powers the widest possible construction according to their ordinary meaning must be put upon the words used therein. In view of this well established rule of interpretation, there can be no reason to construe the words "taxes on luxuries or entertainments or amusements" in entry 50 as having a restricted meaning so as to confine the operation of the law to be made thereunder only to taxes on persons receiving the luxuries, entertainments or amusements. The entry contemplates luxuries, entertainments and amusements as objects on which the tax is to be imposed. If the words are to be so regarded, as we think they must, there can be no reason to differentiate between the giver and the receiver of the luxuries, entertainments or amusements and both may, with equal propriety, be made amenable to the tax. It is true that economists regard an entertainment tax as a tax on expenditure and, indeed, when the tax is imposed on the receiver of the entertainment, it does become a tax on expenditure, but there is no warrant for holding that entry 50 contemplates only a tax on moneys spent on luxuries, entertainments or amusements. The entry, as we have said, contemplates a law with respect to these matters regarded as objects and a law which imposes tax on the act of entertaining is within the entry whether it falls on the giver or the receiver of that entertainment. Nor is the impugned tax a tax imposed for the privilege of carrying on any trade or calling. It is a tax imposed on every show, that is to say, on every instance of the exercise of the particular trade, calling or employment. If there is no show, there is no tax. A lawyer has to pay a tax or fee to take out a license irrespective of whether or not he actually practises. That tax is a tax for the privilege of having the right to exercise the profession if and when the person taking out the license chooses to do so. The impugned tax is a tax on the act of entertainment resulting in a show. In our opinion, therefore, s. 73 is a law with respect to matters enumerated in entry 50 and not entry 46 and the Bombay Legislature had ample power to enact this law.

The only other point urged before us is that the notification is violative of the equal protection clause of our Constitution in that it has picked out the appellant's cinema houses for discriminatory treatment by imposing on it a tax at the rate of Rs. 10 per show, while a tax of only Rs. 5 per show is imposed on other cinema houses. The meaning, scope and effect of the provisions of art. 14 of our Constitution have been fully dealt with, analysed and laid down by this Court in *Budhan Choudhry v. The State of Bihar*² and *Ram Krishna Dalmia v. Tendolkar J.*³ It appears, however, from the record that no issue was raised and no evidence was adduced by the appellant before the trial Court showing that there were other cinema Houses similarly situate as that of the appellant's cinema Houses. It may not be unreasonable or improper if a higher tax is imposed on the shows given by a cinema house which contains large seating accommodation and is situate in fashionable or busy localities where the number of visitors is more numerous and in more affluent circumstances than the tax that may be imposed on shows given in a smaller cinema house containing less accommodation and situate in some localities where the visitors are less numerous or financially in less affluent circumstances, for the two cannot, in those circumstances, be said to be similarly situate. There was, however, no material on which the trial Court could, or we may now come, to a decision as to whether there had been any real discrimination in the facts and circumstances of this case. It may be that the appellant may in some future proceeding adduce evidence to establish that there are other cinema houses similarly situate and that the imposition of a higher tax on the appellant is discriminatory as to which we say nothing; but all we need say is that in this suit the appellant has not discharged the onus that was on him and, on the material on record, it is impossible for us to hold in this case that there has been any discrimination in fact.

For reasons stated above this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

THE WESTERN INDIA THEATRES LTD. v. MUNICIPAL CORPORATION OF THE CITY OF POONA.*

Bombay District Municipal Act (Bom. III of 1901), Sec. 59(1)(xi)—Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act (Bom. XVIII of 1925), Sec. 60(1)—Whether s. 59(1)(xi) unconstitutional as delegating to municipality legislative functions in excess of permissible limits—Expression "modify" in s. 60(1) of Bom. Act XVIII of 1925 whether means "to enhance".

Section 59(1)(xi) of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, is not unconstitutional.

Section 59(1)(xi) of the Act lays down a principle and fixes a standard which the municipalities have to follow in imposing a tax and the Legislature cannot, in the circumstances, be said to have abdicated itself and, therefore, the delegation of power to impose any tax cannot be struck down as being in excess of the permissible limits of delegation of legislative functions.

The word "modify" in s. 60(1) of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, means not only "to reduce" but means also "to enhance."

*Stevens v. General Steam Navigation Company,*¹ referred to.

THE facts appear at 56 Bombay Law Reporter 47.

H. D. Banaji, with R. A. Gagrai and G. Gopalkrishnan, for the appellant.

M. C. Setalvad, Attorney-General for India, with S. N. Andley and J. B. Dadachanji, for the respondent.

DAS C.J. The appellant is a public limited company registered under the Indian Companies Act, 1913. It is a lessee of four cinema houses situate within the municipal limits of Poona City known respectively as "Minerva", "The Globe", "Sri Krishna" and "The Nishat". It exhibits cinematograph films, both foreign and Indian, in the said four houses. The respondent, a body corporate, was governed by the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901 (Bom. III of 1901) up to June 8, 1926, and from then by the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925 (Bom. XVIII of 1925) up to December 29, 1949, and, thereafter, by the Bombay Provincial Municipal Corporation Act, 1949 (Bom. LIX of 1949). With effect from October 1, 1920, the respondent, with the sanction of the Government of Bombay levied on the owners and lessees of cinema houses within the limits of the erstwhile province of Bombay a tax of Rs. 2 per day as license fee. Rules for the levy and collection of the said tax were framed by the respondent. Those rules were amended on or about June 3, 1941, enhancing the tax from Rs. 2 per day to Re. 1 per show. The rules were again revised on or about June 9, 1948, under which the tax was enhanced from Re. 1 per show to Rs. 5 per show. At all material times the tax was being collected at the last mentioned rate.

Section 59 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, provided that subject to any general or special orders which the State Government might make in that behalf any municipality (a) after observing the preliminary procedure required by s. 60, and (b) with the sanction of the authority therein mentioned, might impose for the purposes of that Act any of the taxes mentioned in that section. After enumerating ten specific heads of taxes, which a municipality could levy, a residuary category was set forth in cl. (xi) in the words following:—

"any other tax to the nature and object of which the approval of the Governor in Council shall have been obtained prior to the selection contemplated in sub-clause (i) of clause (a) of section 60."

*Decided, January 16, 1959. Civil Appeal 1 [1903] 1 K.B. 890.
No. 146 of 1955.

Ever since the appellant became a lessee of the said cinema houses, the appellant has been making payments of the said tax under protest.

After giving the necessary statutory notice to the respondent, the appellant, on or about March 31, 1950, filed a suit in the Court of the Civil Judge, Senior Division, Poona, being Suit No. 76 of 1950, against the respondent for a declaration that the levy and imposition of the said tax with effect from October 1, 1920, were invalid and illegal; that the enhancement in the rates of the tax with effect first from June 3, 1941, and then June 9, 1948, was invalid and illegal and that the resolutions passed and rules framed in connection with the levy, imposition, enhancement and collection of the said impugned tax were invalid, illegal and ultra vires, for a permanent injunction restraining the defendants from levying or recovering and/or increasing and enhancing the said tax and for refund to the appellant of the amounts of the tax collected from it and for costs of the suit and interest. By its judgment dated November 30, 1951, the trial Court held that the said tax was validly levied and imposed, but that the increase and enhancement thereof in 1941 and 1948 were illegal and ultra vires and that the suit was not barred under the Acts governing the respondent. The trial Court decreed the suit in part by issuing an injunction restraining the respondent from levying, recovering or collecting the tax at the enhanced rate and passing a decree against the respondent for refund of a sum of Rs. 27,072 with interest and costs. The respondent preferred an appeal and the appellant filed cross objections. But the High Court by its judgment and decree dated February 10, 1948, reversed the judgment of the trial Court and dismissed the suit of the appellant with costs throughout. The appellant's cross objections were also dismissed. On December 10, 1953, the High Court granted leave to the appellant to appeal to this Court from the said judgment. Hence this final appeal questioning the validity of the impugned tax.

The first point urged in this appeal is that the law imposing this tax is not covered by entry 50 in List II of the Seventh Schedule to the Government of India Act, 1935, but is really a tax on the appellant's trade or calling referred to in entry 46 and that, therefore, the amount of tax cannot under s. 142-A of the Government of India Act, 1935, exceed Rs. 100 per annum. This point need not detain us long, for it is covered by us in the appellant's other appeal No. 145 of 1955. (Western India Theatres v. C.B., Poona)†

The second point urged before us in support of this appeal is that s. 59(1) (xi) is unconstitutional in that the Legislature had completely abdicated its functions and had delegated essential legislative power to the municipality to determine the nature of the tax to be imposed on the rate payers. Learned counsel for the appellant urges that the power thus delegated to the municipality is unguided, uncanalised and vagrant, for there is nothing in the Act to prevent the municipality from imposing any tax it likes, even, say, income-tax. Such omnibus delegation, he contends, cannot on the authorities be supported as constitutional. We find ourselves in agreement with the High Court in rejecting this contention.

In the first place, the power of the municipality cannot exceed the power of the provincial Legislature itself and the municipality cannot impose any tax, e.g., income-tax which the provincial Legislature could not itself impose. In the next place, s. 59 authorises the municipality to impose the taxes therein mentioned "for the purposes of this Act". The obligations and functions cast upon the municipalities are set forth in ch. VII of the Act. Taxes, therefore, can be levied by the municipality only for implementing those purposes and for no other purpose. In other words it will be open to the municipality to levy a tax for giving any of the amenities therein mentioned. The matter may be illustrated by reference to s. 54 which enumerates the duties of municipalities. The first duty mentioned in that section is that the municipality should make provision for lighting public streets and nobody can object if it imposes a lighting tax, which indeed, is item (ix) in s. 59(1). Take another example: It is the duty of the municipality to arrange for supply of drinking water and it may legitimately charge a water rate which, again, is item (viii) in s. 59(1). We do not for a moment suggest that the municipalities may only impose a tax directly in connection with the heads of duties cast upon it. What we say is that the tax to be imposed must have some reasonable relation to the duties cast on it by the Act. In the third place, although the rule of construction based on the principle of ejusdem generis cannot be invoked in this case, for items (i) to (x) do not, strictly speaking, belong to the same genus, but they do indicate, to our mind, the kind and nature of tax which the municipalities are authorised to impose. Finally, the provincial Legislature had certainly not abdicated in favour of the municipality, for the taxing power of the municipality was quite definitely made subject to the approval of the Governor-in-Council. Under the Indian Council Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vic. c. 67) the Governor-in-Council might mean the Governor in Executive Council or the Governor in Legislative Council. If the reference in s. 59(1)(xi) is to the Governor's Legislative Council, then there was no improper delegation at all, for it was subject to the legislative control of the Governor in Legislative Council. The Governor's Legislative Council was composed of all the members of the Governor's Executive Council besides a few other persons. Therefore, if the reference was to the Governor in his Executive Council even then, from a practical point of view, the ultimate control was left with the Governor's Legislative Council. We need not labour this point any further, for on the first three grounds the delegation of legislative authority, if any, is not excessive so as to make the exercise of it unconstitutional. In our opinion the impugned section did lay down a principle and fix a standard which the municipalities had to follow in imposing a tax and the Legislature cannot, in the circumstances, be said to have had abdicated itself and, therefore, the delegation of power to impose any other tax cannot be struck down as being in excess of the permissible limits of delegation of legislative functions.

The last point urged by learned counsel for the appellant is that, under cl. (xi) of s. 59(1), the enhancements of the rates of the tax in 1941 and again in 1948 were illegal in that the municipality had no power to do so under the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925. According to learned counsel for the appellant the judgment under appeal upholding the validity of such enhancements cannot be supported under s. 60 of that Act. That section runs as follows:—

"Power to suspend, reduce or abolish any existing tax.

60. (1) Subject to the requirements of clause (a) of the proviso to section 58 a municipality may, except as otherwise provided in clause (b) of the proviso to section 103 at any time for any sufficient reason, suspend, modify or abolish any existing tax by suspending, altering or rescinding any rule prescribing such tax.

(2) The provisions of Chapter VII relating to the imposition of taxes shall apply so far as may be to the suspension, modification or abolition of any tax and to the suspension, alteration or rescission of any rule prescribing a tax."

Reference is made to the marginal note where the words used are "power to suspend, reduce or abolish any existing tax". It is suggested that the word "modify" in the body of the section in between the words "suspend" and "abolish" should be construed in the sense of reduction. The marginal note, according to him, shows that the several words were used in the section to indicate a progressive diminution in the quantum of tax until it was completely gone. Reference is made to the root meaning of the word "modify" which is to reduce or make less but does not cover the idea of enhancement. In the first place, the marginal note cannot affect the construction of the language used in the body of the section if it is otherwise clear and unambiguous (see *Commissioner of Income Tax, Bombay v. Ahmedbhai Umarbhai & Co.*¹) In the next place, it should be borne in mind that s. 67 of the Bombay District Municipal

Act (Bom. III of 1901) which was formerly applicable to municipalities used the word "reduce" in between the words "suspend" and "abolish" and that that section had been reproduced in s. 60 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, but that in the process of such reproduction the word "reduce" was dropped and the word "modify" was introduced. In the marginal note, however, the word "reduce" was not substituted by the word "modify", apparently through inadvertence. If the word "modify" is to be read as "reduce", then there could be no point in the provincial Legislature substituting the word "reduce" by the word "modify". This change must have been made with some purpose and the purpose could only have been to use an expression of wider connotation so as to include not only reduction but also other kinds of alteration. Section 76 of this very Act also refers to "modification not involving an increase in the amount to be imposed" which makes the sense in which the word "modify" has been used in this Act perfectly clear, namely, that there may be a modification involving an increase. Reference may also be made to the decision of the Court of Appeal in England in the case of Stevens v. General Steam Navigation Company.² "Modification", according to Collins M. R. in his judgment at p. 893, implied an alteration and the word was equally applicable whether the effect of the alteration was to narrow or to enlarge the provision. In our opinion the dropping of the word "reduce" and the introduction of the word "modify" in the body of s. 60 of the Act under consideration clearly indicate an intention on the part of Legislature to widen the scope of this section and the High Court was right in so construing the same.

No other point was urged in this appeal and for reasons stated above this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

FULL BENCH.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. H. K. Chinnai, Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Mudholkar and Mr. Justice Patel.

NIVRUTTI LAXMAN KONDOBAHIRE v. SHIVDAYAL.
LAXMINARAYAN SARDA.*

Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act (Bom. LXVII of 1948), Secs. 70(b), 29, 85, 85A, 4, 74(1)—Application filed by landlord before Mamlatdar for declaration that opponent not his tenant under Act—Whether Mamlatdar can entertain and decide such application—"For the purposes of this Act", meaning of expression in s. 70.

Under the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, the Mamlatdar can entertain and decide an application filed by a landlord for a declaration that his opponent, who claims to be his tenant, is not a tenant under the Act.

The words "for the purposes of this Act" in s. 70 of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, mean for the purposes of deciding any question relating to a matter, which is regulated or governed by the provisions of the Act.

*Maganbhai Patel v. Bombay Revenue Tribunal*¹ and *Dhondt Tukaram v. Dadoo Patil*², referred to.

ONE Shivdayal and another (respondents) on August 25, 1953, made an application to the Mamlatdar of Mangalwedha in Sholapur district for a declaration that Nivrutti (petitioner) was not their tenant in regard to four survey numbers of Mangalwedha and for removal of his name as tenant for the year 1952-53 from the revenue records. The petitioner resisted the application contending that he was a tenant of the respondents since thirty or forty years. The Mam-latdar held that the petitioner was a protected tenant and dismissed the application. On appeal by the respondents the District Deputy Collector of Pandharpur set aside the order of the Mamlatdar, granted a declaration to the respondents that the petitioner was not a tenant of the lands and directed that his name appearing as a tenant in the record of rights of the year 1952-53 be deleted. The petitioner applied in revision to the Bombay Revenue Tribunal, and the Tribunal confirmed the order of the District Deputy Collector. The petitioner applied to the High Court under art. 227 of the Constitution of India against the order of the Tribunal. The application came up before Mudholkar and Datar JJ. who referred the following question to a larger bench:—

“Whether under the provisions of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, the Mamlatdar can entertain and decide an application filed by a landlord for a declaration that his opponent, who claims to be his tenant, is not a tenant, under the said Act?”

In the course of his referring judgment, delivered on December 8, 1958, Datar J. observed as follows:—

DATAR J. The second point urged is whether under the provisions of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act a landlord can apply for what Mr. Sukthankar calls a negative declaration that his opponent, who claims to be a tenant, is not a tenant. On this point there appears to be some conflict of decisions in this Court. In Special Civil Application No. 278 of 1957 a Bench of this Court consisting of Mr. Justice Dixit and Mr. Justice Shelat held that an application by a tenant for a negative declaration that opponent No. 2 was not his sub-tenant was misconceived. We are told that a similar view was taken by the same Bench in Special Civil Application No. 1322 of 1957, which was decided on August 2, 1957. A different view was, however, expressed by another Bench of this Court consisting of Mr. Justice Chainani (as he then was) and Mr. Justice Tarkunde in Special Civil Application Nos. 59 of 1958 and 539 of 1958. It was held in those applications that the Mamlatdar was competent to entertain and decide an application for a declaration that a person was or was not a tenant.

The question referred to was considered by a bench composed of Chainani C. J. and Mudholkar and Patel JJ.

K. S. Sukthankar, for the petitioner in Sp. C. A. No. 2339.

Y. V. Chandrachud, with V. D. Malpani, for opponents Nos. 1 and 2.

A. D. Desai, for M. C. Shah, for the petitioner in No. 2639.

Rajni Patel, with I. C. Bhat, for the petitioner in No. 2342.

CHAINANI C. J. The question referred to the Full Bench is whether, under the provisions of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, the Mamlatdar can entertain and decide an application filed by a landlord for a declaration that his opponent, who claims to be his tenant, is not a tenant under the said Act.

There is no specific provision in the Act providing for such an application being made to the Mamlatdar. Section 70, however, provides:

“For the purposes of this Act the following shall be the duties and functions to be performed by the Mamlatdar...

(b) to decide whether a person is tenant or a protected tenant or a permanent tenant.”

It is, therefore, the duty and function of the Mamlatdar to decide whether a person is a tenant. The power to decide whether a person is a tenant, necessarily includes the power to decide that a person is not a tenant. This power is, however, to be exercised by the Mamlatdar, as stated in this section, for the purposes of the Act. In view of these words in the section, in Maganbhai

*Patel v. Bombay Revenue Tribunal*¹, the learned Judges were inclined to take the view that the Mamlatdar "will have authority to decide the question whether a person is or is not a tenant", if that question arises in an application made under the Act, such as an application under s. 29 of the Act. If this had been the intention of the Legislature, it would have used some such words as, "in any proceeding under the Act or in any application made under the Act." The words used "For the purposes of this Act" are very much wider. The other difficulty in accepting this view is the exclusion of the jurisdiction of the Civil Court in matters which, under the Act, are to be decided by the Mamlatdar. Section 85 of the Act provides that no Civil Court shall have jurisdiction to settle, decide or deal with any question which is by or under this Act required to be settled, decided or dealt with by the Mamlatdar. The question whether a person is or is not a tenant can, therefore, only be decided by a Mamlatdar, and the jurisdiction of the Civil Court to determine such a question is ousted by s. 85 of the Act. If, therefore, in a civil suit, the question arises whether a person is a tenant or not, the Civil Court will have no jurisdiction to decide it. Section 85A of the Act, as amended in 1956, enables the Civil Court to refer such a question to the Mamlatdar for determination. This amendment came into force with effect from August 1, 1956. Before that date, the Civil Court had no authority to refer any question for determination to the Mamlatdar. The only course open to it was to ask one or the other of the contending parties to make an application to the Mamlatdar and obtain his decision in the matter. It was so held by a Division Bench of this Court in *Dhondi Tukaram v. Dadoo Piraji*². It was held in that case that in a suit filed against the defendant for possession of agricultural lands on the footing that he is a trespasser, if he raises a plea that he is a tenant or a protected tenant, the proper procedure to adopt would be to direct the party who raises such a plea to obtain a decision from the Mamlatdar within a reasonable time. For this purpose, the party would have to apply to the Mamlatdar and the application would be for a declaration that the applicant is a tenant. That a reference to the Mamlatdar is necessary in such cases was also recognised in Maganbhai's case. In the last but one paragraph of the judgment in that case, it has been observed that if an issue arises in a civil suit as to whether a person is or is not a sub-tenant (or a tenant), that issue would be one for the Mamlatdar to decide upon a reference by the Civil Court. The Mamlatdar can, therefore, decide this question, even if it arises in a proceeding other than a proceeding under the Tenancy Act. If the Mamlatdar has jurisdiction to decide the question, after it arises in a Civil Court, he will also have jurisdiction to decide it before it arises in the Civil Court. A party may frequently find it more convenient to approach the Mamlatdar before he files a civil suit. The Act also contains no provision under which the exercise of jurisdiction by the Mamlatdar is made dependent upon the issue arising in a civil suit, or in some other proceeding under the Act.

It follows that an application for a declaration that a person is a tenant can lie before the Mamlatdar. This view finds support in the provisions of ss. 4 and 74 of the Act. Section 4 provides that a person lawfully cultivating any land belonging to another person shall be deemed to be a tenant, except in the cases specified in the section. This section does not, however, contain any provision for an application to the Mamlatdar, for declaring a person to be a tenant. Sub-section (1) of s. 74 provides that an appeal may be filed to the Collector against an order of the Mamlatdar made under s. 4. Section 74, therefore, contemplates an application being made to the Mamlatdar under s. 4 and the Mamlatdar's making an order upon it. The necessary inference, therefore, is that the Mamlatdar is competent to entertain an application for a declaration that a person is a tenant.

It has, however, been urged that while an application may be made to a of 1957, decided by Dixit and Shelat JJ., on 2 (1952) 55 Bom. L.R. 363.

Mamlatdar for obtaining a declaration that a person is a tenant, an application for a negative declaration that a person is not a tenant, is not competent. It has been contended that the object of the Act is to protect tenants and that it confers special rights upon them and that, consequently, where the owner of a land alleges that a person is not a tenant or that he is not entitled to the protection of the Act, the application cannot be said to be one for the purposes of the Act. There does not seem to us to be much force in this argument. The purposes of the Act are, as will be seen from the preamble, to regulate the relations of landlords and tenants of agricultural lands. While the Act confers extensive rights on tenants, the landlords are not deprived of all their rights. For instance, they can terminate the tenancies and resume possession of their lands in certain circumstances. Under s. 29, both the landlords and the tenants can apply to the Mamlatdar for obtaining possession of lands. Under cl. (b) of s. 70 of the Act, the Mamlatdar has jurisdiction to determine whether a person is a tenant. He can, therefore, also decide that a person is not a tenant. If he can decide this question on an application made to him by a tenant, it is difficult to understand why he should not be able to decide this question, when the application is made by the landlord. In either case, the question which the Mamlatdar will have to determine is whether the relationship of landlord and tenant exists between the parties. The jurisdiction to decide this question vests exclusively in the Mamlatdar and the Civil Court is not competent to decide it. This question will also have to be determined by reference to and in the light of the provisions of the Act as to who are and who are deemed to be tenants and as to how and in what circumstances a tenancy can be terminated. Such a determination will, therefore, be for the purposes of the Act. The words "for the purposes of this Act", in our opinion, mean for the purposes of deciding any question relating to a matter, which is regulated or governed by the provisions of this Act. If, therefore, the question raised before the Mamlatdar relates to a matter, which is to be decided by reference to the provisions of the Act, its determination by the Mamlatdar will be for the purposes of the Act and it is immaterial whether the application raising the question is made by the landlord or by the tenant.

We are accordingly of the opinion that a Mamlatdar can entertain and decide an application for a declaration that a person is or is not a tenant.

The reply to the question referred to the Full Bench will, therefore, be in the affirmative.

Answer accordingly.

BHIKHU SAKHARAM KHARATE v. B. K. POTDAR.*

Bombay Village Panchayats Act (Bom. VI of 1933), Secs. 4(1), 7-B(1)(2), 7-C(2)(3)—Person elected from ward in list of voters pertaining to which his name does not appear as voter—Validity of such election.

Under the Bombay Village Panchayats Act, 1933, a person whose name appears in the list of voters of a particular ward can stand for election from that ward only and not from any other ward in which his name does not appear in the list of voters.

Ardeshtir Sorabji v. V. M. Bhatti, doubted and distinguished.

ONE Bhiku (petitioner) filed his nomination on November 13, 1957, for a general seat in Ward No. IV of the village Panchayat of Neral-Mamdapur. This nomination was scrutinized on November 15, 1957, the polling took place on December 26, 1957, and the result of the election was declared on December 28, 1957. The petitioner was declared elected to the general seat in Ward No. IV. One Ramanlal (respondent No. 2), who was a voter in Ward No. IV, applied to the Collector at Alibag for declaring the election of the petitioner null and void on the ground that the petitioner was not a voter of Ward No. IV but of Ward No. II. This application was forwarded to the District Deputy Collector at Panvel (respondent No. 1) for disposal. Respondent No. 1 allowed the application and declared the election of the petitioner null and void, observing in his order as follows:—

Applications Nos. 2504, 2384 and 2799 of 1958.

"The only controversial point in this case is whether the word 'list of voters' occurring in sub-s. 7C (2) denotes a particular ward or the whole village. The High Court has discussed this point at length in its above quoted decision [Civil Application No. 156 of 1958] and has observed that the word denotes the whole village and not a particular ward. The High Court has based this view on the strength of provision made in para. 2 of rr. 9 and 34 of the Bombay Village Panchayat Election Rules, 1948. Paragraph 2 of r. 9 runs as under:—

'When an election was held at or about the same time for two or more wards in the village one and the same person may stand for election in all or any number of such wards.'

Since there was a provision in the Village Panchayat Election Rules for seeking election to any number of wards simultaneously, the correct interpretation of words 'such list' would be the list of voters for the whole village and not for a particular ward.

This view of the High Court as mentioned is not applicable in this present case. The case before the High Court was in respect of one Village Panchayat Election held prior to the amendment of these Rules made under the Village Panchayats Act. The Government in their Notification No. VPA-1157-P of 25-9-1957 have deleted the provisions of r. 9, Para. 2 and r. 34. It is, therefore, clear that a person can stand for election from the ward in which he is a voter. The word 'such list' occurring in s. 7C(2) pertains to the ward and not to the list of the whole village. Thus it will be seen that the provisions that any voter could seek election from any ward has been discontinued."

The petitioner applied to the High Court under art. 227 of the Constitution of India for inter alia quashing the order passed by respondent No. 1.

The petition was heard along with two other petitions in which similar questions were involved.

M. A. Rane, Assistant Government Pleader, for respondent No. 1.

PATEL J. These three petitions arise out of elections to the Village Panchayat of Neral in Kolaba District. Nominations were invited for elections to the Panchayat, and the last date for such nominations was November 13, 1957. Scrutiny was fixed for November 15, 1957, and polling was on December 26, 1957. The final results of elections were declared on December 28, 1957. An application was made by one of the unsuccessful candidates in Ward No. IV for setting aside the election of the petitioner elected from that ward, but whose name appeared in the list of voters for a different ward. The Prant Officer, who had to deal with Election Petitions under the provisions of the Village Panchayats Act of 1933, held that the petitioner, being a voter in a different ward, could not be a candidate of the ward from which he was elected. He, therefore, declared the election of the petitioner null and void. It is from this decision that the present application has been brought to this Court under art. 227.

The main contention of the counsel appearing for the petitioner is that under the provisions of the Village Panchayats Act there is no limitation on the right of a voter to offer himself as a candidate for election from other ward. It is contended that even if his name appears as a voter in a particular ward, he could be a candidate for any other ward.

Examining the question without reference to authorities, the question does not seem to be a complicated one. Section 4(1) provides:

"The State Government may...declare any local area comprising a revenue village or a group of revenue villages...to be a village."

The next relevant section is s. 7-B(1), which provides that:

"The electoral roll of the Bombay Legislative Assembly prepared under the provisions of the Representation of the People Act, 1950, and for the time being in force...for such part of the constituency of the Assembly as is included in a ward or a village shall be the list of voters for such ward or village", and under sub-s. (2),

"The officers designated by the Collector in this behalf shall maintain a list of voters for each such ward or village."

This provision shows that normally a ward is a unit, and in some cases, where a group of villages is declared to be a village under s. 4, it may be that a village may be a unit; and this position seems to be made further clear by a reference to the provisions of s. 7-C of the Act. It provides:

"(1) Every person whose name is in the list of voters shall, unless disqualified under this Act or any other law for the time being in force, be qualified to vote at the election of a member for the ward to which such list pertains."

This sub-section, therefore, makes a provision that a person, whose name is in the list, must vote for that particular ward, and not for any other ward. Sub-section (2) (so far as is relevant) provides that every person whose name is in the list of voters shall, unless disqualified under this Act or under any other law for the time being in force, be qualified to be elected for any ward to which such list pertains.

There can be no doubt that under ordinary rules of grammar, the phrase 'to which such list pertains' must qualify the words 'for any ward', and if this is so, there can again not be the least doubt that when a person offers himself as a candidate, he must offer himself to be the candidate for the ward, in which his name appears in the list for that ward. Grammatically, therefore, there cannot be any doubt about the meaning of the section.

The contention, however, is that in sub-s. (2) of s. 7-C we have the words 'for any ward', and emphasis has been laid on the word 'any', and it is sought to be shown by reference to the words in s. 7-C (1), where the words are 'for the ward', that the intention was to enable a candidate to offer his candidature for a ward different from the one with regard to which, in the list, his name appears. Though the word used is 'any', it cannot however make any difference in the meaning. The immediately qualifying words are 'to which such list pertains', and if effect is to be given to the contention now advanced, we must disregard the words 'to which such list pertains'. It is not permissible to disregard the words of a statute, and the word 'any' is not such a word that we must disregard the word of the statute and give it a meaning which it does not necessarily possess. It appears to us that though the words are 'any ward', it must still be confined to the ward to which that particular list pertains.

There is nothing in the scheme of the Act also to justify this contention.

Section 4 of the Village Panchayats Act enables the State Government after inquiry to declare any local area comprising a group of revenue villages to be a village as also a revenue village a village for the purposes of the Act. If a group of villages is declared a village, then in that case it is no wonder that the unit will be each of such villages of the group, and when in s. 7-B(1) and (2) 'village' is referred to, it is in reference to such a village.

We have been referred to a decision decided by a Division Bench of this Court in the case of Ardeskir Sorabji v. U. M. Bhatt.¹ It appears that the same contention that was advanced here was made in that case. Their Lordships said at page 805:

"...On the basis that there is one list of voters for the whole of the village of Ud-wada, there is no difficulty in accepting the construction contended for by Mr. Banaji." With respect, it seems to be very doubtful to us if it is open to construe a legislative provision by reference to the understanding of the officers on whom falls the duty to carry out the provisions of the Act. It may be, that contrary to the provisions of the Act, instead of maintaining separate lists, one list is maintained; but that would not enable a Court to negative the words of the section, which in terms say that a candidate would be qualified to be elected for any ward to which such list pertains. If the list is not maintained as per the requirement of law, the whole election may become invalid. It also appears that construction was further supported by reference to r. 9 framed under s. 7 of the Act, which provided:

"When an election is held at or about the same time for two or more wards in the village, one and the same person may stand for election in all or any number of such wards."

It is again, with respect, doubtful if it is possible to cut down or modify the meaning of a section by reference to a rule prepared by another authority under the rule making powers. If the rule is not within the terms of the section, the rule itself will be ultra vires. It appears that their Lordships referred to s. 7-C, cl. (3), and said that since it refers only to the list of voters and not to the lists of voters, the construction of the section vouched for was justified. It must, however, be remembered that s. 7-C(1) starts with a list for a ward. Sub-section (2) refers to a list of a particular ward, and it appears to us that when the list of voters is referred to, it must mean 'list of voters for a ward'. It has no reference whatever to the list of voters in the whole village. It is somewhat surprising that though in s. 7-B there is a reference to the ward or village, in s. 7-C(3) there is no reference to the village at all, and if it is not there, we are not entitled again to put in a word and read the section in a different manner from its natural meaning. In any case, since one of the factors which contributed to the construction now contended for was r. 9 framed under s. 7 of the Act, and that rule has now been repealed, it appears to us that the case is clearly distinguishable from the present case.

If this is so, we must hold that the decision given by the Prant Officer is correct. The petition must fail and must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

The same points are involved in the petition No. 2384 of 1958, and it is admitted that if the interpretation contended for cannot be accepted, then this petition must also fail. In addition, this petition refers to the by-election wherein it is said that the last date for the nomination was on July 27, 1958, and that the petitioner had not sufficient opportunity of offering his candidature for the purposes of the election, as the notice, according to him, was very short. It, however, appears that no ground is made in the petition itself, and that ground cannot now be entertained. This petition, therefore, also must fail and is dismissed with costs.

The third petition is also not pressed and is dismissed. The petitioner will pay the costs of the Government.

Petitions dismissed.

RAMSING RATANSING PARDESHI v. THE MUNICIPAL CORPORATION OF THE CITY OF POONA.*

Bombay Provincial Municipal Corporations Act (Bom. LIX of 1949), Secs. 10(1)(f), 10(2)(b)(v)—Close relationship, without more, with person having contract with, or employed by, municipality whether sufficient to disqualify candidate under s. 10(1)(f)—Applicability of s. 10(2)(b)(v) to case where disqualification from being elected as member comes up for determination.

Mere close relationship with a person having a contract with, or being in the employment of, a municipal corporation is not sufficient to disqualify a candidate under the provisions of s. 10(1)(f) of the Bombay Provincial Municipal Corporations Act, 1949.

M. M. Nandgaonkar v. Collector, Thana; Champaklal Chhotatal Parikh v. Mahendra Govindlal Chokshi; Dattatraya v. S. V. Bhave and England v. Inglis, referred to.

Section 10(2)(b)(v) of the Bombay Provincial Municipal Corporations Act, 1949, is applicable only to those cases where the question comes up for determining the qualification of a sitting member. Therefore, when s. 10(1)(f) of the Act has to be considered for the purpose of a disqualification from being elected as a member, s. 10(2)(b)(v) is not applicable to the case.

THE present applications arose out of elections to the Municipal Corporation, Poona, held in November 1957. Application No. 1816 of 1958 related to Ward No. 11 in which respondents Nos. 3 to 6 were declared elected. One Ramsing (petitioner), a voter in the said Ward, made an application under the Bombay Provincial Municipal Corporations Act, 1949, before the Judge of the Small Causes Court, Poona, challenging the election of respondent No. 3 on the ground that he was disqualified from being elected to the Corporation as his brother Chunilal Himatlal Agarwal was an employee of the Corporation. It was alleged that the two brothers, respondent No. 3 and Chunilal Himatlal Agarwal, were staying together in the same house and messing together; and, therefore, he had directly an interest in the employment of his brother. The Small Cause Court Judge held that Chunilal Himatlal was an employee of the Corporation, but held that he was separate from respondent No. 3 in interest and, therefore, he could not be said to be interested in the employment of his brother. He, therefore, dismissed the application.

The petitioner applied to the High Court under art. 227 of the Constitution of India for setting aside the order passed by the Small Cause Court Judge. This application was heard along with the two other applications.

PATEL J. [His Lordship after stating the facts, proceeded.] It has been argued by Mr. Gokhale appearing for the petitioners in all these cases that s. 10(f) of the Bombay Provincial Municipal Corporations Act, 1949, is widely worded and that, when it says

"...a person shall be disqualified for being elected and for being a councillor if such person—

...has directly or indirectly, by himself or his partner any share or interest in any contract or employment with, by or on behalf of the Corporation;"

*Decided, February 2, 1959. Special Civil Application No. 1816 of 1958 (with Special Civil Applications Nos. 1817 and 1818 of 1958).

it means that his close relationship with an employee amounts to interest—may be indirect—in the employment of the Corporation and that construction is strengthened when one has regard to the words “directly or indirectly”; he says further that this provision is made for the purpose of maintaining purity of Municipal administration and that could only be done if a person is disqualified on the ground of very close and near relationship. Now this question has come before this Court in the past. In the case of *M. M. Nandgaonkar v. Collector, Thana*¹ a question arose in reference to s. 12(2)(b) of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act which is somewhat similar to the present section. It was there held that the interest contemplated by s. 12(2)(b) of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, need not necessarily be a pecuniary interest; but the interest must be a material interest. It is not sufficient if the interest is purely sentimental or an interest arising out of a person having friendship with some one or being interested in his welfare. The position with reference to the near relationship was made further clear by Chagla C.J. and Mr. Justice Dixit in Champaklal Chhotatal Parikh v. Mahendra Govindlal Chokshi.² In dealing with s. 15(1)(f) of the District Municipal Act, 1901, which also is worded in similar language, it was observed that the interest contemplated by this sub-section need not necessarily be a pecuniary interest; on the other hand it must not be a sentimental interest, but it must be a substantial or material interest and the question was whether in the employment of his father as a lawyer of the municipality respondent No. 1 could be said to have an interest. Since the father and the son were living together, on an application of the test as accepted in the case of M. M. Nandgaonkar v. Collector, Thana, it was held that the son would have a material interest in the employment of his father. To the same effect are the observations in the case of *Dattatraya v. S. V. Bhavs*³, which was a case of husband and wife living together and the wife was an employee of the Municipal Corporation as a teacher under the School Board. It was found as a fact that the husband and wife were living together and thereafter applying the test it was held that the husband had material interest in the employment of the wife.

Mr. Gokhale, however, relies on certain observations at page 215 of this case wherein it is said:

“...But what is important is purity in municipal administration. If a person wants to be a municipal councillor, there is nothing to prevent him from seeking election to the Corporation, when he cannot possibly be accused of having any interest in the employment of a near relation of his. But one must realise that cases of conflict between interest and duty have got to be avoided. Otherwise, purity in municipal administration would be impossible to achieve. In our view, s. 10(1)(f) is a salutary provision and there is a possible scope and opportunity for a municipal councillor to show favour, especially when the relationship is that of husband and wife, and we are clear that on the facts of this case s. 10(1)(f) is attracted.”

He argued that this is sufficient to found his proposition that close relationship without more is sufficient in itself to disqualify a member or a candidate. It is not possible to accept this contention. It was made clear in the beginning of that paragraph that the Court was following the principle laid down in Nandgaonkar's case and in Champaklal Chhotatal Parikh v. Mahendra Govindlal Chokshi and on the facts of that case it was held that s. 10(1)(f) was attracted. The observations in a case must be taken in the context in which they appear. They have been limited to the facts of that case after accepting the principle laid down in the cases referred to. I may also refer to the case of England v. Inglis.⁴ It was observed by Salter J. (p. 639):—

“...An ‘interest’ within the meaning of the section must, I agree, be something more than a sentimental interest, such as arises from the natural love and affection of a man for his son; it must be a pecuniary or, at least, a material interest; but I do not see on what principle it must necessarily be a pecuniary advantage."

The other Judge accepted the same definition as being warranted by authorities and on the facts of the case it was held that the member came within the disqualification. It is clear, therefore, that mere close relationship with a person having a contract with, or being in the employment of, a municipal corporation is not sufficient to disqualify a candidate under the provisions of s. 10(1)(f) of the Municipal Corporations Act.

A further contention is made by the learned counsel for the petitioner on another aspect of the section. He says that s. 10(1)(f) must be read in the light of sub-s. (2) which qualifies sub-s. (1)(f) and he refers us to cl. (v) of sub-s. (2). He says that it is permissible to take into account contracts before the date of the candidature during the official year in which the election was held in order to consider the qualification or disqualification of a candidate for the purpose of election, since if sub-s. (2) applies the word "has" is capable of that construction. His argument is that though the words are "has any share or interest in any contract or employment", if one refers to cl. (v) of sub-s. (2) which speaks of "occasional sale of any article, in which he regularly trades not amounting to a value exceeding in any one official year Rs. 2000" would show that the words "has any interest in any contract or employment" must mean any interest in any contract or employment at least during the official year when he offers himself as a candidate. At first sight the argument does appear to be attractive. It is not possible, however, to accept it, as there are obvious difficulties in so construing the section. Section 10, sub-s. (1) which provides for disqualification, is intended to apply to two kinds of cases; (i) for being elected as a member and (ii) after election for being a councillor. In the first case the only period that can come in question is the period between the date of nomination and the date of the declaration of the results, while in the other case it would be immediately on his taking charge or declared a member, to the date when fresh elections take place and that would be a long period of at least 4 years. A person has an interest, if during the period to which the provision applies, he is interested in a contract. In the first case mentioned that would be the period between the nomination and the declaration of the results, while in the other case it will be the full period from the date of his being elected as a councillor to the date when he vacates his office in the ordinary course. From its very nature the provisions of cl. (v) of sub-s. (2) of s. 10 cannot apply to the first kind of cases and were never apparently intended to apply. There cannot be any official year nor any one official year in reference to such a case. It would further appear that, so far, no provision of this kind has been heard to have been applied in the manner suggested, and it would result in somewhat unusual construction of the section to hold that the period should be the official year. If once that interpretation is accepted there is no reason why that particular official year and not a period of five years should be taken. We think that cl. (v) of sub-s. (2) could only apply to the second kind of cases and was never intended to apply to the first kind of cases and it appears that when s. 10(1)(f) has to be considered for the purpose of a disqualification from being elected as a member it must stand by itself, sub-s. (2)(v) not being applicable.

The learned counsel appearing for the respondents has argued that s. 10(1)(f) is made subject to sub-s. (2) and, therefore, in every case the provisions of sub-s. (2) must be held to apply as an exception to the disqualification stated in cl. (f) of s. 10(1), as he stands to have the advantage of the value of the contracts being less than Rs. 2,000. I have already indicated that this sub-clause cannot from its very nature apply and can have no application. It is contrary to fundamental principles of election law to carry a so-called disqualification to previous years and then hold a candidate disqualified if his case does not come within the exception. However small the value of the contract may be, the candidate would be disqualified if he has an interest in the same at the material time. As said before this provision is applicable only to those cases where the question comes up for determining qualification of a sitting member.

Therefore, if at the date when a person is offering himself for election and thereafter until election if he has got any interest directly or indirectly by himself or his partner in any contract or employment, whatever the value he must be disqualified, and there is no question of considering the value of the contracts since there are no years and no official year during that period. We must examine, therefore, all these cases from this point of view.

[The rest of the judgment is not material to this report.]

B.E.S.T. WORKERS' UNION v. STATE OF BOMBAY.*

Bombay Industrial Relations Act (Bom. XI of 1947), Secs. 13, 14, 16(3), 31—Two or more unions applying for registration as Representative Union in respect of same industry in a local area—Whether Registrar entitled to register one of these unions without deciding which of applying unions has larger membership of employees—Point of time referred to in s. 13(1) whether relevant for determining comparative strength between rival unions applying for registration.

Where more than one application for registration as a Representative Union is pending before the Registrar, he must refrain from registering any union until and unless he has discharged his duties under the third proviso to s. 14 of the Bombay Industrial Relations Act, 1946, i.e. unless he has decided which of the applying unions has the larger membership of employees employed in the industry concerned.

The point of time referred to in s. 13(1) of the Bombay Industrial Relations Act, 1946, is not relevant for determining the comparative strength between rival unions where applications are made for registration by the rival unions. In such cases the relevant time would be the time when an occasion arises for exercising the powers and performing the duties contained and laid down in the third proviso to s. 14 of the Act. Therefore, the point of time with reference to which the membership of rival unions applying for registration is to be considered is not the date of the application or the month of the application made by them but is the occasion when the claims of the other unions fall to be considered.

The facts appear in the judgment.

MUDHOLKAR J. This is an appeal under the Letters Patent against the judgment of Mr. Justice Shelat dismissing summarily the appellant's petition under art. 226 of the Constitution.

The facts which have led up to this appeal are briefly as follows. The petitioner is a registered union of workers of the B.E.S.T. Undertaking, and was registered as a representative union by the Registrar of Unions under s. 13(1) of the Bombay Industrial Relations Act, 1946. This union was for the local area of the city of Bombay. That area was altered by a notification of the Government dated April 16, 1958. Now, by reason of the alteration of the local area, it became necessary for the appellant union to make a fresh application for registration as a representative union, under s. 13(1) of the Act. It made such an application on October 30, 1958.

*Decided, February 5, 1959. O.O.J. Letters Application No. 24 of 1959.

Prior to this application, respondent No. 3, which is also a trade union of employees employed in the same industry as the members of the appellant union, had also made an application to the Registrar under s. 13(1) of the Act for being registered as a representative union of the workers engaged in that industry. This application was made on August 30, 1958. The Registrar commenced to inquire into this application. After the appellant union filed its application, its representatives approached the Registrar for inquiring into both the applications, that is, the appellant's application and that of respondent No. 3, side by side with one another. Some discussions took place between the representatives of the appellant union and the Registrar, and some correspondence also passed between them. Eventually, the appellant realised that the Registrar was disinclined to deal with its application till the application of respondent No. 3 was disposed of, and it, therefore, made a petition to this Court under art. 226 of the Constitution for issue of an appropriate writ to the Registrar directing him to hear both the applications together, and also forbidding him from registering respondent No. 3 under s. 14 of the Act before dealing with the appellant's application.

Along with the writ petition, the appellant also made an application for issue of an interim injunction restraining the Registrar from proceeding further with the inquiry into the application made by respondent No. 3. Mr. Justice Shelat, before whom the matter came, did not issue a rule in the writ petition, but merely granted an ad-interim injunction to the appellant and issued a rule returnable within two days to the Registrar to show cause why the injunction should not be granted. At the hearing of this matter, not only the Registrar, who is respondent No. 2 before us, but also respondent No. 3 appeared and opposed the grant of an interim injunction. After hearing them, Mr. Justice Shelat not only dissolved the ad-interim injunction granted by him, but dismissed the petition of the appellant under art. 226 of the Constitution.

It was contended before us that the ground on which Mr. Justice Shelat dismissed the appellant's petition was that the appellant was guilty of laches, and there was undue delay in making the petition under art. 226. It was also urged that where there is a delay in making a petition, the Court has discretion in the matter of condoning the delay, and where the Court has exercised the discretion in a particular way, it would not be open to the appellate Court to interfere with the exercise of its discretion.

What we have got to ascertain at the outset is, whether there was at all any delay on the part of the appellant in making its petition to this Court. It was pointed out to us that the Registrar informed the appellant's representatives as early as on November 29, 1958, that he proposed to proceed with the hearing and disposal of the application of respondent No. 3, and that he would take into consideration the appellant's application only after he had disposed of the application made by respondent No. 3. On the basis of this fact, it is contended that the appellant should have presented its petition under art. 226 within a reasonable time from that date. But instead of doing so, it waited till January 19, 1959, for presenting the petition. It is also pointed out to us that in the meanwhile the Registrar had made considerable progress in the inquiry into the application made by respondent No. 3, and that if it is ordered that both the applications, that is, that of respondent No. 3 and of the appellant, should be heard together, a good deal of work which has been done by the Registrar would be thrown away. To this the answer of the appellant is that it does not want to question anything that the Registrar has done so far in the matter of the application of respondent No. 3. What it wants is that an inquiry of the kind, which the Registrar is making with respect to the qualification of respondent No. 3 for being registered as a representative union, should also be made with respect to it, and that this inquiry should not be postponed till final orders are passed upon the application of respondent No. 3. In this connection, Mr. Gokhale, who appears for the appellant, has referred us to the scheme of the Act, and in particular to ss. 13 and 14 thereof. Section 13(1) reads thus:

"Any union which has for the whole of the period of three calendar months immediately preceding the calendar month in which it so applies under this section a membership of not less than fifteen per cent. of the total number of employees employed in any industry in any local area may apply in the prescribed form to the Registrar for registration as a Representative Union for such industry in such local area."

Then follow sub-ss. (2) and (3), with which we are not concerned. The provisions of s. 14 run as follows:—

"On receipt of an application from a union for registration under section 13 and on payment of the fee prescribed, the Registrar shall, if after holding such inquiry as he deems fit he comes to the conclusion that the conditions requisite for registration specified in the said section are satisfied and that the union is not otherwise disqualified for registration, enter the name of the union in the appropriate register maintained under section 12 and issue a certificate of registration in such form as may be prescribed:

Provided—

Firstly, that in any local area there shall not at any time be more than one registered union in respect of the same industry...

Thirdly, that where two or more unions fulfilling the conditions necessary for registration apply for registration in respect of the same industry in any local area, subject to the provisions of the second proviso, the union having the largest membership of employees employed in the industry shall be registered:

Fourthly, that the Registrar shall not register any union if he is satisfied that the application for its registration is not made bona fide in the interest of the employees but is made in the interest of the employers to the prejudice of the interest of the employees:

Fifthly, that the Registrar shall not register any union if at any time, within six months immediately preceding the date of the application for registration or thereafter the union has instigated, aided or assisted the commencement or continuation of a strike or stoppage which has been held or declared to be illegal..."

Now, Mr. Gokhale pointed out that what the Registrar has to do in the first instance is to make a preliminary inquiry for satisfying himself whether the union, which has made an application before him for being registered, has membership of not less than fifteen per cent. of the total number of employees employed in the particular industry during the period specified in sub-s. (1) of s. 13. It is only after he has made such inquiry and is satisfied that the applying union fulfils the conditions specified in this section that the Registrar need consider further the question of registering the union. Mr. Gokhale concedes that the appellant will have no locus standi thereafter in so far as such a preliminary inquiry is concerned. Similarly, according to him, respondent No. 3 will not be concerned with an inquiry into the qualifications of the appellant union for being registered as a representative union. Then Mr. Gokhale referred us to the provisions of the third proviso to s. 14, and said that where there are two applications before the Registrar from unions for being registered as representative unions, the question which the Registrar has to decide is, which of the two unions is entitled to get registered. Now, under the third proviso, it is the union having the largest membership of employees employed in the particular industry which is entitled to be registered. Therefore, according to him, when the stage of deciding this question is reached that all the unions which have applied for being registered would have an interest in the matter, which the Registrar has to decide, and that, therefore, from that stage onwards the applications of all the applying unions must be heard together. Since that stage has not arrived yet, Mr. Gokhale contends that the lapse of time between November 29, 1958, when the Registrar informed a representative of the appellant union about what he proposed to do, and January 19, 1959, on which day the appellants preferred their petition, cannot be construed as an undue delay in the matter of making the application. He emphasises the point that the appellant union had no interest in the inquiry which has gone on so far before the Registrar with respect to the matter referred to in s. 13(1) of the Act, and that merely because the appellant union stood by and allowed that inquiry to go on without challenging its validity or propriety in this Court cannot be deemed to be laches on the part of the appellant union. In our opinion, Mr. Gokhale's contention is correct, and must be upheld. There is no doubt that the appellant union was not directly interested in the inquiry under s. 13(1), which was made by the Registrar in respect of the application of respondent No. 3. What the appellant union is interested in doing is to prevent respondent No. 3 union from being registered as a representative union, and so long as the appellant approached this Court before the Registrar could or did register it, there was no question of delay whatsoever on the part of the appellant. Now, here, as already stated, the Registrar is merely conducting the inquiry into the application of respondent No. 3. We are informed by the counsel appearing for the Registrar and for the union in this case that the inquiry is almost complete. That may be so, but the fact remains that the Registrar has not registered the union yet. Indeed, he was restrained from doing so by an order of Shelat J. in the first instance, and then by an order of a Division Bench of this Court after the appeal was preferred. In our opinion, therefore, there was no question whatsoever of delay in making the petition, out of which this appeal arises, and consequently, the question for exercise of discretion in condoning delay never arose. The learned single Judge has not stated any reasons for dismissing the writ petition; but if we assume that the main reason for dismissing it was as stated on behalf of the respondent, we must, with respect, hold that that view was not correct.

The next point which we have to consider is whether the Registrar would be entitled to follow the procedure indicated by him, or whether he must follow some other procedure. Now, it is plain from the affidavit of the Registrar and from the arguments which were advanced on his behalf by Mr. Joshi that what the Registrar proposes to do is to decide not only the preliminary point which is required to be decided, but also other points. If he holds in favour of respondent No. 3 on the preliminary point, and then proceeds to register the union, Mr. Gokhale contends that this would be illegal, because at the moment there are in point of fact two applications for registration pending before the Registrar, and that, therefore, as required by the third proviso to s. 14, he must consider which of the two applications he must grant; that is to say, which of the two rival unions is entitled to be registered as representative union. It seems to us that the language used by the Legislature in the third proviso to s. 14 is quite clear, and it does require the Registrar to decide which of the two applying unions has the larger membership of employees employed in the industry concerned. It will not be possible for him to perform this duty if, even though two applications are pending before him, he chooses to decide only one, and after holding that the union which has made the application fulfils the requirements of s. 13(1), registers that union. If he does that, then the application of any other union pending before him at that time would not survive by virtue of the provisions of the first proviso to s. 14. It would clearly follow from this that where more than one application for registration is pending before the Registrar, he must hold his hands and refrain from registering any union, until and unless he has discharged his duties under the third proviso to s. 14.

It was contended before us by Mr. Joshi that the Registrar need only consider those applications for registration which were made to him in the same calendar month, and that where one application was made in one month and the other in a subsequent calendar month, the Registrar was not bound to consider the latter, till he disposed of the former. He bases his argument on the opening words of sub-s. (1) of s. 13, and those words are:

He says that the 'three calendar months' must be the same with respect to each of the applying unions, and this can happen only where the applications are made by those unions in the same calendar month. He further points out that where the Registrar has to decide as to which of the applying unions has the largest number of employees in its register, he must make the comparison with reference to the same point of time or period. Such a comparison will be possible only where the figures before him relate to the same period of three calendar months with respect to the different applying unions. Where one union has applied in one month, and another in a subsequent month, the period of three calendar months with respect to these two unions would not coincide, but would be different, and therefore, according to Mr. Joshi, it will not be possible for him to make the kind of comparison which is referred to in the third proviso to s. 14. Since such a comparison becomes impossible with respect to applications made in different calendar months, Mr. Joshi argued that the provisions of the third proviso to s. 14 would apply only when the applications pending before the Registrar for registration were made in the same calendar month.

In our opinion, there is no substance in this argument. The inquiry which is contemplated by sub-s. (1) of s. 13 is in the nature of a preliminary inquiry, and the object of making that inquiry is to find out whether the union, which has made the application to it for being registered as a representative union, has on its register a certain minimum number of employees working in the particular industry. No doubt, if a union, which has made the application to the Registrar, satisfies the requirements of sub-s. (1) of s. 13, it will, in the absence of any disqualification and in the absence of any application for being registered by another union, be entitled to be registered as a representative union straightaway. But it does not mean that the point of time referred to in sub-s. (1) of s. 13 is the one recognised by the Act as relevant for determining the comparative strength between rival unions, where applications are made for registration by rival unions. In such cases, the relevant time would be the time when an occasion arises for exercising the powers and performing the duties contained and laid down in the third proviso to s. 14. The point of time with reference to which the membership of rival unions applying for registration is to be considered cannot be the date of the application, or the month of the application made by them, but it must necessarily be the occasion when the claims of the other unions fall to be considered.

Mr. Joshi has referred us to sub-s. (3) of s. 16 and stated that the provisions of this sub-section would show that the point of time with reference to which the strength of rival unions should be ascertained for the purpose of registration is the date of the application for registration. Section 16 deals with registration of another union in place of existing registered union. Sub-section (3) thereof reads as follows:—

"If, on the expiry of the period of notice under sub-section (1), after holding such inquiry as he deems fit, the Registrar comes to the conclusion that the applicant union complies with the conditions necessary for registration specified in section 13, and that its membership was during the whole of the period of three calendar months immediately preceding the calendar month in which it made the application under this section larger than the membership of the registered union, he shall subject to the provisions of section 14 register the applicant union in place of the registered union."

In our opinion, this provision, instead of assisting Mr. Joshi, assists the appellant union. It is evident from this provision that where the Legislature thought it fit to require the membership to be determined as it stood on the date of the application for registration, it has done so in clear terms. It was indeed necessary to enact such a provision in sub-s. (3), because under this provision a union making an application for being registered in place of an existing union makes certain claims based on its strength. For considering such a claim, it is but appropriate that its strength as it obtained on the date on which it lodged that claim should be considered in preference to its strength on any other occasion.

On behalf of respondent No. 3, Mr. Buch relied upon the provisions of s. 31. That section reads thus:

"Notwithstanding anything contained in this Act, if there is any alteration in any local area or areas notified for the purposes of this Act,—

(a) a registered or representative union entitled under this Act to appear or act as a representative of employees in an industry immediately before the alteration in the local area or areas concerned, or

(b) where more than one registered or representative union are entitled to appear or act as representative of employees in an industry under this section, the union having the largest membership of employees employed in the industry, whether by agreement of the other registered or representative unions or as determined by the Registrar after such inquiry as he thinks fit, shall be entitled to appear or act for the altered local area or areas, as the case may be, for a period of twelve months from the date on which such alteration is effected, or if an application under section 13 is made within such period by such union or any other union in the altered local area or areas, until the disposal of such application by the Registrar."

Now, Mr. Buch particularly relied upon the concluding words of the section 'until the disposal of such application by the Registrar', and said that this provision clearly contemplates determination of one application only under s. 31 at a time by the Registrar. For one thing, reading the section as a whole, the word 'application' must be deemed to include several applications, where more than one application is made, because the ordinary rule of construction is that unless there is something repugnant to the context, a singular would include the plural. Then, it is difficult to understand what relation this provision has to a matter which arises only under s. 13. Section 13, as we have seen, relates to applications for registration of unions. Section 31 deals with the question of the right of representation of a union, which was registered as a representative union for one local area in respect of the same industry in an altered local area. The Legislature has in this section, apart from preserving the right of a union to function as a representative union, also provided for two points of time upto either of which such a right could be exercised. The first point of time is twelve months from the day of the alteration of the local area. The other point of time is the date of disposal of an application made under s. 13 by the same or any other union for registration. This section does not even purport to deal with the procedure to be followed in dealing with an application made under s. 13, and indeed there was no question of dealing therein with the procedure in respect of such applications, because it is already dealt with in s. 13. We cannot, therefore, accept the argument of Mr. Buch.

Finally, it was said that upon the view which we take as to the point of time with reference to which the relative strength is to be determined, a practical difficulty will be created, and the Registrar would not be able to dispose of the applications for registration expeditiously. It may be that a certain amount of delay would be caused, because the Registrar may have to examine the claims of several unions. But that is not a ground or reason for refusing to construe the provisions of the Act according to the language used by the Legislature. It is not as if it will be impossible for the Registrar to perform his duties. Where a construction placed on a provision were to result in such an impossibility, then, of course, that construction would not be proper, and the Court would be precluded from putting such construction. Merely because the construction would create difficulties, that construction, if it is otherwise justifiable, cannot be rejected.

We accordingly hold that the Registrar is bound to consider the application of the appellant before he makes any final orders disposing of the application made by respondent No. 3, that is to say, before he decides to register respondent No. 3 union.

Before concluding, we would like to advert to one more objection raised by the Registrar in his affidavit. It is this, that the appellant has other remedies open, and, therefore, it is not competent to it to make an application to this Court under art. 226 of the Constitution. These other remedies are: (a) appeal to the Industrial Court under s. 20, and (b) an application to the Registrar under s. 16. Now, no question of an appeal to the Industrial Court arises, because only a party to the proceeding before the Registrar can prefer such an appeal. The appellant is not a party to the proceeding before the Registrar initiated by respondent No. 3. In so far as the remedy provided by s. 16 is concerned, that remedy can only be availed of against a registered union. The appellant is not a registered union, and, therefore, this remedy was not in existence on the date on which the appellant preferred its petition to this Court under art. 226 of the Constitution.

We are, therefore, of the opinion that the appeal be allowed, and accordingly we allow it with costs. The appellant will also get Rs. 75 by way of costs of the petition before the learned single Judge. A writ shall issue to the Registrar, respondent No. 2, directing him to hear the application for registration made by the appellant and prohibiting him from registering respondent No. 3 union without following the provisions of the third proviso to s. 14. Liberty to the appellant's attorneys to withdraw the amount of security furnished.

Appeal allowed.

CRIMINAL APPELLATE.

Before Mr. Justice Shah and Mr. Justice Mody.

VYARA MUNICIPALITY v. FULCHAND GANPATLAL SHAH.*

Bombay District Municipal Act (Bom. III of 1901), Secs. 96A, 96(2)—Municipality refusing permission to alter, add to or reconstruct building—No resolution passed by municipality proposing to acquire land on which applicant desiring to alter, add to or reconstruct building—Applicant constructing building in contravention of refusal of permission by municipality—Whether applicant could be penalised under s. 96(5)—Condition requiring house-owner not to build on area proposed to be built upon whether a condition prescribed by s. 96(2).

Section 96A of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, is not restricted in its application to cases where permission to erect a building is refused absolutely. The section also contemplates cases where there is refusal to sanction permission for construction on a part of the land on which the building is proposed to be constructed. Therefore, if the municipality refuses permission to alter, add to or reconstruct a building, the refusal must be accompanied by a resolution to acquire the land on which the building stands. Where, therefore, the municipality does not pass such a resolution and refuses permission which is applied for under s. 96(1) of the Act, the refusal is invalid and construction of a building in contravention of that refusal is not penalised by s. 96(5) of the Act.

A condition requiring a house-owner not to build on the area proposed to be built upon is not one of the conditions prescribed by s. 96(2) of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901.

*Decided, February 12, 1959. Criminal Appeal No. 1387 of 1958, against the order of acquittal passed by R.G. Idnani, Judicial Magistrate, First Class, Vyara, in Summary Case No. 861 of 1957. I (1959) 39.Bom.L.R. 142.

SHAH J. This is an appeal by the Municipality of Vyara under s. 417(3) of the Code of Criminal Procedure against an order of acquittal passed by the Judicial Magistrate, First Class, Vyara, District Surat. On a complaint filed by the Vyara Municipality, the respondent Fulchand was tried before the Judicial Magistrate, First Class, Vyara, for an offence under s. 96(5) of the Bombay District Municipal Act. The learned Magistrate acquitted the accused and against the order of acquittal the Vyara Municipality has obtained special leave to appeal to this Court.

The facts which gave rise to the complaint are briefly these. The respondent is the owner of a building No. 1657 in the town of Vyara. He desired to repair the building and to construct a kitchen, a bath room and a lavatory at the rear thereof and accordingly he submitted an application to the Municipality of Vyara for permission to carry out the repairs and to put up the proposed construction. With the application the respondent submitted the plans required by the rules framed by the municipality. The municipality granted sanction to the respondent to carry out the repairs and to make the construction subject to three conditions: (i) that the respondent shall not put up any construction in the area shown in red colour in the plan, exh. 7, submitted by the respondent; (ii) that all the construction shall be made in the area to the west of the blue line shown in the plan; (iii) that the construction shall be carried out in accordance with the plan sanctioned by the municipality. The respondent ignored the first and the second conditions imposed by the municipality and put up a structure on the area "shown in red colour" in the plan. This breach having come to the notice of an Inspector of the municipality, a complaint was filed against the respondent for an offence under s. 96(5) of the Bombay District Municipal Act III of 1901 in the Court of the Judicial Magistrate, First Class, Vyara. The respondent contended inter alia that a sanction to prosecute as required by s. 161 of the Bombay District Municipal Act was not granted by a competent authority, that the complaint was barred because it was not filed within six months from the date on which the offence was alleged to be committed, and that the conditions imposed by the municipality refusing permission to build upon the area "shown in red colour" in the plan, exh. 7, were illegal and not binding upon him and accordingly in putting up a construction upon that area he did not contravene the provisions of the Bombay District Municipal Act. The learned trial Magistrate upheld the contentions raised by the respondent as to the validity of the sanction and the right of the municipality to impose the impugned conditions and acquitted the respondent.

The Vyara Municipality is governed by the Bombay District Municipal Act III of 1901. Section 96 of the Bombay District Municipal Act provides by the first sub-section in so far as it is material:

"Before beginning to erect any building...or add to any existing building...the person intending so to build...shall give to the Municipality notice thereof in writing, and shall furnish to them at the same time if required by a bye-law or by special order to do so,

(a) the sanad, if any, in force relating to the site of such proposed building... and

(b) a plan showing the levels, at which the foundation and lowest floor of such building are proposed to be laid, by reference to some level known to the Municipality, and all information they may require regarding the limits, design, ventilation and materials of the proposed building..."

By sub-s. (2) of s. 96 it is provided:

"Save as otherwise provided in this Act or the rules and bye-laws thereunder, the Municipality may either give permission to erect, alter, add to or reconstruct the building according to the plan and information furnished or may impose in writing such conditions as to level, drainage, sanitation, materials or to the dimensions, and cubical contents of rooms, doors, windows and apertures for ventilation or to the number of storeys to be erected, or with reference to the location of the building in relation to any street existing or projected or the purpose for which the building is to be used, as they think proper, or may direct that the work shall not be proceeded with unless and until all questions connected with the respective location of the building and any such street have been decided to their satisfaction."

Sub-section (5) of s. 96 penalises any person who begins any construction, alteration, addition or reconstruction without giving the notice required by sub-s. (1) or without furnishing the documents or affording the information prescribed in that sub-section.

Admittedly in this case the respondent had submitted an application to the municipality for permission for making repairs and for making additions to his building. That application was accompanied by the requisite plans as required by the bye-laws. On this application by the respondent, the municipality gave him permission to build, but subject to the condition that the respondent was not to build within the area "shown in red colour" in the plan. The respondent challenges the authority of the municipality to refuse permission to build on any part of the area of the land belonging to him. Under sub-s. (2) of s. 96, subject to the provisions of the Act and the rules and bye-laws thereunder, the municipality has the power to give permission to erect, alter, add to or reconstruct the building according to the plan and information furnished or to impose certain conditions or to direct that the work shall not be proceeded with unless and until all questions connected with the respective location of the building have been decided to its satisfaction; and the conditions which can be imposed may be "as to level, drainage, sanitation, materials or to the dimensions and cubical contents of rooms, doors, windows, and aperture for ventilation or to the number of storeys to be erected, or with reference to the location of the building in relation to any street existing or projected or the purpose for which the building is to be used." Evidently a condition requiring a house-owner not to build on the area proposed to be built upon is not one of the conditions prescribed by s. 96(2). Provided the proposed construction does not contravene the rules and the bye-laws of the municipality and the provisions of the Act, it appears implicit in s. 96(2) of the Act that the municipality shall on an application which supplies the requisite information give permission to construct subject to condition in respect of matters specified therein or ask for further information with regard to the location of the building if such information has not been furnished; and a power to refuse permission to build either on the whole or on a part of land belonging to the applicant is not conferred upon the municipality by s. 96(2). That was so decided by this Court in Manaklal Hirabhai v. Land Acquisition Officer, West Khandesh.¹

The municipality is, however, invested with authority to refuse permission applied for under s. 96(1). It is provided by s. 96A(1) of the Bombay District Municipal Act:

"When a person has given notice to the municipality under sub-section (1) of section 96 in regard to his intention to build, alter, add to or reconstruct a building, it shall be lawful to the municipality to refuse the permission applied for if the municipality passes a resolution proposing to acquire the land on which any building is proposed to be erected or any building situated on which is proposed to be altered, added to or reconstructed."

Section 96A(1) contemplates those cases where consistently with the rules and the bye-laws framed by the municipality an application is submitted for permission to construct or add to or alter a building by a house-owner and the municipality intends to refuse the permission applied for. But the refusal by the municipality will, by the express words used in s. 96A(1) of the Act, be valid only if the municipality passes a resolution proposing to acquire the land on which the applicant desires to erect a building or to alter, add to or reconstruct any building situated on the land. If the municipality does not pass a resolution proposing to acquire the land and refuses permission which is applied for under s. 96(1), the refusal is invalid. In the present case, there is no evidence on the record to show that the Municipality of Vyara had passed any such resolution proposing to acquire the land on which the building of the respondent stood. The refusal by the municipality is, therefore, invalid, and construction of a building in contravention of that refusal is not effectively penalised by sub-s. (5) of s. 96 of the Act.

Mr. Pandya, who appears on behalf of the municipality, contends that s. 96A of the Bombay District Municipal Act contemplates an absolute refusal by the municipality to permit erection of a building and does not contemplate cases where there is refusal to sanction permission for construction on a part of the land on which the building is proposed to be constructed. We are unable to accept that contention. If the municipality refuses permission to alter, add to or reconstruct a building, by the express words used in the statute, the refusal must be accompanied by a resolution to acquire the land on which the building stands. It is, therefore, evident that s. 96A of the Act is not restricted in its application to cases where permission to erect a building is refused absolutely. In our judgment, refusal to permit construction on a part of the land proposed to be built upon will be effective only if the municipality resolves to acquire the land which is required or ordered to be kept unbuilt upon.

Mr. Pandya says that he is instructed to state that in fact a resolution to acquire the land under s. 96A of the Bombay District Municipal Act was passed by the Municipality. But no such resolution has been produced in the Court below and we are unable to proceed upon the assumption that such a resolution must have been passed.

On the evidence, we have no doubt that the restricted sanction given by the municipality on the application submitted by the respondent did not prevent the respondent from making a construction upon that area of his land which is "shown in red colour" in the plan, exh. 7. On the view taken by us, it is unnecessary for us to consider the other contentions which were raised in the Court below and which appealed to the learned trial Magistrate.

We, therefore, confirm the order of acquittal passed by the learned Magistrate in favour of the respondent and dismiss this appeal.

Order of acquittal confirmed.

MANILAL (MANIBHAI) GOPALJI DESAI v. THE UNION OF INDIA.*

Indian Bar Councils Act (XXXVIII of 1926), Sec. 4(3)—Constitution of India, Art. 14—Whether s. 4(3) and resolution passed by Bombay High Court in pursuance of that section violate art. 14—Constitution whether guarantees right of franchise and right to be elected to political institution—Power of High Court to strike down law enacted by Parliament on ground that it violates fundamental right.

Section 4(3) of the Indian Bar Councils Act, 1926, and the resolution passed by the Bombay High Court on April 10, 1952, in pursuance of the provisions of that section cannot be challenged on the ground that art. 14 of the Constitution of India is violated by them.

Where the right conferred on a person is not guaranteed by the Constitution and does not flow from it and is neither a fundamental right, nor a common law right, nor a natural, inherent or unalienable right, but a franchise dependent upon the law and is thus merely a creature of a statute, it can be asserted only to the extent and subject to the conditions specified in the statute creating it. Therefore, where the Legislature brings into existence a political institution and makes any provisions concerning its constitution or composition, the provisions of the law which bring that institution into existence cannot be challenged under art. 14 of the Constitution, on the ground that the various interests concerned are unequally represented thereon.

The power of the High Court to strike down the provisions of a law enacted by the Parliament, if it finds that the impugned provision as enacted violates a fundamental right claimed by a petitioner, is not in any way limited by the fact that the impugned law was enacted by Parliament and not by the State Legislature.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

The petitioner in person.

H. M. Seervai, Advocate General, with B. J. Joshi, for the respondents.

MUDHOLKAR J. The petitioner is an advocate of this High Court. Respondent No. 1 is the Union of India, and respondent No. 2 is the Bar Council of this High Court. Upon the petition made by the petitioner under art. 226 of the Constitution, Mr. Justice K. K. Desai issued a rule on November 4, 1958, against the respondents to show cause why the provisions of sub-s. (3) of s. 4 of the Indian Bar Councils Act, (Act XXXVIII of 1926), and also all the resolutions and rules made thereunder or in conformity therewith should not be declared illegal and ultra vires of the Constitution, and further why an appropriate writ or order or direction should not issue against the respondents or any of them restraining them from holding any elections on the basis of the reservation of seats as contemplated by sub-s. (3) of s. 4.

It is common knowledge that as a step towards establishing an autonomous bar, the Indian Bar Councils Act was enacted in the year 1926, and Bar Councils were established for certain High Courts including this High Court. The composition of the Bar Councils is dealt with by s. 4 of the Act, which runs thus:

"4. (1) Every Bar Council shall consist of fifteen members, of whom—

- (a) one shall be the Advocate-General;
- (b) four shall be persons nominated by the High Court, of whom not more than two may be Judges of that Court; and
- (c) ten shall be elected by the advocates of the High Court from amongst their number.

(2) Of the elected members of every Bar Council not less than five shall be persons who have for not less than ten years been entitled as of right to practise in the High Court for which the Bar Council has been constituted.

(3) Of the elected members of the Bar Councils to be constituted for the High Courts of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal and at Bombay such proportion as the High Court may direct in each case shall be persons who have, for such minimum period as the High Court may determine, been entitled to practise in the High Court in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, and such number as may be fixed by the High Court out of the said proportion shall be barristers of England or Ireland or members of the Faculty of advocates in Scotland."

Then follows sub-s. (4) which deals with a matter with which we are not concerned. We do not, therefore, reproduce it. In pursuance of the provisions of sub-s. (3) of s. 4, this High Court passed the following resolution on September 25, 1928:

"It is hereby resolved that of the ten elected members of the Bar Council to be constituted for the High Court of Judicature at Bombay, one half shall be persons who have, for the minimum period of ten years, been entitled to practise in the High Court in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, and four, out of the said one half, shall be barristers of England or Ireland or members of the Faculty of Advocates in Scotland."

This resolution was amended on April 3, 1944, by reducing the number of barristers from 4 to 3 and increasing the number of advocates on the Original Side from 1 to 2. A further alteration in the number of representatives of persons entitled to practise in this High Court was made on April 10, 1952, as a result of which the reservation of seats for persons practising on the Original Side has been reduced from 5 to 4, and that for barristers from 3 to 2. Reading the resolution along with the provisions of s. 4, the composition of the Bar Council for this High Court now is (a) Advocate General, (b) four persons nominated by the High Court, (c) 10 persons elected by the advocates of whom 4 will be persons entitled to practise on the Original Side of the High Court and out of these 4, 2 will be barristers of England or Ireland or members of the Faculty of Advocates in Scotland.

In pursuance of the rules framed under the Act, elections for filling five seats were ordered to be held on December 12, 1958. The petitioner, who had offered himself as a candidate at those elections, therefore, had sought, in addition to the relief or declaration concerning the validity of sub-s. (3) of s. 4 and the rules ab initio made thereunder, an interim injunction restraining the Bar Council from holding any elections as then notified. The injunction was refused, and elections have taken place.

The petitioner has alleged in his petition that at the date of the elections, 8,000 advocates were on the roll of the Bar Council, out of whom only 800 are entitled to practise on the Original Side. He has pointed out that whereas 7,200 advocates who are entitled to practise on the Appellate Side cannot send more than 6 representatives to the Bar Council, 800 advocates entitled to practise on the Original Side can send at least 4 representatives to the Bar Council. This, he contends, is an unjustifiable discrimination. During the arguments at the Bar, he said that the number of barristers which form part of the 800 advocates entitled to practise on the Original Side is only 200. To entitle such a small group of persons separate representation on the Bar Council by electing two persons is nothing short of favouritism. Relying upon the provisions of art. 14 of the Constitution, his argument is that the reservation made by the High Court in its resolution is unconstitutional and that the power whereunder the High Court has acted has been rendered void by the operation of art. 13 of the Constitution. We may also mention here that the petitioner referred to the resolution passed by the High Court on October 24, 1949, abolishing the distinction between Advocates (O.S.) and Advocates (A.S.), and contended that after the passing of that resolution, the class of advocates entitled to practise exclusively on the Original Side has ceased to exist as a separate entity, and for this reason also no reservation of seats for the now non-existing class can be permitted.

The learned Advocate General, as Ex-Officio President of the Bar Council, appeared before us on behalf of the Bar Council. He contended that even if we were of the opinion that the provisions of sub-s. (3) of s. 4 have violated art. 14 of the Constitution, we should not grant the declaration sought for by the petitioner, because the Act is an All India Act, and the impugned provision applies to the Calcutta High Court also. He further pointed out that even under the Constitution, legislation with respect to persons entitled to practise before the High Court is placed in the Union List and as such it is exclusively within the legislative competence of the Parliament. It is true that the impugned provision applies also to the Calcutta High Court, and the Bar Council Act deals with a subject which is exclusively within the legislative competence of the Parliament. But these facts are not relevant for considering whether we should give the appropriate relief to the petitioner or not. If we find that the impugned provision as enacted violates a fundamental right claimed by the petitioner, it is our bounden duty to give redress to him, even if that involves the striking down of the provisions of a law enacted by the Parliament, or of a law which must be deemed to have been enacted by the Parliament. The powers of Courts in this regard are not in any way limited by the fact that the impugned law was enacted by Parliament and not by the State Legislature.

The learned Advocate General then contended that the provisions of sub-s. (3) of s. 4 are not discriminatory and further that they only confer a discretion on the High Court, which is the highest Judicial Tribunal in the State, to provide for appropriate reservation for certain class of lawyers, if the High Court was satisfied that it was necessary to do so.

It seems to us that the provisions of sub-s. (3) of s. 4 which confer, as they do, a power on the High Court to make provisions for reservation of seats for certain classes of lawyers, are not themselves discriminatory. It is open to the High Court to exercise the discretion conferred by the Legislature in any way it likes, and it may decide upon making any reservations, or it may decide not to make any reservations at all. We may further point out that the provisions empower the High Court to make a reservation only in respect of advocates who have practised for a certain minimum period and thus presumably possess some additional qualifications. It further specifies the classes of advocates in respect of whom the reservation is permitted to be made. Persons belonging to these classes are regarded by the Legislature to possess special qualifications. Therefore, the provision is not open to challenge on the ground that it confers an arbitrary or a naked discretion on the High Court. Finally, the discretion is conferred on the highest judicial authority in the State which can be trusted to exercise it judiciously.

Apart from that, we think that where the Legislature brings into existence a political institution and makes any provisions concerning its constitution or composition, the provisions of the law which bring that institution into existence cannot be challenged under art. 14 of the Constitution, on the ground that the various interests concerned are unequally represented thereon, for, in bringing a political institution into existence, the Legislature has ample discretion in the matter of providing for representation thereon of the interests concerned. In such a case, the right of representation granted to persons or interests would merely be a creature of the statute creating the institution. Where the right conferred on a person is not guaranteed by the Constitution and does not flow from it and is neither a fundamental right, nor a common law right, nor a natural, inherent or unalienable right, but a franchise dependent upon the law and is thus merely a creature of a statute, it can be asserted only to the extent and subject to the conditions specified in the statute creating it. The Bar Council is an institution which is the creature of the Act creating it. It confers a right on Advocates, among other things, to elect representatives from their own class to the Bar Council. This is neither a fundamental nor a common law right. The Act similarly empowers this High Court to provide for the special reservation of seats in the Council to advocates entitled as of right to practise on the Original Side and to Barristers, provided they have a certain minimum standing at the Bar. The right of being a member of the Bar Council is also not a fundamental or a common law right, but is one conferred by the Act alone.

Part III of the Constitution deals with fundamental rights. It guarantees the right to freedom, the right against exploitation, the right to freedom of religion, right to property, and a right to constitutional remedies. It also guarantees cultural and educational rights and a right to equality; but it does not guarantee the right of franchise nor a right to be elected to a political institution. Part XV of the Constitution deals with elections. Article 325 occurring in that Part provides:

"...no person shall be ineligible for inclusion in any such roll or claim to be included in any special electoral roll...on grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex or any of them."

But this article deals with elections to the Houses of Parliament and to the State Legislatures, and not to each and every institution. Similarly, art. 326 provides for adult franchise; but that franchise relates to elections to Parliament or the State Legislature. The general law of the land also does not recognise the right of a citizen to exercise a franchise or to be a candidate for the election. As has been already pointed out, these rights are not natural or unalienable rights of a citizen. The only sources of such rights in India with respect to political institutions other than the Parliament and the State Legislatures are the statutes bringing those institutions into existence.

There are several decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and the Supreme Courts of the various States in that country, which have dealt with this question. They are referred to in para. 458 at pages 171 to 177 of Corpus Juris Secundum, Vol. 16A. We, however, refer in particular to two of them. In Breedlove v. Suttles,¹ a State statute providing for the collection of a poll-tax of 1 dollar as a pre-requisite to the right to register and vote at the election was challenged on the ground that it violates the equal protection clause and the privileges and immunities clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, because that law applied only to persons between the ages of 21 and 60. Negating this contention, the Supreme Court observed (p. 283):

"To make payment of poll taxes a prerequisite of voting is not to deny any privilege or immunity protected by the Fourteenth Amendment. Privilege of voting is not derived from the United States, but is conferred by the State and, save as restrained by the Fifteenth and Nineteenth Amendments and other provisions of the Federal Constitution, the State may condition suffrage as it deems appropriate...The privileges and immunities protected are only those that arise from the Constitution and laws of the United States and not those that spring from other sources."

In Snowden v. Hughes,² the petitioner, a citizen of Illinois, claimed damages from that State for injury to property and for deprivation of a right or privilege of a citizen of the United States. The privilege or right to property, according to the petitioner, was the right to stand as a candidate for the State office. According to him, this was denied to him by the provisions of the Electoral law. Dealing with the matter, Stone C.J., who delivered the judgment of the Court, observed (p. 6):

"Three distinct provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment guarantee rights of persons and property. It declares that 'No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.'"

The protection extended to citizens of the United States by the privileges and immunities clause includes those rights and privileges which, under the laws and Constitution of the United States, are incident to citizenship of the United States, but does not include rights pertaining to state citizenship and derived solely from the relationship of the citizen and his state established by state law... The right to become a candidate for state office, like the right to vote for the election of state officers,...is a right or privilege of state citizenship, not of national citizenship which alone is protected by the privileges and immunities clause."

Article 14 of the Constitution corresponds to some extent with the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. No doubt, as has been pointed out in *Sheoshankar v. The State*³, art. 14 involves two concepts, a positive one, and a negative one. One is "equality before the law", and the other is "equal protection of the laws". As has been pointed out by the Supreme Court in *Charanjit Lal v. Union of India*⁴, the two expressions in substance mean one and the same. We would, therefore, be justified in relying upon the American decisions in support of our view. The principles aforesaid would also apply to the Bar Council, because it is also a political institution, inasmuch as the State has social interest in the administration of justice and, therefore, it can exercise its regulatory powers for bringing the Bar Council into existence; see Willis Constitutional Law, page 750. It would, therefore, follow from this that it is not open to the petitioner to challenge the validity of s. 4(3) of the Act.

Apart from that, we do not think that the Legislature, in reserving seats for certain classes of advocates, did something which is prohibited by art. 14 of the Constitution. No doubt, art. 14 lays down that no person shall be denied equality before the law or the equal protection of the laws. But it also presupposes that the persons to be granted equality before the law and equal protection of the laws must themselves be a class. This article does not say that there shall be absolute equality amongst men in all circumstances and in all conditions. That is a physical impossibility. Nor does this article mean that things which are different shall be treated as if they were same. What it does mean is denial of any special privilege by reason of birth, creed or the like, and also the equal subjection of all individuals and classes to the ordinary law of the land. As has been observed in Sheoshankar's case,

"there is no denying the fact that it is impossible for any law to make or regard two things different in themselves as the same. What is meant by equality of status is that rights of the same kind are to be treated equally, i.e., in the same way, as between different individuals."

Robeson in his book on Justice and Administration Law, 1947, says at page 264:

"This leads us to the principle of equality in that when a given set of facts or a particular group of individuals have been thrown into their appropriate legal categories, the judge must apply to the individual concerned the law that governs the entire class of objects or persons situated in those circumstances. All petitioners for divorce must be subjected to the same rules of law, adultery cannot be excused in one respondent because of his laudable war record; or because he and the judge have a mutual friend. This disinterested treatment of each member of a legal category on similar lines, regardless of race, religion, antecedents, physical appearance, intellect, public spirit or occupation is the foundation of judicial impartiality. In this sense equality before law may be said to have a real existence."

Acting on this principle, it has been held in scores of cases by the Supreme Court of the United States that making reasonable classifications by law is not a denial of equal protection. One of the leading cases on the point is *Barbier v. Connolly*⁵, where it was pointed out that what the constitutional guarantee forbids is class legislation but not classification which rests upon reasonable grounds of distinction. Amongst the recent cases which take the same view are the following: Minnesota Ex Rel. Pearson v. Probate Court,⁶ *Madden v. Kentucky*⁷, *Tigner v. Texas*⁸, Snowden v. Hughes, and *Prince v. Commonwealth of Massachusetts*⁹. It is clear from all these decisions that the Constitution does not prohibit legislation which is limited either in the objects to which it is directed or by the territory within which it is to operate. As observed in *Hayes v. Missouri*¹⁰,

"...It merely requires that all persons subjected to such legislation shall be treated alike, under like circumstances and conditions, both in the privileges conferred and in the liabilities imposed."

Then, again, as pointed out in Pembina Con. Silver Mining et., Co. v. Pennsylvania,¹¹ what is prohibited by the Constitution is deliberately treating a person or a class of persons in a prejudicial way.

The classification permissible by the State extends to all kinds of activities and the State has wide discretion in the matter. It is only where there is no reasonable basis for a classification that legislation making such classification may be declared discriminatory. But even then, as held in *Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co.*¹² and Plessy v. Ferguson,¹³ it is the duty of the Court to sustain the classification if any state of facts can reasonably be conceived in justification of the classification. Further, the burden is upon the person who assails the classification to show that it does not rest upon a reasonable basis.

As observed by Willis at p. 580—

"Many different classifications of persons have been upheld as constitutional. A law applying only to one person or one class of persons is constitutional if there is sufficient basis or reason for it."

Now, here we have two bases for classification. Those bases are: the length of practice as an advocate of the Original Side, and the possession of a special professional qualification. The Legislature has, in its wisdom, deemed it necessary to make a reservation of seats in favour of these two classes, and this the Legislature, was entitled to do. It may be pointed out that this differentiation is not based on grounds of race, religion, sex, etc., but solely on the ground of qualifications. It may be that the Court may think that the qualifications are not sufficiently high or distinctive to merit a separate treatment; but that cannot be a ground for a Court to refuse to uphold the classification made by the State. That is a matter which is particularly within the competence of the State to determine, and it is not open to the Court to substitute its own judgment for that of the State in this matter. The classification which the State has made is not arbitrary, and there appears to be a reasonable basis for it. It fulfils the two tests laid down by Das J. (as he then was) in *The State of West Bengal v. Anwar Ali Sarkar*¹⁴. There his Lordship observed (p. 334):

"...In order to pass the test, two conditions must be fulfilled, namely, (1) that the classification must be founded on an intelligible differentia which distinguishes those that are grouped together from others, and (2) that the differentia must have a rational relation to the object sought to be achieved by the Act."

Thus, whichever way we look at it, it would follow that the reservation of seats permitted by sub-s. (3) of s. 4 cannot be regarded as unconstitutional.

It may not be out of place to refer here to *MacDougall v. Green*¹⁵, where the provisions of a State statute which was challenged provided that candidates for Statewide office should have support not limited to a concentrated locality, which, in a sense, is the converse of the case before us. In this U.S. case the facts were as follows: In the year 1935 a clause was added to a State statute of Illinois which required that a petition to form and to nominate candidates for a new political party be signed by at least 25,000 qualified voters, provided that included in the aggregate total of 25,000 signatures, were signatures of 200 qualified voters from each of at least 50 counties within the State. The effect of the statutory requirement was that the electorate in 49 of the counties with 87 per cent. of the registered voters could not, but 25,000 of the remaining 13 per cent. of the registered voters, properly distributed among the 53 remaining counties, could form a new party. A contention was, therefore, raised that this statute offended the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution. Negating this contention, the majority of the Court observed (pp. 283-284):

"...It is allowable State policy to require that candidates for state-wide office should have support not limited to a concentrated locality. This is not a unique policy... To assume that political power is a function exclusively of numbers is to disregard the practicalities of government. Thus, the Constitution protects the interests of the smaller against the greater by giving in the Senate entirely unequal representation to populations. It would be strange indeed, and doctrinaire, for this Court, applying such broad constitutional concepts as due process and equal protection of the laws, to deny a State the power to assure a proper diffusion of political initiative as between its thinly populated counties and those having concentrated masses, in view of the fact that the latter have practical opportunities for exerting their political weight at the polls not available to the former."

Upon this view, it would follow that neither sub-s. (3) of s. 4 nor the resolution passed by the High Court on April 10, 1952, can be challenged, on the ground that art. 14 is violated by them.

We would, however, like to mention that the learned Advocate General referred us to the position in England in regard to the organisation and constitution of the Bar Council, and to the Report of the All-India Bar Committee of 1953, and stated that according special treatment to advocates practising on the Original Side and the barristers cannot be regarded as an act of favouritism. He further pointed out that the training received by this class of lawyers was of a special kind and intense, and that undergoing such a training is not obligatory for persons who start practice on the Appellate Side or in the mofussil. Further, according to him, there was, till the year 1949, a real distinction between persons practising on the Original Side and those on the Appellate Side. He then pointed out that though the distinction between the Original Side and the Appellate Side has been swept away, the persons who are today obtaining the benefit of special representation are those who have been practising on the Original Side for 10 years or more, that is, they are persons who have received the benefit of special and intensive training. He further pointed out that as a result of the abolition of the distinction between the Appellate Side and the Original Side on November 7, 1949, every advocate is, as from that date, entitled to practise on the Original Side. Those persons who were already practising as advocates on the Appellate Side on November 7, 1949, will also be entitled to the benefit of the special reservation for advocates practising on the Original Side after November 7, 1949. The question, therefore, whether there is any point in continuing the special representation would arise for consideration thereafter, and that it is not necessary to consider it now.

We may point out that till 1949 the Prothonotary and Senior Master of this High Court used to maintain a separate roll of advocates practising on the Original Side. After the abolition of the distinction between the Appellate Side and the Original Side, this roll is no longer being maintained. At one stage of the argument, we felt that this would create some difficulty in ascertaining the class of persons who would be entitled to special reservation. We, however, find that in the list maintained by the Bar Council the relevant information is given against the names of advocates who were as of right entitled to practise on the Original Side prior to November 7, 1949, and those who are barristers. No practical difficulty, therefore, arises for giving effect to the resolution of the High Court.

The petitioner, Mr. Desai, did not suggest that the High Court made any purposeful discrimination in fixing the various proportions in its resolution dated March 31, 1952. His only attack was on the provisions of sub-s. (3) of s. 4 of the Act. It is, therefore, not necessary for us to consider whether the discretion conferred on the High Court has been exercised arbitrarily or in a capricious manner.

Upon this view, we dismiss the petition, but we make no order as to costs.

Indian Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Art. 182—Application to set aside award decree rejected—Appeal against order of rejection dismissed—Darkhast filed to execute award decree—Whether period of limitation runs from date of award decree or date on which appeal against application dismissed—Word “appeal” whether restricted to appeal from order or decree sought to be executed.

The word “appeal” in column 3 of art. 182 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, is not restricted to an appeal from an order or decree which is sought to be executed, but includes an appeal from an order having direct and immediate connection with the decree which is sought to be executed.

In a suit filed by the plaintiff to set aside a sale-deed in respect of property valued at about Rs. 17,000, an award decree was passed on October 19, 1950, for Rs. 4,000. The plaintiff then filed an application to set aside the award decree praying that the decree should have been passed for an amount of Rs. 17,000 and odd. This application was rejected, and an appeal from this order of rejection was dismissed by the High Court on July 8, 1953. The plaintiff on November 11, 1954, filed a darkhast to execute the award decree. On the question whether the darkhast was in time:—

Held, that the order which was passed on the plaintiff's application had a direct and immediate connection with the award decree sought to be executed, that the starting point of limitation was, therefore, July 8, 1953, on which date the High Court dismissed the appeal filed by the plaintiff from the order rejecting his application, and that, therefore, the darkhast was in time.

VYAS J. This first appeal arises out of an execution proceeding and it raises a question under cl. (2) of art. 182 of the Indian Limitation Act. The question is as to the construction of the word “appeal” in cl. (2) of art. 182. Does the word mean an appeal from the decree which is sought to be executed or would it include an appeal from an order having direct and immediate connection with the decree which is sought to be executed? This interesting point arises upon the following circumstances:—

The appellant-plaintiff filed a suit, being Suit No. 15 of 1948, to set aside a certain sale-deed which was passed by his father. The value of the property that was the subject-matter of the sale-deed was Rs. 17,187-8-0. The dispute was referred to arbitration and the arbitrator made an award upon which a decree was based. The award decree was passed on October 19, 1950, and it was for the amount of Rs. 4,000. The plaintiff filed a Miscellaneous Application, being Miscellaneous Application No. 272 of 1949, whereby he challenged the award decree dated October 19, 1950. He sought to have the award decree set aside. The above-mentioned Miscellaneous Application No. 272 of 1949 was rejected on October 10, 1950. From the said order of rejection, the plaintiff appealed to the High Court and the High Court dismissed the appeal on July 8, 1953. The present darkhast to execute the award decree was filed by the plaintiff on November 11, 1954.

Now, the question arising for consideration is as to what is the starting point of limitation upon the above facts. Would the starting point be October 19, 1950, the date upon which the award decree was passed, or would the limitation commence to run from July 8, 1953, the date upon which an order was made by the High Court dismissing the appeal of the plaintiff from the order rejecting his Miscellaneous Application No. 272 of 1949?

The question of construction of art. 182, cl. (2), has been the subject-matter of considerable discussion in several cases. But, in my view, all doubts upon the question of construction of the word "appeal" occurring in cl. (2) of art. 182 have been set at rest by the decision of the Privy Council in Nagendra Nath Dey v. Suresh Chandra Dey.¹ That was a case in which a mortgage decree was passed on June 24, 1920. One of the decree-holders, a man named Madan Mohan, was dissatisfied with the order of the learned Subordinate Judge disallowing his claim to be substituted by any one of the decree-holders whose rights he (Madan Mohan) claimed to have acquired. Madan Mohan appealed to the High Court and his appeal purported to be against the order of the Subordinate Judge dated June 24, 1920, rejecting his claim against his co-plaintiff. It may be noted that in the appeal which Madan Mohan made to the High Court, he did not join the judgment-debtors. In other words, the quarrel in the appeal which was filed in the High Court by Madan Mohan was a quarrel between the two plaintiffs. Madan Mohan stated in his appeal that no decree had been drawn up in the case and, therefore, he was appealing against the order of the Subordinate Judge. That, however, was not true. The appeal, though irregular in form and insufficiently stamped, was admitted by the High Court and it was heard in due course and was dismissed. Subsequently, in execution of the original decree that was passed by the Subordinate Judge, a question arose whether the terminus a quo was the date of the decision of the irregular appeal or the date of the original decree in suit, namely, June 24, 1920. Upon the matter going before their Lordships of the Privy Council, their Lordships observed (p. 1070):

"...the question must be decided upon the plain words of the article: 'Where there has been an appeal', time is to run from the date of the decree of the appellate Court. There is, in their Lordships' opinion, no warrant for reading into the words quoted any qualification either as to the character of the appeal or as to the parties to it; the words mean just what they say. The fixation of period of limitation must always be to some extent arbitrary and may frequently result in hardship. But in construing such provisions equitable considerations are out of place, and the strict grammatical meaning of the words is, their Lordships think, the only safe guide."

Their Lordships then proceeded to observe:

"...It is at least an intelligible rule that so long as there is any question sub judice between any of the parties, those affected shall not be compelled to pursue the so often thorny path of execution, which, if the final result is against them, may lead to no advantage." (p. 1071).

It is clear, therefore, that their Lordships did not read the word "appeal" in cl. (2) of art. 182 subject to restriction of cls. (1), (3) and (4) of the said article and they were not prepared to import into the word "appeal" any consideration which would narrow down the plain meaning of that word. When their Lordships observed that it was at least an intelligible rule that so long as there was any question sub judice between any of the parties, those affected should not be compelled to pursue the so often thorny path of execution, which, if the final result was against them, might lead to no advantage, it is clear that they did not divorce the connotation of the word "appeal" from any question which might be sub judice between any of the parties to the litigation. As cl. (2) of art. 182 follows close upon cl. (1), it might, perhaps have been more natural to construe the word "appeal" occurring in cl. (2) so as to mean "appeal from the decree or order" referred to in cl. (1). But this consideration did not weigh with their Lordships of the Privy Council when a question arose before them of construing the word "appeal" in cl. (2). They, in terms, pointed out that the fixation of the period of limitation cannot always be a natural fixation, but must be to some extent arbitrary and it might frequently result in hardship either to one party or to the other. It is significant to remember in this context that when the Legislature used the word "appeal" in cl. (2) they did not, in terms, say that the appeal was to refer to the decree or order mentioned in cl. (1). It is clear that the Legislature did not intend to import any qualification in the connotation of the word "appeal" when they used that word in cl. (2), for instance, qualification that it should be an appeal from the decree that was sought to be executed. Following, with great respect, the principle laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Nagendra Nath Dey v. Suresh Chandra Dey, the principle being that the words used by the Legislature must be construed to mean just what they say, I must uphold the contention of the learned advocate Mr. Bege appearing for the appellant-plaintiff that the starting point of limitation in this case would be the date "8th July 1953," upon which date the High Court dismissed the plaintiff's appeal which was filed by him from an order rejecting his Miscellaneous Application No. 272 of 1949, which was made for setting aside the award decree.

In *Bhawanipore Banking Corporation, Ltd. v. Gouri Shankar Sharma*², a preliminary decree on a mortgage was passed ex parte on August 21, 1940. The judgment-debtor made an application under s. 36 of the Bengal Money-lenders Act for re-opening the decree and the application was dismissed for default of appearance on December 20, 1941, and an application under O. IX, r. 9, Civil Procedure Code, for restoration of this application was also dismissed on June 1, 1942. In the meanwhile on December 22, 1941, a final decree was passed. The judgment-debtor preferred an appeal from the order dismissing his application under O. IX, r. 9, Civil Procedure Code, and this appeal was dismissed for non-prosecution on July 3, 1944. On April 9, 1945, the decree-holder applied for the execution of the decree. It was held by the Supreme Court that the words "where there has been an appeal" in cl. (2) of art. 182 must be read with the words "for the execution of a decree or order" in the 1st column of the article and, therefore, the fact that there was an appeal from the order dismissing the application under O. IX, r. 9, made in connection with the proceeding under s. 36 of the Money-lenders Act, could not give rise to a fresh starting point for limitation under art. 182, cl. (2). In the body of the judgment delivered by their Lordships, they observed (p. 29):

"...however broadly we may construe it (their Lordships were referring to the expression 'Where there has been an appeal' occurring in cl. (2) of art. 182), it cannot be held to cover an appeal from an order which is passed in a collateral proceeding or which has no direct or immediate connection with the decree under execution."

It must follow by necessary implication from these observations that if an appeal is made from an order which has a direct or immediate connection with the decree under execution, that appeal would be covered by the expression "appeal" in cl. (2) of art. 182. Now, in the present case it could not be disputed that the order which was passed in Miscellaneous Application No. 272 of 1949, which was filed by the plaintiff, had a direct and immediate connection with the award decree. The award decree was passed for the amount of Rs. 4,000. It is clear that the plaintiff's prayer in Miscellaneous Application No. 272 of 1949 was that the decree should have been passed for an amount of Rs. 17,000 and odd. The plaintiff's grievance in his Miscellaneous Application No. 272 of 1949 was in respect of the award decree which was passed only for Rs. 4,000. It is, therefore, perfectly plain that the order which was passed in plaintiff's application No. 272 of 1949 was directly and immediately connected with the decree under execution, namely, the award decree, which is sought to be executed in the present darkhast filed by the plaintiff on November 11, 1954. From the order rejecting the plaintiff's Miscellaneous Application No. 272 of 1949 there was an appeal in the High Court and that appeal was dismissed by the High Court on July 8, 1953. It is clear, therefore, that the order in appeal made by the High Court was also an order which had a direct and immediate connection with the decree sought to be executed in the present darkhast filed by the plaintiff on November 11, 1954. In these circumstances the present case would be covered, by necessary implication, by their Lordships' observations:

"however broadly we may construe the expression 'Where there has been an appeal', it cannot be held to cover an appeal from an order which is passed in a collateral proceeding or which has no direct or immediate connection with the decree under execution."

In *Nagappa v. Gurushantappa*³ the trial Court was dealing with a suit for partition. The trial Court passed a decree in favour of defendants Nos. 1 and 2 and against defendant No. 3 on December 14, 1925. Defendant No. 2 appealed to the High Court against the decree and defendant No. 3 applied to the trial Court for review. The trial Court reviewed the decree on June 18, 1926. Defendants Nos. 1 and 2 appealed to the High Court against the order granting review. The High Court dismissed both the appeals on October 29, 1928. An application to execute the decree was made on September 2, 1929. It was held by a division bench of this Court consisting of Mr. Justice Patkar and Mr. Justice Barlee that the execution application dated September 2, 1929, was within time, as under art. 182, cl. (2) of the Limitation Act, 1908, the period of limitation commenced to run from October 29, 1928, i.e., the date of the decree or order passed by the High Court in Appeal No. 65 of 1926. It may be noted that the Appeal No. 65 of 1926 which was decided by the High Court was an appeal made by defendants Nos. 1 and 2 against the order of the Court below granting the review application. As I have just mentioned, the High Court held that the limitation would begin to run from the date of the order made by the High Court in Appeal No. 65 of 1926. This decision is directly contrary to the contention pressed before me by the learned advocate Mr. Samant for respondent No. 1 that the word "appeal" in cl. (2) of art. 182 must relate to an appeal from a decree or order sought to be executed. In the body of the judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Barlee in Nagappa's case Mr. Justice Barlee pointed out that the question which had arisen for consideration was as to the plain meaning of the words used in cl. (2) of art. 182. Mr. Justice Barlee negatived the argument that an appeal to fall within the meaning of art. 182 must be an appeal from an original decree. Mr. Justice Barlee followed the principle laid down by the Privy Council in Nagendra Nath Dey v. Suresh Chandra Dey that nothing must be added to the words of the article so as to narrow down the connotation of the word "appeal" used in cl. (2) of art. 182.

In *Narayan v. Radhabai*⁴ also, it was held by this Court that cl. (2) of art. 182 would cover an appeal from an order granting a review and that the word "appeal" was not confined to an appeal from a decree or order sought to be executed.

It may be noted in this case that it was contended by Mr. Adarkar, who appeared for the appellant, that an appeal from an order granting a review was not an appeal which would fall within cl. (2) of art. 182. Mr. Justice

Barlee, who decided the case, negatived this contention and he observed that he was bound by the decision of this Court in Nagappa's case. I have already pointed out above that in Nagappa's case it was decided that cl. (2) of art. 182 did not refer exclusively to the appeals from decrees that were to be executed. Mr. Justice Barlee pointed out that the decision in Nagappa's case was based on the Privy Council case of Nagendra Nath Dey v. Suresh Chandra Dey and held that the question must be decided upon the plain words of the article and that where there had been an appeal of any sort, time was to run from the date of the decree of the appellate Court.

In *Narmadabai Narayanshet v. Hidayatalli*⁵ also it was held by Mr. Justice Gajendragadkar that an appeal preferred by the defendant against the order dismissing his application to set aside an ex parte decree passed against him fell within the word "appeal" in clause (3) of art. 182 and that, therefore, in such a case limitation would commence to run from the date of the final decree or order of the appellate Court. A contention similar to the one advanced by Mr. Samant in the present case was advanced in that case also. But it was negatived by Mr. Justice Gajendragadkar and he observed (p. 701):

"It seems to me that in view of the Privy Council decision in Nagendra's case and in view of the later decision of this Court in Nagappa's case it must be held that the word 'appeal' in col. 3 of art. 182 includes an appeal against an order rejecting the defendant's application for setting aside the ex parte decree."

It is clear that Mr. Justice Gajendragadkar did not accept the contention that the word "appeal" as used in cl. (2) of art. 182 was restricted to an appeal from the decree that was sought to be executed.

On behalf of respondent No. 1 my attention is invited by Mr. Samant to a decision of this Court in *Mahadeo Bhimashankar v. Fatumiya*⁶. In this case the plaintiff had obtained a preliminary mortgage decree on June 27, 1933. The defendant preferred an appeal from that decree, and the Appellate Court made an order on November 16, 1935, declaring the appeal to have abated. The preliminary decree was made final on March 7, 1935. On March 30, 1935, the plaintiff filed a darkhast to execute the final decree and it was disposed of on September 14, 1935. On November 16, 1938, the assignees of the decree filed another darkhast to execute the decree. The defendant's heirs contended that this darkhast was not filed within 3 years from the previous darkhast and that, therefore, it was barred by limitation. The assignees, relying on art. 182, cl. (2), submitted that the darkhast was filed in time as it was filed within three years from November 16, 1935, on which date the Court declared that the appeal had abated. It was observed by a division bench of this Court consisting of Mr. Justice Bavdekar and Mr. Justice Dixit that as there was no appeal from the final decree which was the decree sought to be executed, time should be computed from the date of the final decree and not from the date on which the appeal from the preliminary decree was declared to have abated and that, therefore, the darkhast was barred by limitation. Now, with respect, it must be pointed out that the view taken by the Court in this case was opposed to the principle laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Nagendra Nath Dey's case and it was also not in conformity with the view taken by a division bench of this Court in Nagappa v. Gurushantappa. As I have mentioned above, the principle laid down by the Privy Council in Nagendra's case is that the connotation of the word "appeal" as used in cl. (2) of art. 182 is not to be restricted or confined to an appeal from a decree or order which is sought to be executed. With this principle the decision of this Court in Mahadeo Bhimashankar's case is not in conformity and with great respect I am unable to follow the decision in Mahadeo Bhimashankar's case. If the defendant in Mahadeo Bhimashankar's case had succeeded in his appeal to the High Court from the preliminary decree, it would, in the words of their Lordships of the Privy Council, have been of no advantage at all to him to be compelled to pursue "the thorny path of execution of the final decree." In my view therefore—and I am saying this with great respect—the case of Mahadeo Bhimashankar v. Fatumiya, conflicting as it did with the dictum of the Privy Council in Nagendra Nath Dey's case, was not correctly decided.

The next case to which my attention is invited by Mr. Samant appearing for respondent No. 1 is the full bench case of the Patna High Court *Rameshwar Prasad v. Parmeshwar Prasad*⁷. The learned Judges of the Patna High Court observed in this case that the word “appeal” in column 3 of cl. (2) of art. 182 of the Indian Limitation Act did not include “an appeal preferred from an order refusing to set aside an ex parte preliminary decree in a suit for partition.” They said that the word “appeal” in cl. (2) of art. 182 meant an appeal only from the decree or order sought to be executed. It is clear that the learned Judges of the Patna High Court, in coming to the decision to which they came in this case, put a narrow and restricted meaning on the word “appeal” which their Lordships of the Privy Council in terms discouraged in Nagendra Nath Dey's case.

In *Sivaramachari v. Anjaneya*⁸, which is a full bench case of the Madras High Court, it was held by the learned Judges that the word “appeal” in cl. (2) of art. 182, which is no doubt a general word, must bear a meaning restricted by its context and it means an appeal from a decree or order of the nature mentioned in cls. (1), (3) and (4), that is to say, an appeal from the original decree or order, an appeal from a decree following a review of judgment and an appeal from an amended decree. The learned Judges said:

“the true test is that the decree of the appellate Court in the appeal must be the decree which is sought to be executed.”

Once again I may point out, with great respect, that this restriction which was put upon the meaning of the word “appeal” occurring in cl. (2) of art. 182, namely, that it must be read in the context of cls. (1), (3) and (4) of art. 182, was a restriction which was discouraged by the Privy Council in Nagendra Nath Dey's case when their Lordships observed that the words of the article were plain and without any qualification either as to the character of the appeal or as to the parties to it.

In *Jacinto v. Fernandez*⁹ it was held by a division bench of this Court consisting of the learned Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Wadia (p. 923):

“...the words ‘Where there has been an appeal’ in the last column of article 182 (of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908), mean an appeal from the decree sought to be executed, and not an appeal from another decree, though made in the suit.”

In that case there did not arise for consideration a position analogous to the position in the present case. In the present case an appeal was made by the appellant from an order refusing to set aside the award decree and this feature of the case was absent in Jacinto's case. That being so, with great respect, the decision in Jacinto's case would not be attracted by the facts of the present case.

In *Fakir Chand Mandal v. Daiba Charan Parni*¹⁰ it was held:

“Where an appeal has been preferred from a decree, the period of limitation commences from the date of the decree on appeal... ‘decree on appeal’ means decree on appeal from the decree to obtain execution of which the application is made.”

It was further held:

“An application to set aside a decree does not ‘keep the decree open’, and is not to be regarded as an appeal from the decree itself.”

This decision would be of no assistance to Mr. Samant for the simple reason that the question of construction of cl. (2) of art. 182 did not arise in that case.

For the reasons stated above I must accept the contention of Mr. Rege pressed before me for the appellant-plaintiff that the starting point of limitation in the present case would be the date July 8, 1953, on which date the High Court dismissed the appeal filed by the plaintiff from an order rejecting his application No. 272 of 1949. As the limitation would commence from July 8, 1953, the present darkhast filed by the plaintiff on November 11, 1954, to execute the award decree would be in time. I accordingly set aside the order made by the learned Judge below, allow the appeal and remit the darkhast to the Court below for disposal according to law. So far as the costs of the appeal are concerned, respondent No. 1 will bear his own costs and will also pay the costs of the appellant.

Appeal allowed.

RATILAL VIRCHAND SHAH v. THE STATE OF BOMBAY.*

Bombay Land Requisition Act (Bom. XXXIII of 1948), Secs. 5(1), 6, 9(1)—Premises derequisitioned under s. 9(1)—Whether State Government can make fresh requisition order under s. 5(1) in respect of such premises.

The State Government has jurisdiction to make a fresh requisition order under s. 5(1) of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, in respect of premises which have been derequisitioned under s. 9 of the Act.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

F. S. Nariman, for the petitioner.

B. J. Joshi, for the respondent.

K. K. DESAI J. This is a petition under art. 226 of the Constitution challenging the validity of a requisition order dated May 30, 1958, made in pursuance of the Bombay Land Requisition Act and for appropriate reliefs in that connection.

The premises in question are plot No. 6, 2nd floor of building known as "Durga Villa", situate at 77-B, Ranade Road, Dadar, Bombay. The petitioner's case is that he had been a tenant of the premises since 1943 and had been residing at the premises continuously right up to the date of the impugned order. In June 1957 the petitioner was called upon to give information regarding these premises to the Accommodation Department. In August 1957, a show cause notice in connection with the enquiry contemplated under the Act was served on the petitioner. In pursuance of that notice, the petitioner gave such information as was required to the Department. By an order dated February 8, 1958, a copy whereof is annexed as exh. A to the petition, after the recital that on enquiry it was found that the petitioner had not actually resided in the premises for a continuous period of six months immediately preceding the date of the order, a declaration was made that the petitioner had not actually resided in the premises for a continuous period of six months immediately preceding the date of the order and the premises were requisitioned. By subsequent correspondence and representations made at an interview with the Deputy Minister for Revenue, the petitioner contended that the requisition order should not be given effect to. By an order dated March 24, 1958, being exh. B to the petition the premises were derequisitioned.

Another notice dated April 28, 1958, was served on the petitioner for showing cause against the requisition of the premises. In May 1958 the petitioner submitted his written statement and also gave his statement to the authorities in connection with further enquiries which were being made for requisitioning the premises. The petitioner's case is that though in fact he was continuously residing in the premises as intimated to the Accommodation Officer the petitioner left for Sanad and Mount Abu on May 8, 1958. He, within a week thereafter, returned to Bombay and had resided with his son at an immoveable property which had been purchased in April 1957 by and in the name of the petitioner's wife. This property is situate at Khar. In May 1958 one of the petitioner's sons and his wife (i.e., petitioner's daughter-in-law) were residing in a flat in that property. The petitioner's case is that his daughter-in-law was pregnant, and in delicate health and the petitioner had for that reason to return to Bombay and on return having regard to the delicate condition of the health of his daughter-in-law resided at the property at Khar. The respondent's case is that in connection with the first requisition order the petitioner had made representations that he had no other accommodation and it was only for that reason on sympathetic grounds that the derequisition order dated March 24, 1958, was made. The first order was made in pursuance of information received by Government that the premises were subject matter of suppressed vacancy. After the derequisition order, having regard to the information again received, further enquiries were made and the Government then discovered that the petitioner had in the name of his wife purchased the aforesaid property at Khar, that the petitioner had alternative accommodation and representations made by him were false and that the petitioner's case that he had temporarily gone to reside at Khar with his son was false. It was also ascertained that the petitioner's telephone had been removed from the premises to Khar property some time in July 1957. Having regard to these facts and having held further enquiries the second requisition order dated May 30, 1958, was made. That order contains also a declaration that the petitioner had not actually resided in the premises for a continuous period of six months immediately preceding the date of the order. The petitioner has filed this petition and made diverse contentions challenging the validity of the requisition order dated May 30, 1958.

The grounds which are pressed before me are contained in sub-paras. 8(a) and 8(e) of the petition. The other grounds are not pressed seriously before me. In para. 8(a), after reciting the derequisition order dated March 24, 1958, it is submitted that the effect of the derequisition order was to effectively efface and wipe out the requisition made under the requisition order dated February 8, 1958, and the respondent ceased to have any jurisdiction to issue a fresh order of requisition on the basis of continuous non-residence for a period of six months prior to February 8, 1958. The ground in sub-para. 8(e) is that the effect of the derequisition order was that the authorities had come to the conclusion that there was no case for requisitioning the said premises or that there was no actual non-residence for a continuous period of 6 months of the petitioner in the premises and that it was not permissible for the authority to come to a different conclusion, once having decided the question in issue viz. that of residence of the petitioner in the premises for a period of six months prior to the date of the order.

Before referring to the contentions raised as aforesaid and developed before me, it is convenient to point out that jurisdiction of the authority to make the order in question is to be considered with reference to the provisions of s. 5 of the Act. These provisions have been construed often by this Court. It has been held and it is well established that the jurisdiction is to be found in cl. (1) of s. 5 and that the jurisdiction cannot be exercised if a case falls within the proviso to cl. (1). The jurisdiction is very wide and in the words of s. 5(1)

"If in the opinion of the State Government it is necessary or expedient so to do, the State Government may by order in writing requisition any land for any public purpose."

On a true construction of the provisions of s. 5 the conditions precedent necessary for making the requisition order are only two: (1) existence of a public purpose, and (2) a declaration as is contained in cl. (2) of s. 5. That declaration directly relates to the facts as mentioned in proviso to cl. (1) of s. 5.

The effect of these provisions is that the Government has jurisdiction to make a requisition order in all cases where the landlord or the tenant had not actually resided in the premises and there existed a public purpose. Along with these wide powers and/or wide nature of jurisdiction it is further provided that the declaration made by the Government shall be conclusive evidence that the owner, landlord or the tenant had not actually resided in the premises for a period of six months immediately preceding the date of the order. It is not denied and it cannot be denied that such a declaration is contained in the impugned order. It is now well settled that a declaration made under the provisions of s. 5(2), unless it is challenged on the ground of mala fides, cannot be questioned by Court. The declaration contained in the impugned order has not been challenged on the ground of mala fides or on any other ground in the petition before me. I am, having regard to the provisions of the Act, bound to proceed on the basis that the facts mentioned in the declaration are true facts. Having regard to this position, it is certainly very difficult to see how it can be contended that in making the order in question the authority had no jurisdiction as is sought to be contended by the petitioner.

Mr. Nariman for the petitioner developed his case by enunciating in his words the following propositions:

1. A release from requisition under s. 9 of the Act operates as liberation of the property from requisition and from all the incidents which justify the making or continuance of requisition.
2. That on a true construction of the provisions of the Act it should be held that the Legislature intended finality as regards all questions of facts and that the finding made by derequisition order dated May 30, 1958, amounted to a finding that the petitioner was residing in the premises and that finding could not be again reconsidered for the purpose of making a fresh requisition order.
3. On a true construction of provisions of s. 9 of the Act the release from requisition leads to prevent an exercise of power for making a fresh requisition order since otherwise absurd results would follow.
4. That the provisions of s. 9(1) for derequisition cannot be used for correction of unintentional mistakes made in connection with existing requisition orders; and in such a case the powers which ought to be exercised are to be found in s. 21 of the Bombay General Clauses Act, i.e., in such cases orders should be rescinded from inception and/or as from the date of the order. I have recited these contentions because in my view giving all due considerations to them I cannot come to the conclusion that the jurisdiction of Government to make requisition under s. 5(1) was in any manner affected by the provisions of s. 9 of the Act.

It is true that under cl. (2) of s. 9 on a derequisition order being made possession of the requisitioned premises is to be restored to the appropriate party and there is liability to pay compensation for deterioration if any. Under s. 9 an enquiry also has to be made as to the person to whom possession is to be restored and machinery is provided for the purpose of crystallising the rights and liabilities of Government on the one hand and the party entitled to possession on the other as regards the requisitioned premises. It is, of course, a serious thing that jurisdiction under s. 5 of the Act is available to the Government in respect of derequisitioned premises when liability is created to restore possession to the party concerned under the provisions of s. 9. Mr. Nariman contends that power, if any, in the Government to proceed under s. 5 could not be exercisable in respect of derequisitioned premises until the expiry of six months from the date of the derequisition order. That he says is clear if both the sections are read together. He submits that I should not read s. 5 separately from s. 9 and should give effect to the provisions of these sections by reading them together. Mr. Joshi has pointed out that under the provisions of s. 6 of the Act release of the premises from requisition constitutes a vacancy entitling the Government to make a requisition order of derequisitioned premises immediately upon derequisitioning the same. He in my view rightly submits that it is impossible to construe the provisions of s. 6 so as to hold that Government had no jurisdiction to make a requisition order in respect of derequisitioned premises on the date of derequisition or immediately thereafter. If I upheld the contention of Mr. Nariman, it would be impossible to give effect to the provisions of s. 6 in the matter of requisition of a property where vacancy occurs by reason of the release of the premises from requisition.

As regards the contention that derequisition resulted only from the finding that the petitioner was continuously residing in the premises for a period of six months immediately preceding the date of the requisition order, I do not find any evidence of any kind. It is the case of the respondent that the derequisition order was made not because the petitioner was residing in the premises but on sympathetic ground, viz., that the petitioner's representation that he had no alternative accommodation at that date was accepted by the authorities. The question of the Government reconsidering the finding that the petitioner had not in fact resided in the premises for six months did not arise and the contentions raised on that footing cannot be accepted.

It is not necessary for me to consider whether in a case where there is a mistake the Government is not entitled to proceed under s. 9 to derequisition the premises and is bound to rescind the requisition order made. Such a question according to the respondent never arose in this case. They had not made any mistake and they had only on sympathetic ground made the derequisition order. I have no reason to disbelieve the statement made in the affidavit in reply in that connection. I cannot hold in this matter that it was necessary for the Government to proceed to rescind the first requisition order as contended by Mr. Nariman.

I have come to the conclusion that the fresh requisition order is validly made. The petition is, therefore, dismissed and rule discharged.

Mr. Joshi applies for costs in excess of the fixed costs. I have refused that application.

Petition dismissed.

Foreigners Order, 1948, Cl. 11(2)—Foreigners Act (XXXI of 1946), Sec. 3—Whether under cl. 11(2) of Order civil authority has jurisdiction to order foreigner to report to police every day—Connotation of word "movements" in cl. 11 (2).

Under sub-cl. (2) of cl. 11 of the Foreigners Order, 1948, the civil authority is empowered to give directions to a foreigner to report to the Inspector of Police, Registration of Foreigners Branch, at his office at a specified time every day.

General conditions as to activities or a particular condition with reference to any activity of a foreigner can be validly imposed under cl. 11 of the Foreigners Order, 1948.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

D. H. Buch, with A. A. Rizvi, for the petitioner.

R. M. Kantawala, for the respondent.

K. K. DESAI J. This is a petition under art. 226 of the Constitution challenging the validity of an order dated November 1, 1958, made by the respondent in pursuance of cl. 11 of the Foreigners Order, 1948. The relevant facts are as follows:

*Decided, December 3, 1958. O.C.J. Miscellaneous Petition No. 310 of 1958.

The petitioner is a foreigner and is a national of Afghanistan. By an order dated June 8, 1957, made by the Deputy Secretary to the Government of India in exercise of the powers conferred by sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Foreigners Act it was directed that the petitioner shall not remain in India and that he shall depart from India by land-route and thereafter shall not re-enter India. According to the respondent the petitioner has been involved in six criminal cases a list whereof is annexed as Ex. 1 to the affidavit in reply. The petitioner has never denied the binding character of the order of deportation dated June 8, 1957. The Government, however, has not been able to deport the petitioner out of India because the petitioner has to go to Afghanistan by land-route and since the date of the order visa has not been available to enable the petitioner to be sent through Pakistan. At present steps are being taken by the Government for renewing petitioner's passport for his return to Afghanistan. It appears that in the meanwhile, having regard to the opinion which the respondent had formed regarding the petitioner on his having been involved in criminal cases mentioned in Ex. 1 the order in question was made on November 1, 1958. The relevant part of the order dated November 1, 1958, runs as under:

"You are hereby ordered under the powers vested in me under para 11 of the Foreigners Order 1948.

(a) To report to the Inspector of Police, Registration of Foreigners Branch, Special Branch, II C.I.D., at his office at 3 P.M. every day.

(b) Not to change your address without permission in writing previously obtained from the Deputy Commissioner of Police,...

(c) Not to leave the limits of Greater Bombay without permission in writing..."

The petitioner has argued this petition before me by contending that under cl. 11 of the Foreigners Order referred to in the impugned Order, there is no power of any kind in the respondent to give directions as contained in cl. (a) in the order, viz. to report to the Inspector of Police, Registration of Foreigners Branch, Special Branch, II C.I.D., at his office at 3 P.M. every day. The petitioner has contended that as there is no such power contained in cl. 11 of the Foreigners Order, this part of the Order is without jurisdiction and there should be a writ of mandamus directing the respondent to forbear from enforcing that order.

In connection with the arguments advanced on behalf of the petitioner and the respondent, it is relevant to refer to certain provisions of the Foreigners Act and the Foreigners Order. The relevant provisions in the Foreigners Act are as follows:—

"3. Power to make orders:—(1) The Central Government may by order make provision, either generally or with respect to all foreigners or with respect to any particular foreigner or any prescribed class or description of foreigners, for prohibiting, regulating or restricting the entry of foreigners into India or their departure therefrom or their presence or continued presence therein.

(2) In particular and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing power, orders made under this section may provide that the foreigner—

(a) shall not enter India or shall enter India only at such times and by such route...

(b) shall not depart from India, or shall depart only at such times and by such route...

(c) shall not remain in India or in any prescribed area therein;

(cc) ...

(d) shall remove himself to, and remain in, such area in India as may be prescribed;

(e) shall comply with such conditions as may be prescribed or specified—

(i) requiring him to reside in the particular place;

(ii) imposing any restrictions on his movement;

(iii) ...

(iv) ...

(v) ...

(vi) . . .
 (vii) . . .
 (viii) . . .
 (ix) otherwise regulating his conduct in any such particular as may be prescribed or specified;

(f) ~~shall~~ enter into a bond with or without sureties for the due observance of, or as an alternative to the enforcement of, any or all prescribed or specified restrictions or conditions;

and make provision for any matter which is to be or may be prescribed and for such incidental and supplementary matters as may, in the opinion of the Central Government, be expedient or necessary for giving effect to this Act."

Now, before referring to the Foreigners Order enacted in exercise of the powers contained in s. 3 of the Act it is relevant to point out that from s. 3 above the object of the Act appears to be to provide for prescribing, regulating and restricting amongst other things the presence and continued presence of a foreigner in India. What appears to have been intended is to confer power on the executive authority to prescribe and specify conditions for continuance of a foreigner in India. Extremely wide kind of or unlimited restrictions and prohibitions and regulations can be validly prescribed and specified. The Legislature intended to give widest possible powers to the Government for obvious reasons.

A foreigner is not entitled to any guarantees or fundamental rights as a citizen is entitled to under the Constitution. A foreigner can be dangerous to security of India, his presence may be undesirable for security of India. His presence may be undesirable for any reason of any kind, and it appears to have been intended by the Legislature to leave the whole matter of the foreigner's presence in India to the executive discretion of the Government. The provisions as contained in s. 3 make this object of the Act abundantly clear. The last words in sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Act show the wide character of the powers intended to be conferred on the Government. The power is given to make provision for any matter which is to be or may be prescribed and for such incidental and supplementary matters which may be deemed expedient or necessary by the Government for giving effect to the Act. I have accordingly no doubt that under the several items mentioned in sub-s. (2) of s. 3 there is wide power vested in the Central Government including the power to direct a foreigner in connection with his residence in India to report every day to the police authority as mentioned in cl. (a) of the impugned order. It is not as if there is no jurisdiction under the Act to make such an order. Even if I come to the conclusion that there was under cl. 11 of the Foreigners Order referred to in the impugned order no power in the respondent to direct the petitioners to report every day to the police authority I would be justified in holding that such power was intended to be conferred on the Central Government and that if not under cl. 11 such power was otherwise also vested and I should not, having regard to the antecedents of the petitioner, be justified in giving him the relief which he wants by way of writ.

The relevant part of cl. 11 of the Foreigners Order runs as under:

"11. Powers to impose restrictions on movements etc.:—The civil authority may, by order in writing, direct that any foreigner shall comply with such conditions as may be specified in the order in respect of:—

- (1) his place of residence;
- (2) his movements;
- (3) . . .
- (4) . . ."

Mr. Buch has contended that I must give effect to the marginal note and/or the heading of this clause and also to the word "movements" as used in cl. 11. He says that the word "restrictions" has been used in the marginal note in the same sense as the same has been used in the Act in s. 3(2)(e),(ii). He says that the word "restrictions" imports directions of a negative character and not of a positive character such as to report to the police authorities as contained in the impugned order. Mr. Kantawala for the respondent has contended that the provisions of cl. 11 are clear, and that I should not at all look to the marginal note or the heading of that clause for the meaning of the word "movements" as used in sub-cl. (2) of cl. 11. He has pointed out by referring to Murray's Oxford Dictionary the meaning of the word "movement" [as mentioned in the 2nd column of page 728 of Vol. 6 in Murray's English dictionary] under sub-heading (d) where it is stated as follows: "Chiefly pl.: Actions, activities, doings of a person or body of persons". He has contended that having regard to this meaning of the word "movements" and having regard to the object of the Act as already mentioned by me above the true meaning of cl. 11 (2) of the Foreigners Order is that the civil authorities can place any conditions on "actions, activities or doings" of a foreigner. He has contended that the reporting to the police authority is directly a condition on the actions or activities or doings of the petitioner and, therefore, the respondent had jurisdiction to make the impugned order.

In my view it is important to bear in mind that the word used is plural, viz. "movements" and not "movement". Conditions which relate to movements, i.e., activities of a foreigner may be specified in an order made under cl. 11(2). The condition to report to the Inspector of Police relates to activity of the petitioner. It is not something foreign to activity of the petitioner. I do not accept the contention of Mr. Buch that a condition relating to movements must be with reference to the movements of a foreigner from one place to another. General conditions as to activities or a particular condition with reference to any activity of a foreigner would be justifiable under the provisions of cl. 11. I must admit that I have come to this construction with certain hesitation. But having regard to the general scheme of the Act and the object as aforesaid of the Act, I must give the widest possible meaning to the cl. 11 in the Foreigners Order and hold that the same is intended to empower the civil authorities to take action of the kind contained in the impugned order. It is for this reason that I have given general meaning to the word "movements" and come to the conclusion that the respondent had jurisdiction to make the impugned order and was justified in imposing the condition as contained in cl. (a) of the impugned order. I do not agree that the condition imposed must be negative and cannot be of positive kind.

Having regard to my aforesaid finding, the petitioner is not entitled to any relief. The petition is dismissed with costs. Rule discharged.

*Decided, December 4, 1953. O.C.J. Delhi 1 [1940] F.O.R. 110.
Revenue Case No. 393D of 1955.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

Miss H. P. Shamdasani, for the plaintiffs.

H. M. Seervai, Advocate General, for the State of Bombay.

MODY J. The point for consideration concerns court-fees. This plaint was presented to the Prothonotary of this Court. The plaint has been made out on papers which bear court-fee stamps of the aggregate value of Rs. 2,360. These court-fee stamps bear the imprint thereon "Delhi". This plaint was originally filed in the Court of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Delhi, and after certain proceedings in Delhi the same was returned to the plaintiffs for being presented to the proper Court on the ground that that Court had no jurisdiction to entertain and try the suit. Under those circumstances, this plaint was thereafter presented in the office of the Prothonotary and the office raised a contention that the plaint could not be accepted and filed in this Court unless proper court-fees had been paid to the office which payment would be made to the office on behalf of the State of Bombay. The only question for determination, therefore, is whether, even on the assumption that the amount of the court-fees paid by way of court-fee stamps to the Delhi Court was the proper amount, such payment is a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the Court-fees Act, 1870. As this point concerned the revenues of the State of Bombay, I desired that notice should be given to the State of Bombay. Such notice has been given and the Advocate General has appeared and argued on behalf of the State of Bombay and Miss Shamdasani has appeared and argued on behalf of the plaintiffs.

The relevant provisions are contained in the Court-fees Act, 1870. Section 6 provides:

"No document of any of the kinds specified as chargeable in the first or second schedule to this Act annexed shall be filed, exhibited or recorded in any Court of Justice, . . . unless in respect of such document there has been paid a fee of an amount not less than that indicated by either of the said schedules as the proper fee for such document".

It cannot be disputed that a proper court-fee has to be paid in respect of this plaint which is sought to be filed in this Court. The only question is as to what is the meaning when the said s. 6(1) provides that no document shall be filed unless in respect of such document a proper fee has been paid. The question is, paid to whom? Miss Shamdasani contended that there is but one Court-fees Act prevailing in the whole of India, and that once the proper amount of court-fee has been paid in a Court in any part of India, the requirement of the Court-fees Act has been complied with and no fresh court-fee is payable even if the plaint is presented in a Court in another State in India. On the other hand, the Advocate General contended that although the Court-fees Act, 1870, was originally an Act of the Central Government, the same must, since the Government of India Act, 1935, came into force, be deemed to have continued in operation as an Act of the various Provinces of India and later of the various States in India and that, therefore, court-fee is now payable to the State wherein the Court in which the plaint is sought to be filed is situated. He contends that, therefore, on this plaint which is now sought to be filed in this Court, court-fee must be paid into this Court on behalf of the State of Bombay before the same can be filed here.

Originally the Court-fees Act was an Act of the Central Government and, therefore, the court-fee was payable to the Central Government. If there was any provision in any Act which was in force before the Government of India Act, 1935, came into operation which required or authorised that court-fee should be paid otherwise than to the Central Government then of course court-fee could have been paid in accordance with the provisions of such Act. I am, however, not concerned with the position that prevailed before the Government of India Act, 1935, came into operation. The Government of India Act, 1935, or at least the provisions thereof which are material to this case came into operation in 1937 and it is sufficient for me to consider what was the position that ensued thereupon.

Section 292 of the Government of India Act, 1935, provided as follows:

"Notwithstanding the repeal by this Act of the Government of India Act, but subject to the other provisions of this Act, all the law in force in British India immediately before the commencement of Part III of this Act shall continue in force in British India until altered or repealed or amended by a competent Legislature or other competent authority."

The Court-fees Act, 1870, was a law in force in British India immediately before the commencement of Part III of the Government of India Act, 1935, and, therefore, by reason of the said provisions of the said s. 292 it continued to be in force in British India. Now, under the Government of India Act, 1935, legislation could be either of the Centre or of a Province and the question arises whether the Court-fees Act, which was originally a Central Act, continued to be in force under the provisions of the said s. 292 as a Central Act or was it to be deemed to have continued in force as a Provincial Act passed by the Provincial Legislatures of the respective Provinces.

Now, the said s. 292 provided that the existing legislation, which in this case was the Court-fees Act, was to continue in force in British India until altered or repealed or amended by a competent Legislature and, therefore, one must find out which was the competent Legislature which was entitled to so alter, repeal or amend the Court-fees Act. The relevant provision is contained in s. 100 of that Act. Under sub-s. (1) of the said s. 100 the Federal Legislature has been given the exclusive power to make laws with respect to any of the matters enumerated in List I in the Seventh Schedule to that Act and it has been made clear that in respect of those matters a Provincial Legislature has no such power. Sub-section (2) of that section provides that subject to the provisions of sub-s. (1) a Provincial Legislature also has power to make laws with respect to any of the matters enumerated in List III in the said Schedule and sub-s. (3) of that section provides that the Federal Legislature has not the power to make laws for a Province or any part thereof with respect to any of the matters enumerated in List II in the said Schedule. The appropriate item about court-fees was item No. 1 in List II in the Seventh Schedule and that item included fees to be taken in all Courts except the Federal Court. Therefore, the Legislature competent to legislate in connection with court-fees was a Provincial Legislature and not the Federal or Central Legislature because of the provisions of sub-s. (3) of s. 100. "Court-fees" was very clearly within the exclusive legislative powers of a Provincial Legislature after the coming into operation of the Government of India Act, 1935, and the Federal Legislature did not have any such power. It is quite clear that it was a Provincial Legislature alone which could alter, repeal or amend the Court-fees Act after the coming into operation of the Government of India Act, 1935. The provision as regards the powers of a competent Legislature to alter, repeal or amend an existing Act contained in s. 292 was considered by the Federal Court in The United Provinces v. Atiq Begum,¹ and it was held that s. 292 did not prevent the appropriate Legislature, which was in that case the Provincial Legislature, from giving even retrospective effect to legislation passed by it. Therefore, there are two significant facts to be observed about the effect of the Government of India Act, 1935, upon the Court-fees Act. The first is that since the enactment of the Government of India Act, 1935, as the subject of Court-fees fell within the said List II, the Provincial Legislatures alone had and the Central Legislature did not have the power to legislate in respect of court-fees, and the second is that the Provincial Legislature had the power to alter, repeal or amend the Court-fees Act, 1870, which included the power to do so with retrospective effect. It is, therefore, clear that although originally the Court-fees

Act was a Central Act, since the coming into operation of the Government of India Act, 1935, it ceased to have the essential characteristics of a central legislation and complete plenary powers of legislation, including the power to legislate retrospectively, with regard to Court-fees vested in the Provincial Legislatures. Therefore, since the date of the coming into operation of the Government of India Act, 1935, the Court-fees Act must be deemed to have continued to be in operation in the various Provinces of India as a Provincial Act passed by the appropriate Provincial Legislature and not as a Central Act because the Provincial Legislature alone had the power to legislate in respect of Court-fees.

The next position is the one arising under the Constitution of India after the same came into operation. So far as the question under consideration is concerned, art. 372(1) provides that notwithstanding the repeal by the Constitution of the Government of India Act, 1935, all the law in force in the territory of India immediately before the commencement of the Constitution shall continue in force therein until altered or repealed or amended by a competent Legislature or other competent authority. This provision in the said art. 372(1) is, for the purposes of the present consideration, identical with that of s. 292 of the Government of India Act, 1935, and the Court-fees Act which, because of the reasons already stated, must be deemed to have been a Provincial Act before the coming into operation of the Constitution has, because of the said provisions of art. 372, continued in force as Legislation passed by the appropriate State Legislatures. As the Court-fees Act cannot be deemed to have continuing as a Central Act when the Constitution came into operation it cannot, after the coming into operation of the Constitution, be considered to be an Act of the Union of India. What is more, under art. 246(3) the Legislature of a State has exclusive power to make laws for such State or any part thereof with respect to any of the matters enumerated in List II in the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution, and item No. 3 of the said List II includes fees taken in all Courts except the Supreme Court. The position, therefore, is the same as that under the Government of India Act, 1935, and it is the State Legislature alone which has the exclusive power to legislate in respect of court-fees payable in that particular State. Article 266 of the Constitution provides that all revenues received by the Government of a State, all loans raised by that Government by the issue of treasury bills, loans or ways and means advances and all moneys received by that Government in repayment of loans shall form one consolidated fund to be entitled "the Consolidated Fund of the State." It is clear, therefore, that court-fees in respect of which the State Government has the exclusive power to legislate under the Constitution would form part of the Consolidated Fund of the State which is to be deemed to have passed the Court-fees Act for that particular State and which levies and recovers the court-fees. It is, therefore, clear that the provision in s. 6 of the Court-fees Act about payment of court-fees must mean payment to the Government of the State within which State the particular Court in which the court-fee is payable is situated. That payment of court-fee is to be made to the appropriate State is also clear because of another reason. Since the coming into operation of the Government of India Act, the Provincial Legislatures, and since the coming into operation of the Constitution the State Legislatures have the power to alter and amend the Court-fees Act, 1870. The various Provinces or States may, in exercise of that power, increase or decrease the rates of court-fees as leviable within that province or State and the court-fee payable in respect of the same item may vary from province to province and State to State. In such a state of affairs, the adequacy of the amount of court-fee payable in a particular State must be judged in accordance with the Court-fees Act as amended and applicable in the particular State. Moreover, under the Court-fees Act, 1870, even without reading therein the amendments made by any of the Provinces or States, there are provisions for the refund of Court-fees paid, e.g. when a decree is obtained by consent of parties before issues are framed in the suit. Let me now consider what would be the effect if such a contingency were to arise in the present case. Court-fee has been paid in the Delhi Court, and if none was payable in Bombay and if occasion hereafter arises for refunding any part of the court-fee paid by the plaintiffs in this case, it would be this Court which would make the necessary order and thereupon how can the State of Bombay make any refund when the court-fee was initially paid not in Bombay but in Delhi? This again shows that the court-fee is payable to the State in whose territory the Court where the court-fee is payable is situated, and that the reason for the same is that the Court-fees Act is a legislation of that State and the revenue derived thereunder is to form part of the Consolidated Fund of that State.

Miss Shamdasani, the learned counsel for the plaintiffs, at one stage contended that court-fees do not fall within List II of the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution. She argued that undoubtedly court-fees in Courts other than the Supreme Court would fall under item No. 3 of List II. She pointed out that item No. 66 of the said List II provides for fees in respect of any of the matters in that List but excludes therefrom fees taken in any Court. Her argument was that the words "but not including fees taken in any Court" occurring in the said item No. 66 make court-fees an exception not only to the provision contained in the preceding part of the said item No. 66 but also to the provision about court-fees contained in the said item No. 3. In my opinion this is a clumsy way of correlating the said two items 66 and 3 in List II. The provisions of the said two articles are quite simple, clear and logical. Item No. 3 of List II specifically mentions "fees taken in all courts except the Supreme Court." The first part of item No. 66 reads "Fees in respect of any of the matters in this List" and is a general provision providing for fees in respect of the various matters mentioned in the various items in that List. Now, if item No. 66 merely mentioned "fees in respect of any of the matters in this List" it would have necessarily included fees in respect of matters mentioned in item No. 3. But item No. 3, unlike the various other items in that List, itself provides for fees taken in all Courts except the Supreme Court. Therefore, in order to avoid confusion and in order to avoid provision being made for fees taken in Courts at two places—one specifically under item No. 3 and the other generally under item No. 66—fees taken in Courts were specifically excepted from the general item being item No. 66 because the same had already been provided for specifically under item No. 3. Even on a simple reading of the said two items that appears to be the clear meaning and, therefore, there is no reason to read or construe the second part of item No. 66, as contended for by Miss Shamdasani.

Under the circumstances, I hold that before this plaint can be filed in this Court the plaintiffs are bound to pay the proper amount of court-fee in this Court on behalf of the State of Bombay.

Miss Shamdasani asks for some time being given to the plaintiffs for payment of the necessary court-fees here. I, therefore, direct that the plaintiffs may be given time to pay the necessary court-fees up to December 18, 1958.

CRIMINAL APPELLATE.

UMER SAHEB BURA SAHEB INAMDAR v. STATE.*

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Secs. 222(2), 234, 233, 537, 530—Charge framed contravening proviso to s. 222(2)—Whether such contravention cured by s. 537—Trial held on such charge whether vitiated.

A charge framed relating to criminal breach of trust or dishonest misappropriation of money and which covers a period exceeding one year between which the offence is alleged to have been committed and thereby contravenes the proviso to s. 222(2) of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, is an illegal charge and a trial held on such a charge is vitiated.

An infringement of a provision as to the manner of a trial cannot be cured by s. 537 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, but an infringement of a provision which prescribes even mandatorily a matter relating to the conduct of a trial can be cured by s. 537 of the Code, if there be no prejudice caused to the accused. The proviso to s. 222(2) of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, relates to the manner in which the trial is to be held, and if there is an infringement of its provisions, the infringement cannot be cured by s. 537 of the Code.

IN December 1941 a co-operative society was floated in the name of "The Nandurbar Agricultural Co-operative Purchases and Sales Union, Ltd.," which will be referred to hereafter as "the Society". The Society consisted of fifteen founder-members. These founder-members decided to adopt the model bye-laws contained in a leaflet issued by the Co-operative Department of the Government of Bombay. The Society was registered on February 9, 1942, with an authorised share capital of Rs. 25,000. The shares were of the face value of Rs. 5 each. For becoming a member of the Society, an agriculturist residing within the limits of the Nandurbar, Navapur and Taloda talukas had to purchase at least two shares, and a non-agriculturist could become a member by purchasing a minimum of five shares. The bye-laws provided that the affairs of the Society were to be conducted by a managing committee consisting of 11 persons, some of whom were to be elected and the remaining nominated. One of the members of the managing committee was a nominee of the Bombay Provincial Co-operative Bank Ltd. The Chairman of the managing committee was to be elected annually at its first meeting. The day-to-day administration of the Society was to be under the supervision of a "Shop Manager" to whom was given the assistance of other paid staff. The shop manager was responsible for the cash of the Society, and to write the account books and the minutes of proceedings of the managing committee and the general body meetings and also to remain in charge of the property belonging to and pledged with the Society. Regulations were framed concerning the granting of loans to the members of the Society and they were contained in bye-laws Nos. 48 and 49. Under bye-law No. 48 a loan not exceeding Rs. 50 could be advanced to a member for "crop finance" under certain conditions. Bye-law No. 49 permitted advances against the pledge of agricultural produce to agriculturistmembers of the Society not exceeding 70 per cent. of the market value of the produce specifically given in possession of the Society. The advances were not to be given for a period exceeding six months, and if the advances were not repaid within the period of six months, the shop manager had to take steps for recovery of the arrears. It was expressly provided by bye-law No. 49 that the loans were to be advanced only to agriculturist-members of the Society on the security of the agricultural produce which was to be given by them in the possession of the Society and that the loans were not to be advanced on the security of goods purchased by a member for doing business. If any loss was suffered in the recovery of loans advanced by the Society, the shop manager was personally responsible if he was found negligent.

Umer Saheb and Jayaram (accused Nos. 1 and 2) were the original founder-members of the Society. Accused No. 1 was a prominent resident of West Khandesh district and took an important part in the propagation of the Co-operative Movement in the district. For many years he was an Honorary District Organiser of the Co-operative Movement and also the Registrar's nominee. For some years he was the chairman of the advisory body of the Bombay State Co-operative Bank. He was also a forest contractor and took forest contracts in his own name. He was also engaged in the business of taking contracts from the Public Works Department. He and his sons were also interested in motor transport business. He became a founder-member of the Society by taking five shares in his name, and from the inception he was the Chairman of the managing committee and continued to remain so till March 20, 1949. Accused No. 2 was also a founder-member of the Society and held two shares. He was a member of the managing committee from its inception till August 20, 1952. He became the Chairman of the managing committee on April 14, 1949, and continued to remain so till he resigned that office on January 17, 1952. Accused No. 2 also was carrying on the business of a forest contractor. Ramrao (accused No. 3) was the shop manager of the Society between the years 1942 and 1945 and between July 1, 1948, and April 2, 1950. On April 2, 1950, he was relieved by the Society of his office as the shop manager, his resignation having been accepted on February 6, 1949. One Shreenath Devkrishna Tipari was the accountant and cashier working under accused No. 3; and on April 2, 1950, when accused No. 3 was relieved of his office as shop manager, Tipari was promoted to the office of shop manager. Sayyad (accused No. 4) was admitted to the membership of the Society in July 1945, when he purchased two shares. He was a forest contractor and a timber merchant, and was one of the three partners of a firm which carried on business in timber under the name and style of "Sayyad Hamid Hussein Mir Masud Alimiya and Company." Iqbal, son of accused No. 4, was interested in a motor transport undertaking. Even though accused No. 4 was personally a member of the Society, the firm of which he was a partner did not become a member of the Society.

Between March 6, 1949, and June 30, 1950, many advances were made to accused No. 4 which aggregated to Rs. 2,16,810. Out of this amount, Rs. 28,150 were advanced during the time when accused No. 1 was the chairman of the managing committee of the Society; Rs. 2,875 were advanced after accused No. 1 submitted his resignation of the office of Chairman but before accused No. 2 was elected Chairman; and the balance of Rs. 1,85,785 was advanced during the tenure of office of accused No. 2. Out of the amount of Rs. 2,16,810, Rs. 1,98,310 were advanced when accused No. 3 was the shop manager and the balance of Rs. 18,500 was advanced when Tipari was the shop manager.

The four accused were, on a complaint filed by the Co-operative Department of the State of Bombay, charged with having committed offences under ss. 120B, 406, 408, 467, 477A and 109 of the Indian Penal Code. It was the case for the prosecution that all the four accused in collaboration with Shreenath Tipari (who was granted pardon and examined as an approver at the trial) entered into a criminal conspiracy with the intention of defrauding the Society.

The object of the conspiracy, according to the prosecution, was to make wrongful and unauthorised use of the funds of the Society for the benefit of the partnership of which accused No. 4 was a partner and also to benefit the four accused dishonestly and wrongfully by creating an appearance that the funds were borrowed for the benefit of the partnership of accused No. 4. The advances, according to the prosecution, were made in violation of the law and in contravention of the bye-laws of the Society which prescribed the mode in which the funds of the Society were to be dealt with and advanced. According to the prosecution, the first three accused had dominion over and were entrusted with the funds of the Society at the relevant time, the first two accused in their capacity as Chairman and the third accused in his capacity as the shop manager of the Society, and when the three accused were so entrusted with and had dominion over the funds of the Society, advances were made by them from time to time to the firm of which accused No. 4 was a partner, and these advances were made in contravention of the bye-laws of the Society in that the partnership not being a member of the Society no advances could be made and the advances were made against security of property which did not in fact exist and in any event the advances were made on the security of timber contrary to the bye-laws. It was further the case for the prosecution that accused No. 4 executed promissory notes acknowledging receipt of the monies alleged to have been advanced to him, but the promissory notes were not executed by him at the time when the advances were made but on dates long after the advances and that some of the promissory notes even did not bear the signature of accused No. 4 for a long time, and all this was done because accused No. 1 was a relative of accused No. 4 and was intimately associated with him in the dealings and business of accused No. 4. It was again the case for the prosecution that some of the advances made by the Society to the firm of which accused No. 4 was a partner during the period between March 1949 and June 1950 were in fact made to the first three accused and not to accused No. 4, and these amounts were received by the first three accused and were utilised by them towards payment of instalments due under a forest contract taken by accused No. 1, for purchasing a house by accused No. 2 and for meeting the household expenses of the father of accused No. 3; and satisfaction in part of the outstanding amount under a hypothecation khata of the firm of accused No. 4 was made by the first three accused from out of their own funds either by tendering the amount in cash or by endorsing cheques in favour of the Society or by instructing adjustment entries in the account books. It was also the case for the prosecution that the first three accused had wilfully kept the members of the managing committee of the Society in the dark about the Society's dealings with the firm of accused No. 4, and in particular by not keeping the subject on the agenda of the meetings, by not offering opportunity to the members to discuss the same, by making interpolations in the proceedings book by making entries therein about the transactions subsequently and by misrepresenting that the timber of the firm of accused No. 4 was hypothecated with the Society. It was further the case for the prosecution that even though accused No. 1 had ostensibly retired from the membership and the chairmanship of the managing committee of the Society, he used to attend the meetings of the managing committee of the Society and take a prominent part in the conduct of the affairs of the Society, and he was looked upon by the members of the Society and the officers of the Bombay Provincial Co-operative Bank and of the Co-operative Department as representing the Society and also as a spokesman on behalf of the firm of which accused No. 4 was a partner. It was also the case for the prosecution that at the instance of the first two accused, accused No. 3 or Tipari had wilfully falsified the cash book of the Society on or about November 20, 1950, by falsely showing a credit of Rs. 8,000 in the hypothecation khata of the firm of accused No. 4 when no such amount was in fact received from the firm of accused No. 4, and that accused Nos. 1, 2 and 3 had forged or abetted the forging of two receipts, dated November 21, 1950, to show dishonestly a credit of Rs. 8,000 in the hypothecation khata of the firm of accused No. 4 with the object of covering up a fictitious transaction relating to the purchase of two motor trucks by the Society.

All the four accused denied having committed the offences charged against them. Accused No. 4 stated that he himself and for his own purposes borrowed the monies from the Society and that he was responsible for repayment of the same. Accused Nos. 1, 2 and 3 denied the charges of conspiracy and misappropriation of the funds of the Society and also of fabrication of the accounts and the receipts in respect of the amount of Rs. 8,000.

The Assistant Sessions Judge convicted all the four accused of the charges relating to conspiracy and criminal breach of trust. He, however, acquitted the accused in respect of the charges under ss. 477A and 467 of the Indian Penal Code. Against the order of conviction and sentence the present appeals were preferred to the High Court.

SHAH J. [His Lordship after stating the facts of the case, proceeded.] It is urged that the second head of the charge infringed the express provision contained in the proviso to s. 222(2) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and on that account the trial held before the Court of Session was illegal. Originally the charge related to a period between March 6, 1949, and March 31, 1951. It appears that the attention of the learned trial Judge was invited on June 2, 1958, to the fact that after June 30, 1950, no advances were made to accused No. 4 or to his firm and, therefore, the charge should have been restricted to a period between March 6, 1949, and June 30, 1950. The learned Judge then amended the charge by striking out the figures "31-3-1951" and substituting therefor the figures "30-6-1950" in the second head of the charge and proceeded with the trial. It appears that by that time a large number of witnesses were examined for the prosecution, but no objection was raised on behalf of the accused to the amendment of the charge because it was in substance a formal amendment. But it is urged that even after the amendment of the charge the period covered exceeded one year and that the charge therefore infringed s. 222 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Section 222(1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure provides that particulars as to time, place and person relating to the offence alleged are to be set out in the charge. By sub-s. (2) it is provided:

"When the accused is charged with criminal breach of trust or dishonest misappropriation of money, it shall be sufficient to specify the gross sum in respect of which the offence is alleged to have been committed, and the dates between which the offence is alleged to have been committed, without specifying particular items or exact dates, and the charge so framed shall be deemed to be a charge of one offence within the meaning of section 234:

Provided that the time included between the first and the last of such dates shall not exceed one year."

This provision was incorporated for the first time when the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, was enacted. Under the Code of 1882 there was no provision similar to sub-s. (2) of s. 222, and in cases where there was a charge of criminal misappropriation or criminal breach of trust it was necessary to frame a distinct charge in respect of each item of money misappropriated, and a charge specifying an aggregate sum alleged to have been misappropriated when the sum misappropriated consisted of separate items misappropriated on different occasions was held by some Courts to be illegal. The Legislature then intervened and enacted sub-s. (2) whereby a charge against an accused person for the offence of criminal breach of trust or dishonest misappropriation of money specifying the gross sum in respect of which the offence was alleged to have been committed, but not specifying the particular items or the exact dates on which the amounts were misappropriated fulfilled the requirements of s. 222(1). But the Legislature by the proviso to sub-s. (2) provided that the period between the first and the last dates shall not exceed one year. For the purpose of s. 234 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, a charge in respect of a gross sum is to be regarded as a charge of one offence. Section 234 by the first sub-section enables the Court to try a person accused of more offences than one of the same kind committed within the space of twelve months from the first to the last of such offences, where the offences do not exceed three in number. Evidently in this case the period for which the charge was framed originally by the learned Judge and even after it was amended covered a period exceeding one year, and prima facie the charge contravened s. 222(2) of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

In *Subrahmanya Ayyar v. King-Emperor*¹, their Lordships of the Privy Council held that an indictment which contravened the provisions of ss. 233 and 234 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and which did not fall within the provisions of s. 235(1) of the Code was bad and the trial held on such a charge was illegal. The Judicial Committee held that the trial Court having disregarded an express provision of law as to the mode of trial, it was not merely an irregularity such as could be remedied by s. 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and, therefore, the conviction should be set aside. In that case, there were 41 charges against the accused for extortion and bribery extending over a period of two years. This, the Lord Chancellor stated, was "...plainly in contravention of the Code of Criminal Procedure, section 234, which provided that a person may only be tried for three offences of the same kind if committed within a period of twelve months". (p. 96)

It was observed by their Lordships that the defect in the trial was not cured by s. 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Their Lordships observed (p. 97):

"Their Lordships are unable to regard the disobedience to an express provision as to a mode of trial as a mere irregularity. Such a phrase as irregularity is not appropriate to the illegality of trying an accused person for many different offences at the same time and those offences being spread over a longer period than by law could have been joined together in one indictment..."

The remedying of mere irregularities is familiar in most systems of jurisprudence but it would be an extraordinary extension of such a branch of administering the criminal law to say that when the Code positively enacts that such a trial as that which has taken place here shall not be permitted that this contravention of the Code comes within the description of error, omission, or irregularity."

This view was taken by their Lordships of the Privy Council on the terms of s. 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure before that section was amended by Act XXVI of 1955. As we will presently point out, the amendment has made no substantial difference except on one matter to which we will advert.

Under cl. (a) of s. 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, as it stood before the amendment by Act XXVI of 1955, no finding, sentence, or order passed by a Court of competent jurisdiction was liable to be reversed or altered under Chapter XXVII or on appeal or revision on account of any error, omission or irregularity in the complaint, summons, warrant, charge, proclamation, order, judgment or other proceedings before or during trial or in any inquiry or other proceedings under the Code. But their Lordships held that the disobedience of an express provision as to a mode of trial was not a mere irregularity but it amounted to an illegality in trying the case, and that a trial of an accused person in a manner contrary to an express provision made in the Code did not come within the description of error, omission or irregularity within the meaning of s. 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. In that case, it is evident that contrary to the provision of s. 234 of the Code there were as many as 41 charges and those 41 charges were spread over a period exceeding one year, and their Lordships held that the trial which contravened the provision of s. 234 was vitiated by an illegality and as the trial "was prohibited in the mode in which it was conducted" the conviction should be set aside. By parity of reasoning, in this case also it must be held that when the trial was prohibited in the mode in which it was conducted in the Court below, viz., by framing a charge in respect of a period exceeding one year, the conviction recorded at the trial must be set aside.

But the learned Government Pleader urged before us that since the judgment in Subrahmania Ayyar's case was delivered the Privy Council itself has taken a different view as to the true effect of the mandatory provisions contained in the Code of Criminal Procedure, and this Court may not be justified in extending the rule in Subrahmania Ayyar's case to cases not governed by s. 234 of the Code; and our attention was invited to two subsequent judgments of their Lordships of the Privy Council. In Abdul Rahman v. The King Emperor,² the contravention which was relied upon was the non-reading of depositions of witnesses, in the presence of the accused and his pleader. It was held by the High Court at Rangoon that the failure to read the depositions of the witnesses examined at the trial in the presence of the accused and his pleader amounted to an irregularity within the meaning of s. 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and that as no failure of justice was occasioned s. 537 saved the conviction from challenge. Their Lordships of the Privy Council observed in dealing with the question whether there was compliance with the terms of s. 360 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (p. 107):

"....it is dangerous in cases of criminal law to accept equivalents, and except in cases where reading over to the witness would be absurd, as, for example, with a stone deaf person, the provision should be complied with."

They then considered whether the non-compliance vitiated the trial. After a consideration of the case law and the statutory provisions, they observed that the bare fact of such an omission or irregularity as occurred in the case under appeal, unaccompanied by any probable suggestion of any failure of justice having been thereby occasioned, was not enough to warrant the quashing of a conviction, which in the view of the Judicial Committee may be supported by the curative provisions of ss. 535 and 537 of the Code. This case is evidently an authority for the proposition that a breach of every mandatory provision does not render the trial of an accused person illegal, however regrettable it may appear that the breach should have occurred.

These two cases were considered in a subsequent judgment reported in Pulukuri Kotayya v. King-Emperor.³ Sir John Beaumont in delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee observed (p. 75):

"...When a trial is conducted in a manner different from that prescribed by the Code (as in N. A. Subramania Iyer's case), the trial is bad, and no question of curing an irregularity arises; but if the trial is conducted substantially in the manner prescribed by the Code, but some irregularity occurs in the course of such conduct, the irregularity can be cured under s. 537, and none the less so because the irregularity involves, as must nearly always be the case, a breach of one or more of the very comprehensive provisions of the Code."

In that case there had been a breach of the proviso to s. 162 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, in that the accused were not supplied with copies of the statements of witnesses made before the police to enable the counsel for the accused to cross-examine the witnesses, and when the same were supplied at a late stage they were not of much use. It is clear from the judgment in Pulukuri Kotayya's case that there is a clear distinction between provisions which prescribe the manner of a trial and provisions which provide for the conduct of the trial. An infringement of a provision as to the manner of a trial cannot be cured by s. 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, but an infringement of a provision which prescribes even mandatorily a matter relating to the conduct of a trial can be cured by s. 537, if there be no prejudice caused to the accused. In the present case, it cannot be said that s. 222(2), proviso, relates merely to the conduct of the trial. In our judgment, it is one relating to the manner in which the trial is to be held, and when there is an infringement of a provision which prescribes the manner of the trial, such an infringement cannot be cured by s. 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and in so holding we are amply supported by Subrahmanya Iyer's case.

Our attention was invited by the learned Government Pleader to certain observations made by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in *Willie (William) Slaney v. State of M.P.*⁴ In that case the accused was convicted of an offence of murder. At the trial, the appellant Slaney and another person were charged under s. 302 read with s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code. The trial Court acquitted the co-accused and, therefore, against Slaney s. 34 could not be called in aid. But the Court of First instance holding that the appellant had inflicted the fatal blow and was, therefore, directly responsible for the murder of the victim, convicted him of the offence of murder, even though no charge was expressly framed in that behalf. It was held by the Supreme Court that an omission to frame a separate charge in the alternative under s. 302 simpliciter was "a curable irregularity" if no prejudice was caused to the accused by the omission. Interrupting the narrative of the case, it may be observed that on the evidence before the Court a charge under s. 302 read with s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code, and, in the alternative, under s. 302 of the Indian Penal Code, against the accused could by the terms of s. 236 of the Criminal Procedure Code have been framed. But the charge framed was only under s. 302 read with s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code against Slaney and his co-accused; and it was on those facts that the Supreme Court held that even though there was no alternative charge against the accused under s. 302 simpliciter, that was an irregularity which was curable, no prejudice being caused to the accused, by the omission to frame the alternative charge. Mr. Justice Bose, who delivered the principal judgment of the Court, observed after referring to the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Subrahmanya Iyer's case and Pulukuri Kotayya's case (p. 186):

"We prefer this way of stating the law, for the distinction that was once sought to be drawn between an express prohibition and an equally express provision positively stated strikes us as unreal. The real question is not whether a matter is expressed positively or is stated in negative terms but whether disregard of a particular provision amounts to substantial denial of a trial as contemplated by the Code and understood by the comprehensive expression 'natural justice'."

Referring to s. 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, Mr. Justice Bose observed that the true intent and purpose of s. 537(a) covered every proceeding taken with jurisdiction in the general phrase "or other proceedings under this Code", and it was for the Court in all such cases to determine whether there had been prejudice to the accused, and in doing so to bear in mind that some violations were so obviously opposed to natural justice and the true intentment of the Code that on the face of them and without anything else they must be struck down, while in other cases a closer examination of all the circumstances will be called for in order to discover whether the accused had been prejudiced. After entering upon a detailed analysis of the provisions of Chapter XLV of the Code and also the provisions relating to the framing of charges, Mr. Justice Bose observed (p. 194):

"...Broad vision is required, a nice balancing of rights of the State and the protection of society in general against protection from harassment to the individual and the risks of unjust conviction. Every reasonable presumption must be made in favour of an accused person; he must be given the benefit of every reasonable doubt. The same broad principles of justice and fair play must be brought to bear when determining a matter of prejudice as in adjudging guilt. But when all is said and done, what we are concerned to see is whether the accused had a fair trial, whether he knew what he was being tried for, whether the main facts sought to be established against him were explained to him fairly and clearly and whether he was given a full and fair chance to defend himself. If all these elements are there and no prejudice is shown the conviction must stand whatever the irregularities whether traceable to the charge or to a want of one."

His Lordship then held that in that case the conviction resulted in no prejudice to the accused, and on the evidence the conviction under s. 302 of the Indian Penal Code was justified. With that view, the learned acting Chief Justice agreed.

But Mr. Justice Chandrasekhara Iyer, with whom Mr. Justice Jagannadhas agreed, appeared to approach the case from a somewhat different angle. Their Lordships observed (p. 206):

"...The omission to frame a charge is a grave defect and should be vigilantly guarded against. In some cases, it may be so serious that by itself it would vitiate a trial and render it illegal, prejudice to the accused being taken for granted."

They then observed that (p. 206):

"...the provisions of section 535, [Criminal Procedure Code], would apply to cases of inadvertence to frame a charge induced by the belief that the matter on record is sufficient to warrant the conviction for a particular offence without express specification, and where the facts proved by the prosecution constitute a separate and distinct offence but closely relevant to and springing out of the same set of facts connected with the one charged."

Their Lordships then observed (p. 208):

"...lack of competency of jurisdiction, absence of a complaint by the proper person or authority specified, want of sanction prescribed as a condition precedent for a prosecution, in short, defects that strike at the very root of jurisdiction stand on a separate footing, and the proceedings taken in disregard or disobedience would be illegal. The difficulty arises only when we have to consider the other provisions in the Code which regulate procedure and which are found in a mandatory form, positive or negative. It is in this class of cases that the distinction becomes important and material."

After referring to the provisions relating to the framing of a charge and the power to alter or add to the charge, it was observed that where there was no charge, it was for the Court to determine whether there was any failure of justice, but where there was a mere error or omission in the charge, the Court was also bound to have regard to the fact whether the objection could and should have been raised at an earlier stage in the proceedings. On that view, Mr. Justice Chandrasekhara Aiyar held that failure to frame a charge per se was not fatal, even though it was a grave defect which should be vigilantly guarded against.

Mr. Justice Imam expressed the view that (p. 208):

"...a total absence of a charge from start to finish in a case where the law requires a charge to be framed, is a contravention of the provisions of the Code as to the mode of trial and a conviction of the accused of an offence in such a case is invalid and the question of prejudice does not arise.... On the other hand, there may be cases where failure to frame a charge affects the mode of trial or it is such a substantial contravention of the provisions of the Code relating to the framing of charges that prejudice may be inferred at once and the conviction which was prima facie invalid continued to be so."

His Lordship, however, observed that where the contravention of a provision of the Code was substantial the Court should not treat what was an invalid trial as a valid trial by resorting to the provision of s. 535 of the Code, on the assumption that there had been no failure of justice. It appears that Mr. Justice Imam was willing to accept the view which appealed to Mr. Justice Chandrasekhara Aiyar and Mr. Justice Jagannadhas.

The question which falls to be determined in these appeals is not the one which fell to be determined in William Slaney's case. That was a case in which even though on the evidence a charge could have been framed against the accused under s. 302 of the Indian Penal Code it was not so framed, and the prosecution proceeded to bring the accused to trial for an offence under s. 302 read with s. 84 of the Indian Penal Code, and the accused was ultimately convicted of the offence under s. 302. The Supreme Court held that no prejudice having resulted in consequence of the failure to frame an express charge under s. 302, Indian Penal Code, the trial was not vitiated. In the present case, however, we find that there has been a disregard of a mandatory provision in the Code of Criminal Procedure, which has been enacted with a view to avoid a possible hardship to the prosecution in being required to prosecute an accused person in respect of every individual misappropriation or criminal breach of trust. An exception has been engrafted by the Legislature upon what is supposed to be the normal rule: and, in our judgment, in order that the case may be brought within the exception, all the requirements prescribed by the Legislature to attract the exception should be strictly complied with. It will not be sufficient to say that there may not have been prejudice caused to the accused even if the requirements of the various components which go to make the exception effective have not been strictly complied with. In Subrahmanya Iyer's case the Privy Council held that failure strictly to comply with the terms of s. 234 of the Code of Criminal Procedure was not an error or omission or irregularity within the meaning of s. 537 of the Code; and if that view be correct, it is impossible to hold that a charge which is framed in flagrant violation of the terms of sub-s. (2) of s. 222 of the Code can still be regarded as resulting in a mere error, omission or irregularity.

The learned Government Pleader invited our attention to two other cases, one of the Bombay High Court and the other of the Allahabad High Court, in support of the contention that not every infringement of a mandatory provision of the Code of Criminal Procedure may vitiate a trial irrespective of the question whether there has been failure of justice occasioned thereby. These two cases are *Emperor v. Nurmahomed Kadarbhai*⁵ and *Emperor v. Munshi Lal*⁶. In Nurmahomed's case, the trial Court had used statements recorded by the investigating officer in a manner not justified by s. 162 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and it was held by a division bench of this Court that the procedure merely resulted in an irregularity which had not occasioned a failure of justice and that irregularity was cured by s. 537 of the Code. It may at once be observed that the use of statements recorded under s. 162 of the Code of Criminal Procedure was (before the amendment of the Code) prohibited, except at the instance of the defence. But if contrary to the terms of s. 162 of the Code of Criminal Procedure evidence is brought on the record which is inadmissible, the Court is always entitled to ignore that evidence and to decide the case on the evidence which is admissible. Admission of evidence which in law is inadmissible does not affect the validity of the trial: it is not an infringement of a law which lays down the manner of a trial. Nurmahomed's case, therefore, does not justify the contention that every infringement of a mandatory provision contained in the Code of Criminal Procedure, especially a provision enacted in the form in which the proviso to s. 222(2) has been enacted, may be regarded as an irregularity which may be rectified by the provision of s. 537 of the Code.

In Munshi Lal's case, a trial which should have been held by the Magistrate as a summary trial was held in the manner of a regular trial. Under the Hoarding and Profiteering Prevention Ordinance, the trial of the accused who was arraigned for breach of that Ordinance, had to take place in the manner of a summary trial unless otherwise ordered by the District Magistrate, but the accused did not raise any objection at the trial as to the form in which the evidence was recorded and it was held that the irregularity was cured by s. 537 of the Code. The only substantial difference between the procedure followed in a summary trial and the procedure followed in the case of an ordinary warrant trial is that in the former case the Magistrate is not obliged to maintain any record of the evidence, whereas in a regular trial he has to maintain a complete record of the evidence led before him. That, again, does not affect the manner of a trial prescribed by the Code. If in a summary trial the Magistrate for reasons of his own maintains a full and detailed record, he does not thereby act irregularly or illegally. It would then be difficult to hold that there was even an irregularity committed by the Court in maintaining a full record of the evidence when it was not bound to do so. We are, therefore, unable to hold that the principle of the case in Emperor v. Munshi Lal has any application to the facts of the present case.

Chapter XIX of the Code of Criminal Procedure deals with the form of charges and the joinder of charges. The charge in a criminal case where the statute prescribes that a charge "shall be framed" is the very foundation of the trial. It is true that a mere error or omission or irregularity in a charge, in the absence of any prejudice to the accused arising out of the error, omission or irregularity, may not justify a Court of appeal in setting aside the conviction otherwise duly recorded. But it cannot be said that every infringement of the provisions contained in Chapter XIX of the Code which are mandatorily framed amounts to an error, omission or irregularity within the meaning of s. 537. In s. 234 of the Code, which is an exception to s. 233, it is enacted that a person who is accused of more offences than one of the same kind committed within the space of twelve months may be charged with and tried at one trial; provided the number of offences does not exceed three. Even though in terms s. 222 is not made an exception to s. 233, by the incorporation of s. 234 in sub-s. (2) of s. 222 it must substantially be regarded as an exception to s. 233; and if a charge which contravenes s. 234 of the Code be regarded as illegal and the trial on such a charge is vitiated we fail to see any reason for holding that a contravention of the provisions of s. 222(2) is rectified by the curative provisions of s. 537.

Our attention was invited by the learned Government Pleader to the amendment which has been made in s. 537 of the Code by Act XXVI of 1955. It was urged that the earlier authorities must be regarded as superseded by the amendment made in s. 537. Under cl. (a) of s. 537 as it stood before the amendment, by reason of an error, omission or irregularity inter alia in a charge, a judgment of a Court of a competent jurisdiction was not liable to be reversed or altered in appeal or revision. By Act XXVI of 1955, the word "charge" was deleted from cl. (a) of s. 537 and a new cl. (b) was enacted as follows:

"(b) of any error, omission or irregularity in the charge, including any misjoinder of charges."

In substance, by the amendment it is provided that a misjoinder of charges is to be regarded merely as an irregularity and not an illegality. To that extent, the cases decided before the amendment may be regarded as superseded. But where a trial has been held on a charge which is vitiated not on account of misjoinder, but on the score of failure to comply with an express direction concerning the manner of holding the trial, the provisions of s. 537 will not be attracted thereto.

The learned Government Pleader also urges before us that s. 529 sets out the irregularities which do not vitiate the proceedings and s. 530 sets out the irregularities which vitiate the proceedings, and that it is not provided in s. 530 that an infringement of s. 222 (2) vitiates the proceedings in which it occurs. The learned Government Pleader, therefore, urges that the Legislature having failed expressly to provide that an infringement of the provisions of s. 222(2) is an irregularity which vitiates the proceeding, the Court would not be justified in holding that it has that effect. But a contravention of s. 234 of the Code is not one of the contraventions referred to in s. 530, and it was still held by the Privy Council that the contravention vitiated the trial. We are, therefore, unable to accept the argument of the learned Government Pleader based on s. 530 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

It was also urged by the learned Government Pleader that the trial for the offence of conspiracy was severable from the trial for the offences under ss. 406 and 408 of the Indian Penal Code, and, therefore, this Court, notwithstanding the illegality committed in the trial for the offences under ss. 406 and 408 of the Indian Penal Code, can still maintain the conviction of the accused for the offence of conspiracy under s. 120B of the Indian Penal Code. We are again unable to accept that contention. The accused have been tried on a composite charge, and the charge of criminal conspiracy and the charge of criminal breach of trust are so inextricably connected with each other that it is impossible to separate the trial and hold that the trial in so far as the offence under s. 120B of the Indian Penal Code is concerned is not vitiated even though the trial for the offences under ss. 406 and 408 of the Indian Penal Code is vitiated.

[The rest of the judgment is not material to this report.]

Order of conviction set aside.

WAMAN SHRINIWAS KINI v. RATILAL BHAGWANDAS & CO.*

Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act (Bom. LVII of 1947), Secs. 15, 13(1)(e)—Indian Contract Act (IX of 1872), Sec. 23—Agreement between landlord and tenant permitting tenant to sub-let premises—Enforceability of such agreement—Waiver—Agreement to waive an illegality—Whether such agreement enforceable.

Section 15 of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, expressly prohibits subletting and, therefore, a contract to the contrary cannot neutralise its prohibitory effect. Therefore, an agreement between a tenant and his landlord whereby the tenant was permitted to sub-let the premises is void under s. 15 of the Act and s. 23 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, and is unenforceable.

The non-obstante clause in s. 15 of the Act means that even if any other law allowed subletting, e.g. s. 106 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, the subletting would, because of s. 15, be unlawful. This would apply to contracts also as all contracts would fall under the provisions of the law relating to contracts i.e. the Indian Contract Act.

P. D. Aswani v. Kavashah Dinshah and Cooper v. Shrivastav Cambata,* referred to.

An agreement to waive an illegality is void on grounds of public policy and is unenforceable.

KAPUR J. This is an appeal by special leave against the judgment of the High Court of Bombay confirming the order of ejectment passed by the Assistant Judge, Thana. The tenant who was the defendant in the suit is the appellant and the landlord who was the plaintiff is the respondent.

The facts giving rise to this litigation shortly stated are that the appellant was a tenant for about 20 years in the premises known as "Fida Ali Villa" in Kalyan. This building was purchased by the respondent who gave notice to the appellant to vacate, as he wanted to construct a new building on the site of the old building. The appellant agreed to vacate and the respondent let to him a portion of his new building which was not far from "Fida Ali Villa". The appellant had four sub-tenants, three of them also shifted to the new premises which were let to the appellant by the respondent. Although it was disputed, the Courts below have found that they occupied the same position qua the appellant. The fourth, a Bohri, was fixed up by the respondent in some other place. There was some dispute as to the date when these new premises were let to the appellant, the appellant alleging that they were let on July 1, 1948, and the respondent that they were let on June 1, 1948. The trial Court found that they were let on June 1, 1948. The terms of the lease are contained in a document dated June 7, 1948, which is a letter in Marathi written by the respondent to the appellant and contains the following term as to sub-tenancy:

"In the shops in the old chawl which are with you you have kept sub-tenants. We are permitting you to keep sub-tenants in the same manner, in this place also."

The parties were not agreed as to the correctness of the translation of this term. The submission of the appellant was that the word 'sub-tenant' should be in the plural and of the respondent that it should be in the singular, but whether it is in the singular or plural it does not make any difference to the principal argument advanced in this Court. On January 3, 1949, the respondent gave notice to the defendant to vacate the premises on the ground of non-payment of rent and sub-letting which it was alleged had resulted in the termination of the tenancy.

On April 20, 1949, the respondent brought a suit for ejectment on the ground of non-payment of rent and sub-letting of the premises. The defence of the appellant was that under the terms of the lease he had the right to sub-let the premises. As to the claim on the ground of non-payment of rent he deposited the arrears of rent in Court. The trial Court held that sub-letting was lawful in spite of s. 15 of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947 (Bom. LVII of 1947). He also held that the appellant did not occupy the premises on the same terms and conditions on which he occupied the old premises in "Fida Ali Villa". He passed a decree for Rs. 445 on account of rent remaining due and dismissed the respondent's suit for ejectment. On appeal the Assistant Judge at Thana reversed the decree holding that s. 15 of the Act completely prohibited sub-letting and under s. 13(1)(e) of the Act the landlord had the right to evict the tenant on account of sub-letting. The appellant then went in revision to the High Court of Bombay, but it affirmed the order of ejectment. The appellant has come to this Court by special leave.

Counsel for the appellant urged that there was no new tenancy after the coming into force of the Act and therefore ss. 13(1)(e) and 15 of the Act did not apply; (2) that the tenant had not sub-let the premises to the sub-tenants and they were merely licensees of the landlord; (3) that no new sub-tenancy had been created; (4) that s. 15 was confined to 'any other law'; it did not apply to contracts between the landlord and tenant and, therefore, it did not preclude an agreement between the parties as to sub-letting; (5) that the parties were in pari delicto and, therefore, the plaintiff-respondent could not succeed. He also raised a new ground which had not been raised in the Courts below or in the grounds of appeal or in the statement of case in this Court; that the respondent had waived his right in regard to the prohibition against sub-tenancy and the provision in s. 13(1)(c) was for the protection of his rights which he was entitled to waive.

The Courts below have held that the tenancy by the letter of June 7, 1948, was a new tenancy and not a continuation of the old and that the sub-tenants were tenants of the appellant and not licensees of the respondent and in this Court no serious argument was addressed on these points. The previous tenancy was of a different building called 'Fida Ali Villa' which came to an end when the appellant vacated those premises and entered into a new agreement of lease in regard to the premises in dispute. There was no privity between the respondent and the sub-tenants of the appellant and they could not be termed his licensees. These contentions are without substance and have rightly been rejected.

It was then argued that under s. 15 of the Act there is no prohibition against a contract of subletting, the non-obstante clause being confined to other laws. The section when quoted runs as follows:—

"Notwithstanding anything contained in any law, it shall not be lawful after the coming into operation of this Act for any tenant to sub-let the whole or any part of the premises let to him or to assign or transfer in any other manner his interest therein:

Provided that the (State) Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, permit in any area the transfer of interest in premises held under such leases or class of leases and to such extent as may be specified in the notification."

This section prohibits sub-letting and makes it unlawful for a tenant to assign or to transfer his interest in the premises let to him. The non-obstante clause would mean that even if any other law allowed subletting, e.g. s. 108 of the Transfer of Property Act the subletting would, because of s. 15, be unlawful. This would apply to contracts also as all contracts would fall under the provisions of the law relating to contracts i.e. Contract Act. An agreement contrary to the provisions of that section (s. 15) would be unenforceable as being in contravention of the express provision of the Act which prohibits it. It is not permissible to any person to rely upon a contract the making of which the law prohibits. (s. 23 of the Contract Act).

Counsel for the appellant contended that the view of the Bombay High Court in *P. D. Arwani v. Kavashah Dinshah*¹ was erroneous and that the correct rule was laid down by that Court in *Cooper v. Shiavax Cambata*². That was a case under s. 10 of Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates (Control) Act (Bom. VII of 1944) which in express terms allowed subletting as follows:—

"Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in any law for the time being in force, a tenant may sub-let any portion of his premises to a sub-tenant, provided he forthwith intimates in writing to his landlord the fact of his having so sub-let the premises and also the rent at which they have been sub-let."

It was contended that the non-obstante clause in s. 10 of Act VII of 1944 and of s. 15 of the Act being similar in language must be similarly interpreted. The non-obstante clause has to be read in conjunction with the rest of the section. Section 10 of the Act of 1944 permitted subletting on certain conditions. By s. 9 of that Act provision was made for a contract between the landlord and the tenant prohibiting subletting and in Cooper v. Shiavax Cambata the two provisions were reconciled by saying that a contract under s. 9 prevailed over the permission given by s. 10. But s. 15 expressly prohibits subletting and, therefore, a contract to the contrary cannot neutralise its prohibitory effect. The non-obstante clause of the two sections, s. 10 of the Act of 1944 and of s. 15 of the Act, therefore, cannot be said to have the same effect.

The respondent's suit for ejectment was brought under s. 13(1)(c) which provides:

"Notwithstanding anything contained in this Act (but subject to the provisions of section 15), a landlord shall be entitled to recover possession of any premises if the Court is satisfied...

(e) that the tenant has, since the coming into operation of this Act, sub-let the whole or part of the premises or assigned or transferred in any other manner his interest therein;..."

It was contended that s. 13(1)(e) had to be read separately and not in conjunction with s. 15 of the Act. The section itself makes it quite clear that it is subject to the provision of s. 15 and the two sections must, therefore, be read together. The appellant pleaded that under the agreement between him and the respondent he was entitled to sublet the premises. Such an agreement, in our opinion, is void because of the provisions of s. 15 of the Act and s. 23 of the Contract Act and enforcement of the agreement would produce the very result which the law seeks to guard against and to prevent, and by sustaining the plea of the appellant the Court would be enforcing an agreement which is prohibited and made illegal.

The appellant relied on the maxim in pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis to support his plea that the respondent could not enforce his right under s. 13(1)(e). But this maxim "must not be understood as meaning that where a transaction is vitiated by illegality the person left in possession of goods after its completion is always and of necessity entitled to keep them. Its true meaning is that, where the circumstances are such that the Court will refuse to assist either party, the consequence must, in fact, follow that the party in possession will not be disturbed". (Per Du Pareq L. J. in *Bowmakers, Ltd. v. Barnett Instruments, Ltd.*³) The respondent in the present case did not call upon the Court to enforce any agreement at all. When the instrument of lease was executed and possession given and subletting done it received its full effect; no aid of the Court was required to enforce it. The respondent's suit for ejectment was not brought for the enforcement of the agreement which recognised subletting but he asked the Court to enforce the right of eviction which flows directly from an infraction of a provision of the Act (s. 15) and for which the Act itself provides a remedy. There is thus a manifest distinction between this case where the plaintiff asked the Court to afford him a remedy against one who by contravening s. 15 of the Act has made himself liable to eviction and those cases where the Court was called upon to assist the plaintiff in enforcing an agreement the object of which was to do an illegal act. The respondent is only seeking to enforce his rights under the statute and the appellant cannot be permitted to assert in a Court of justice any right founded upon or growing out of an illegal transaction. Gibbs and Sterrett Mfg. Co. v. Brucker.⁴ In our opinion, s. 15 of the Act is based on public policy and it has been held that if public policy demands it even an equal participant in the illegality is allowed relief by way of restitution or rescission, though not on the contract.

It was next contended that s. 13(1)(e) is a provision for the protection of private rights of the landlord, and unless there is in the Act itself any provision to the contrary, such rights as far as they were personal rights may be parted with or renounced by the landlord. In other words, the right of the respondent to sue for ejectment on the ground of subletting being a personal right for his benefit, the landlord must be taken to have waived it as by an express contract he had allowed the tenant to sublet and, consequently, he could not evict the appellant under s. 13(1)(e) of the Act.

The plea of waiver was taken for the first time in this Court in arguments. Waiver is not a pure question of law but it is a mixed question of law and fact. This plea was neither raised nor considered by the Courts below and, therefore, ought not to be allowed to be taken at this stage of the proceedings. But it was argued on behalf of the appellant that according to the law of India the duty of a pleader is to set up the facts upon which he relied and not any legal inference to be drawn from them, and as he had set up all the circumstances from which the plea of waiver could be inferred, he should be allowed to raise and argue it at this stage even though it had not been raised at any previous stage not even in the statement of case filed in this Court and he relied upon Gouri Dutt Firm v. Madho Prasad.⁵ Assuming that to be so and proceeding on the facts found in this case, the plea of waiver cannot be raised because as a result of giving effect to that plea the Court would be enforcing an illegal agreement and thus contravene the statutory provisions of s. 15 based on public policy and produce the very result which the statute prohibits and makes illegal. In Surajmull Nargoremull v. Triton Insurance Co.,⁶ Lord Sumner said:—

"...No Court can enforce as valid that which competent enactments have declared shall not be valid, nor is obedience to such an enactment a thing from which a Court can be dispensed by the consent of the parties, or by a failure to plead or to argue the point at the outset: Nixon v. Albion Marine Insurance Co.' The enactment is prohibitory. It is not confined to affording a party a protection, of which he may avail himself or not as he pleases. It is not framed solely for the protection of the revenue and to be enforced solely at the instance of the revenue officials, nor is the prohibition limited to cases for which a penalty is exigible."

In the instant case the question is not merely of waiver of statutory rights enacted for the benefit of an individual but whether the Court would aid the appellant in enforcing a term of the agreement which s. 15 of the Act declares to be illegal. By enforcing the contract the consequence will be the enforcement of an illegality and infraction of a statutory provision which cannot be condoned by any conduct or agreement of parties. Dhanukdhari Singh v. Nathima Sahu.⁸ In Corpus Juris Secundum, Vol. 92, at p. 1068 the law as to waiver is stated as follows:—

"...a waiver in derogation of a statutory right is not favoured, and a waiver will be inoperative and void if it infringes on the rights of others, or would be against public policy or morals;..."

In Bowmakers, Ltd. v. Barnet Instruments, Ltd. the same rule was laid down. Mulla in his Contract Act at p. 198 has stated the law as to waiver of an illegality as follows:—

"Agreements which seek to waive an illegality are void on grounds of public policy. 'Whenever an illegality appears, whether from the evidence given by one side or the other, the disclosure is fatal to the case. A stipulation of the strongest form to waive the objection would be tainted with the vice of the original contract and void for the same reasons. Wherever the contamination reaches, it destroys'."

This, in our opinion, is a correct statement of the law and is supported by high authority. Field J. in *Oscanyan v. W. R. Arms Co.*⁹ quoted with approval the observation of Swayne J. in *Hall v. Coppell*¹⁰:—

"...The principle is indispensable to the purity of its administration. It will not enforce what it has forbidden and denounced. The maxim Ex dolo malo non oritur actio, is limited by no such qualification. The proposition to the contrary strikes us as hardly worthy of serious refutation. Whenever the illegality appears, whether the evidence comes from one side or the other, the disclosure is fatal to the case. No consent of the defendant can neutralize its effect. A stipulation in the most solemn form to waive the objection, would be tainted with the vice of the original contract, and void for the same reasons. Wherever the contamination reaches, it destroys."

Waiver is the abandonment of a right which normally everybody is at liberty to waive. A waiver is nothing unless it amounts to a release. It signifies nothing more than an intention not to insist upon the right. It may be deduced from acquiescence or may be implied. Chitty on Contract 21st edn., p. 381: Stackhouse v. Barnston.¹¹ But an agreement to waive an illegality is void on grounds of public policy and would be unenforceable.

In *Fairtitle v. Gilbert*¹² Ashurst J., said (p. 93):—

"Besides, there is still further reason why the trustees should not be estopped; for this is a public Act of Parliament, and the Courts are bound to take notice that the trustees under this Act had no power to mortgage the toll-houses. This deed therefore cannot operate in direct opposition to an Act of Parliament, which negatives the estoppel."

Vaughan Williams L. J., in *Norwich Corporation v. Norwich Electric Tramways Company, Limited*¹³ said:—

"The case is not like that of a provision in an agreement which is for the benefit of one of the parties and which he may waive. This is a provision in an Act of Parliament, which, though to some extent it may be for the benefit of the parties to the difference, must be regarded as inserted in the interest of the public also."

In that case there was a provision made by the Legislature that disputes mentioned in the section of the Act were to be determined by an Expert nominated by the Board of Trade and it was contended that though not in the strict technical sense estoppel, it was a waiver of the provisions introduced into the statute for the benefit of private rights. No doubt that was a case which proceeded on a question of jurisdiction, but the judgment proceeded on the principle of waiver of a statutory provision inserted in public interest. Thus the plea of waiver is unsustainable.

In our opinion, therefore, the judgment of the High Court is sound and the appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Before Mr. Justice Gokhale and Mr. Justice Mody.

SASTRI YAGNAPURUSHDASJI v. MULIDAS BHUDRADAS VAISHYA.*

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), Secs. 110, 109—Constitution of India, Art. 133(1)—Amount or value of subject-matter in dispute in Court of first instance less than twenty thousand rupees—Judgment and decree of High Court, on appeal, involving directly or indirectly claim or question respecting property of value of twenty thousand rupees or upwards—Whether party entitled to certificate under art. 133(1)(b).

Under s. 110 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, read with art. 133(1) of the Constitution of India, a party would be entitled to a certificate under art. 133(1)(b) of the Constitution provided his case falls under that clause even though the amount or value of the subject-matter in dispute in the Court of first instance is less than twenty thousand rupees.

Govindbhai v. Dahyabhai,¹ *Subramania Ayyar v. Sellamma*² and Amarsingh v. Karnail Kaur,³ referred to.

The facts appear in the judgment.

GOKHALE J. This is an application by original plaintiffs Nos. 1, 2, 4 and 5 for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court against the decision of this Court in *State of B'bay v. The suit was filed for a declaration inter alia that the Swaminarayan Temple of Shree Nar Narayan Dev at Ahmedabad and all the temples subordinate thereto were not temples within the meaning of the Bombay Harijan Temple Entry Act, 1947 (Bom. Act. XXXV of 1947) as amended by Bombay Act LXXVII of 1948, and to restrain defendant No. 1 and other non-Satsangi Harijans from entering the said temples. The trial Court had granted the said declaration and injunction, and against that decision the State of Bombay as well as original defendant No. 1 had filed First Appeal No. 107 of 1952. When the appeal was heard by this Court on March 8, 1957, the appeal, so far as it was filed by the State of Bombay, came to be dismissed, and by a further order dated March 25, 1957, there was a remand to the trial Court to record a finding whether the Swaminarayan Temple at Ahmedabad and the temples subordinate thereto were Hindu religious institutions within the meaning of art. 25(2)(b) of the Constitution. The trial Court returned an affirmative finding on this issue and the appeal was then argued on the merits. Two points were raised on behalf of the appellants in the appeal: (1) that the Swaminarayan Sampraday was a religion different from the Hindu religion, and (2) even assuming that the followers of the Sampraday were Hindus by religion and the suit temples were Hindu religious institutions, within the meaning of the Bombay Hindu Places of Public Worship (Entry Authorisation) Act, 1956, which repealed the Bombay Harijan Temple Entry Act, 1947, that Act would be ultra vires art. 25(1) of the Constitution of India and, therefore, plaintiffs would be entitled to the reliefs claimed by them. These contentions were negatived and the appeal was allowed; the decree of the trial Court was set aside and the plaintiffs' suit was dismissed with costs throughout. That is why the petitioners have filed this application for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court.

On behalf of the petitioners it is prayed that the Court should grant them leave both under art. 133(1)(b) as well as (c) of the Constitution of India, in that the judgment and decree of this Court involve directly or indirectly some claim or question respecting property of the value of twenty thousand rupees or upwards and also that the case is a fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court.

On behalf of the opponents, on the other hand, it was contended, in the first instance, that the petition for leave to appeal was very vague and was not properly worded so as to cover grant of leave under art. 133(1)(b). As against this, it was argued on behalf of the petitioners that the claim for such a certificate would be covered by sub-para. (18) to para. 18 of the petition as well as para. 20(a) of the petition. Under sub-para. (18) to para. 18 of the petition it is stated:-

"That the amount of the value of the subject-matter of the dispute in the Court of the first instance and still in dispute on appeal was and is less than 20,000 rupees and the judgment and decree involve directly or indirectly claim or question respecting property of the value of over Rs. 20,000 and that the case is a fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court. The learned Judges in appeal have reversed the judgment and decree of the trial Court and (the Court) should be pleased to give the leave on that ground also."

Paragraph 20(a) states:

"That your Lordships' petitioners therefore pray that your Lordships be pleased to grant them leave to appeal to the Supreme Court."

It is undoubtedly true that the petition is not happily worded and we allowed the petitioners to clarify the petition and correct clerical mistakes therein which they have done by filing an affidavit dated January 23, 1959. It was faintly contended on behalf of the opponents that without an application for amendment of the petition itself this clarification should not be allowed. But in view of the fact that the wording of sub-para. (18) of para. 18 of the petition would cover a prayer for a certificate under art. 133(1)(b) of the Constitution, we have allowed the petitioners to make the necessary clarification and corrections by means of an affidavit.

Then it was further contended that the petitioners would not be entitled to get leave under art. 133(1)(b) of the Constitution because the case does not satisfy the requirements of s. 110 of the Civil Procedure Code. It is pointed out that the plaintiffs had originally valued their claim in the plaint at Rs. 5,250 and in the First Appeal also the said valuation was retained both for the purposes of Court-fees as well as advocate's fees. It is not disputed even by the appellants, as is clear from sub-para. (18) of para. 18 of the petition, that the amount or value of the subject-matter of the dispute in the Court of first instance and in the First Appeal was less than Rs. 20,000. Mr. A. D. Desai argues that if that be so, the requirements of para. 2 of s. 110 of the Civil Procedure Code will not be satisfied. Now, s. 110 of the Civil Procedure Code reads as follows:—

"In each of the cases mentioned in clauses (a) and (b) of section 109, the amount or value of the subject-matter of the suit in the Court of first instance must be twenty thousand rupees or upwards, and the amount or value of the subject-matter in dispute on appeal to the Supreme Court must be the same sum or upwards, or the judgment, decree or final order must involve directly or indirectly, some claim or question to or respecting property of like amount or value, and where the judgment, decree or final order appealed from affirms the decision of the Court immediately below the Court passing such decree or final order, the appeal must involve some substantial question of law."

In the present case, this Court has allowed the appeal and set aside the decree of the trial Court and, therefore, para. 3 of s. 110 would not apply. But Mr. A. D. Desai contends that para. 2 of s. 110 cannot be read independently of the first part of para. 1 of s. 110; and Mr. Desai's contention is that even in the case of para. 2 of s. 110 the condition that the amount or value of the subject-matter in dispute in the Court of first instance must be Rs. 20,000 or upwards must be satisfied. In support of his argument, he has referred us to the case of *Govindbhai v. Dahyabhai*² where Mr. Justice Broomfield expressed his agreement with the view of the Madras High Court in *Subramania Ayyar v. Selammal*³ where it was held that the second para. of s. 110 applied only to cases which involved some claim or question to or respecting property, additional to or other than the actual subject-matter in dispute in appeal and to be taken into account therewith in making up the appealable value. Now, it has to be observed, in the first instance, that in the Bombay case the plaintiffs had claimed a declaration respecting certain property and it was observed by Mr. Justice Broomfield that the declaration could only be valued on a notional basis and the plaintiff was not estopped nor barred from saying that the value of the subject-matter of the suit and appeal was Rs. 10,000 or over within the meaning of s. 110 as it stood then, and therefore the plaintiff was held entitled to a certificate to appeal to the Privy Council under s. 110, para. 1, of the Civil Procedure Code. Secondly, since the enactment of the Constitution of India, both s. 109 and s. 110 of the Civil Procedure Code have been amended and the first para. of s. 109 states that an appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court under cls. (a), (b) and (c) of that section, subject to the provisions in Chapter IV of Part V of the Constitution and such rules as may, from time to time, be made by the Supreme Court regarding appeals from the Courts of India. It is clear, therefore, that s. 110 which refers to cls. (a) and (b) of s. 109 must be read subject to the provisions in Chapter IV of Part V of the Constitution. Now, art. 133(1) of the Constitution which is in Chapter IV of Part V reads as follows:—

"(1) An appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court from any judgment, decree or final order in a civil proceeding of a High Court in the territory of India if the High Court certifies—

(a) that the amount or value of the subject-matter of the dispute in the Court of first instance and still in dispute on appeal was and is not less than twenty thousand rupees or such other sum as may be specified in that behalf by Parliament by law; or

(b) that the judgment, decree or final order involves directly or indirectly some claim or question respecting property of the like amount or value; or

(c) that the case is a fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court; and, where the judgment, decree or final order appealed from affirms the decision of the Court immediately below in any case other than a case referred to in sub-clause (c), if the High Court further certifies that the appeal involves some substantial question of law."

Now, the wording of the three clauses of art. 133(1) would indicate that these are independent and self-contained clauses. Each of these clauses starts with the conjunction "that" and cls. (a) and (b) end with the conjunction "or" which would be indicative of their independence inter se. Clause (b) of art. 133(1), which corresponds to the second para. of s. 110 of the Civil Procedure Code, cannot therefore be read as an alternative to the latter part of cl. (a) referring to the amount or value of the subject-matter still in dispute on appeal. In view of the wording of this article, therefore, subject to which ss. 109 and 110 of the Civil Procedure Code will have to be read, in our view, the second para. of s. 110 of the Civil Procedure Code also cannot be construed as an alternative to the latter part of the first para. of that section. In our judgment, reading s. 110 of the Civil Procedure Code with art. 133(1) of the Constitution, a party would be entitled to a certificate under art. 133(1)(b) of the Constitution provided his case falls under that clause even though the amount or value of the subject-matter in dispute in the Court of first instance is less than twenty thousand rupees. In this connection, Mr. N. K. Desai has drawn our attention to a case of the Rajasthan High Court, *Amar-singh v. Karnail Kaur*⁴, where a similar view has been taken as to the construction of para. 2 of s. 110 of the Civil Procedure Code. The argument of Mr. A. D. Desai, therefore, that the petitioners are not entitled to a certificate under art. 133(1)(b) on the ground that admittedly the subject-matter in dispute in the Court of first instance and still in dispute on appeal was and is less than Rs. 20,000 cannot be accepted.

Then it is contended by Mr. A. D. Desai that the judgment and decree of this Court do not involve directly or indirectly some claim or question respecting any property. Mr. Desai contends that the principal question argued in the appeal was whether the Swaminarayan Temples were Hindu religious institutions within the meaning of the Bombay Hindu Places of Public Worship (Entry Authorization) Act, 1956, which repealed the Harijan Temple Entry Act, 1947, and that this does not involve any claim or question to or respecting any property. We are not prepared to accept this argument. The suit was instituted by the plaintiffs because non-Satsangi Harijans wanted entry into these temples. It is true that the questions involved in the appeal do not affect the ownership or management of these temples. But, that in our view, cannot mean that the question involved is not in respect of any property. The judgment of this Court has taken the view that the Swaminarayan Temples are Hindu religious institutions and has negatived the claim of the petitioners to obtain a declaration and injunction which would have enabled them to prevent effectively the entry of non-Satsangi Harijans into these temples. It does, therefore, indirectly involve a question respecting property.

Lastly, it was faintly urged that there was no evidence on the record to show what the value of these temples would be. We gave an opportunity to the petitioners to file an affidavit on this point and the affidavit discloses that the value of the Nar Narayan Deo Temple at Ahmedabad alone is more than 25 lakhs and that of the 14 big temples of the northern diocese and other smaller temples would be more than a crore of rupees. In the affidavit in reply, the opponents have vaguely stated that this valuation is not correct. We were prepared to give Mr. A. D. Desai's client an opportunity to challenge the valuation by referring the matter to the trial Court. But it has been frankly and, in our opinion, rightly conceded that in view of the vague statement in the affidavit in reply that the valuation was not correct, it would be open to us to accept the valuation made in the affidavit filed by the petitioners on this point. As we have already stated as the judgment and decree of this Court has set aside the decree of the trial Court, the last para. of s. 110 of the Civil Procedure Code that the appeal must involve some substantial question of law would not be applicable, nor will a certificate to that effect of this Court be necessary under the last portion of art. 133(1) of the Constitution. In our opinion, therefore, the petitioners will be entitled to a certificate under art. 133(1)(b) of the Constitution.

The petitioners have also prayed for a certificate under art. 133(1)(c) of the Constitution that the case is a fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court. It is contended by Mr. A. D. Desai that the petitioners would not be entitled to such a certificate. According to him, no substantial question of law arises, as this Court has decided the question as to whether the followers of Swaminarayan sect are Hindus by religion on a consideration of oral and other evidence on the record. As regards the other question whether Bombay Act XXXI of 1956 would be ultra vires of art. 25(1) of the Constitution, Mr. Desai says that that question would be governed by the decision of the Supreme Court, Venkataramana Devaru v. State of Mysore.⁵ Now, the circumstances under which a certificate of fitness can be granted are fairly well settled. A mere substantial question of law arising between the parties is not sufficient. In *Radhakrishna Ayyar v. Swaminatha Ayyar*⁶ it was observed (p. 33):

"...it is plain that there may be certain cases in which it is impossible to define in money value the exact character of the dispute; there are questions, as for example, those relating to religious rights and ceremonies, to caste and family rights, or such matters as the reduction of the capital of companies as well as questions of wide public importance in which the subject-matter in dispute cannot be reduced into actual terms of money," and sub-s. (c) of s. 109 of the Civil Procedure Code contemplated such cases. This observation of the Privy Council has been never treated as exhaustive but merely illustrative. In *Hirjibhai v. Jamsheджи*⁷ this Court took the view that what was contemplated in cl. (c) of s. 109 of the Civil Procedure Code was a class of cases in which there may be involved questions of public importance, or which may be important precedents governing numerous other cases, or in which, while the right in dispute is not exactly measurable in terms of money, it is of great public or private importance; and a mention was made in this connection of the case of the Udwađa Fire Temple, Navroji v. Kharsedji,⁸ in which Jenkins C.J. had granted leave to appeal on the ground that the point in dispute, though not measurable by money, was of considerable importance because it related to the extent of control acquired by one who had built the Fire Temple. In the present case, the question involved is undoubtedly of very great importance from the point of view of the Swaminarayan Sampraday which claims lacs of adherents and on whose behalf it was contended in appeal before this Court that they are not Hindus by religion. The question is also of importance from the point of view of non-Satsangi Harijans represented by the contesting defendants, who claim a right of entry into these temples. Besides, the decision as to whether the followers of Swaminarayan Sampraday are Hindus by religion depends not merely on appreciation of oral evidence but also on the interpretation of some of the sacred scriptures of the sect and other evidence on the record. In our view, therefore, the case would be a fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court even under s. 109(c) of the Civil Procedure Code read with art. 133(1)(c) of the Constitution.

The result is that a certificate will issue in favour of the petitioners both under art. 133(1)(b) and (c) of the Constitution. Costs will be costs in appeal.

Certificate granted.

CRIMINAL APPELLATE.

Before Mr. Justice Shah and Mr. Justice Mody.

STATE v. L. C. PATEL.*

Factories Act (LXIII of 1948), Secs. 21(1)(iv)(b), 22—Degree of safety by position of transmission machinery—Whether such safety should be absolute safety—Such absolute safety whether should be against only reasonably foreseeable risks and dangers—Provision against danger arising by reason of shifting or repairing machinery whether contemplated by s. 21(1).

Under s. 21(1)(iv)(b) of the Factories Act, 1948, the safety contemplated either by securely fencing the transmission machinery or by its position or by its construction is absolute safety but such absolute safety must be only against reasonably foreseeable risks and dangers of coming into contact with the transmission machinery.

Section 21 of the Factories Act, 1948, gives protection not merely to the careful, the vigilant and the conscientious workman, but to the careless, the indolent, the inadvertent, the weary, and even perhaps in some cases, the disobedient. But the carelessness, the indolence, the inadvertence, the weariness and even the disobedience of a workman are things which an occupier of a factory can and is expected to reasonably foresee and should, therefore, provide against. Such risks and dangers are foreseeable and must under s. 21 of the Act be provided against. But s. 21 cannot be given the meaning that it imposes a duty upon an occupier of a factory to provide for safety against even unforeseeable risks and dangers.

Section 21 of the Factories Act, 1948, does not contemplate a provision being made for the safety of an employee who is assigned the work of repairing machinery or of shifting machinery or of installing new machinery.

Some carding machines in the carding department of a mill, which was a factory within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1948, were being shifted to some other place during the recess time, when the machinery was not in motion. Instructions were issued to do the shifting only during the recess when the shaft and pulleys were not in motion. One of the carding machines had been stopped working as it was to be shifted on the following day. On this day a few minutes before the recess a workman placing a ladder against a steam pipe stood up on it and attempted to take a belt of this carding machine which was lying idle on a hanger on the other side of the shaft and pulley which were in motion. In doing so the workman was entangled in the belt and the moving shaft and died as a result of the injuries sustained by him. On these facts the accused, who was the manager of the mill, was charged under s. 21(1)(iv)(b) of the Factories Act, 1948, for having failed to securely fence the shaft and pulleys of the carding department of the factory which formed part of the transmission machinery. The prosecution contended that the safety aimed at by s. 21(1)(iv) of the Act, whether by fencing or by position or by construction, is absolute safety and that the shaft and pulleys in the instant case were not, by their position, absolutely safe to every person employed in the factory. The accused contended that the safety provided by s. 21(1)(iv), though absolute, could be only against foreseeable risks and dangers and not otherwise and that, therefore, the shaft and pulleys did not require to be fenced as they were in such a position as to be safe to every person employed in the factory as they would have been if they were securely fenced:—

Held, that in the circumstances of the case, the risk from the unfenced overhead shaft and pulleys was not a foreseeable risk, and that, therefore, there was no breach of the provisions of s. 21(1)(iv)(b) committed by the accused.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

Y. V. Chandrachud, Government Pleader, for the State.

M. P. Amin and A. H. Mehta, with Payne and Co., for the respondent-accused.

MODY J. This is an appeal by the State against the order of acquittal passed in Summary Case No. 3712 of 1957 on the file of the Judicial Magistrate, First Class, 8th Court, Ahmedabad, against the respondent who was the accused in that case and was charged under s. 21(1)(w)(b) of the Factories Act, 1948. The case against the accused was that he being the Manager of the Jubilee Mills, a factory as defined by s. 2(m)(i) of the Factories Act, 1948, failed to securely fence the shaft and pulleys of the carding department of the said factory which formed part of the transmission machinery and thereby contravened the provisions of s. 21(1)(w)(b) of the Factories Act and committed an offence punishable under s. 92 of the said Act.

In the last week of March 1957 some carding machines in the carding department of the said Mills were being shifted to some other place during the recess time from 11 a.m. to 11-30 a.m. when the machinery was not in motion. The carding machine No. 108 had been stopped working since March 29, 1957, as it was to be shifted on March 30, 1957. The belt of the said machine was lying idle on the hanger which was over 12' above the ground level. The pulley which was to be shifted was also 12' above the ground level. Below the hanger there was a steam pipe which was about 7'-3" from the ground level. Instructions had been issued to do the work of shifting only during the recess when the shaft and pulleys were not in motion. About two or three minutes before the recess on March 30, 1957, one workman named Gulab Punja placed a ladder against the steam pipe, climbed the ladder and sat on the steam pipe when the shaft and pulleys were in motion and in breach of the said instructions he stood up on the steam pipe and attempted to take the belt which was lying idle on the hanger on the other side of the shaft and the pulley and in doing so he was entangled in the belt and the moving shaft. He was taken out from the shaft by cutting the belt and removed to the Civil Hospital where he died within half an hour.

Sub-section (1) of s. 21 of the Factories Act provides as under:

- "(1) In every factory the following, namely:—
- (i) every moving part of a prime mover and every fly wheel connected to a prime mover, whether the prime mover or fly wheel is in the engine house or not;
 - (ii) the headrace and tailrace of every water-wheel and water turbine;
 - (iii) any part of a stock-bar which projects beyond the head stock of a lathe; and
 - (iv) unless they are in such position or of such construction as to be safe to every person employed in the factory as they would be if they were securely fenced, the following, namely,—
 - (a) every part of an electric generator, a motor or rotary converter;
 - (b) every part of the transmission machinery; and
 - (c) every dangerous part of any other machinery, shall be securely fenced by safeguards of substantial construction which shall be kept in position while the parts of machinery they are fencing are in motion or in use.

Provided that for the purpose of determining whether any part of machinery is in such position or is of such construction as to be safe as aforesaid, account shall not

It was not disputed, nor can it be disputed, that the shaft and the pulleys formed part of "the transmission machinery". The charge against the accused was that he had failed to securely fence the shaft and the pulleys as required by the said s. 21(1)(iv)(c). It was common ground that the shaft and the pulleys were not fenced at all.

The respondent pleaded not guilty and his defence was that the said shaft and the pulleys did not require to be fenced because they were in such a position as to be safe to every person employed in the factory as they would be if they were securely fenced.

On behalf of the prosecution one P. T. Shah, the then Senior Inspector of Factories, was examined. He stated that he was an Inspector of Factories for the area in which the Jubilee Mills was situated, that he had visited the said factory on March 30, 1957, to inquire into the case of the fatal accident to worker Gulab Punja employed as a coolie in the Engineering Department of the said factory, that the worker was entangled in a belt driving the card No. 108 on the moving shaft driving the rows of cards, that the accident occurred at about 10-57 a.m. on March 30, 1957, that on enquiring into the accident, he found that re-arrangement of cards was being done, that for that work every day a few cards were stopped and re-erected in new position, that the pulleys driving those cards were also being shifted on the main shafts, that the said work was being done during the recess period from 11 a.m. to 11-30 a.m., and that a gang of workers was kept ready with the necessary tools and ladders just before the stopping time of the factory. He further stated that on March 30, 1957, the deceased Gulab Punja was assigned that work along with some other fitters, that the deceased had rested a ladder on a steam pipe just below the overhead shaft and the pulley which was to be shifted, that the shafting was in motion, that the deceased went up and sat on the pipe and tried to shift the belt of the card lying on the belt-hanger to the other side of the pulley while the shafting was in motion and that while doing so, he got entangled in the belt and the moving shaft and as a result thereof, received the said injury. He stated that no supervisory staff was present at the time of the said work, that the overhead shaft, the pulleys and the belt which formed part of the transmission machinery were not safe to the worker who died and that the said parts of the transmission machinery were not securely fenced. In his cross-examination he stated that he had been a factory Inspector for ten years preceding the date of the said accident, that he had been a Senior Factory Inspector for the last three of the said ten years and that prior to his joining the factory department, he was working as an Engineer in a mill for about seven years. He further stated that the work of shifting cards in the Jubilee Mills was going on for one week prior to his visit on March 30, 1957, and that the said work was being done during the recess time. He stated that during his inquiry it transpired that the work of shifting the pulleys was to be done during the recess time when the machinery was not in motion and that he had no evidence to show that the deceased worker was instructed by the accused or anybody else to start the work when the machinery was in motion. He admitted that during his tenure as an Engineer in a mill and as a Factory Inspector he had not come across any fencing having been done of shafts and pulleys in the carding department of any mill. He further admitted that there was no specific rule providing for the fencing of shafts and pulleys in the carding department of a mill. He also admitted that unfenced shafts and pulleys overhead are not ordinarily unsafe or dangerous to the workers doing their ordinary work in the carding department, that he had not heard of any fencing being done of overhead shafts and pulleys in the carding department of any mill in India and that he had never suggested to any mill to provide such fencing, although there were about 60 or 65 mills within his jurisdiction in Ahmedabad. He further admitted that by their position the shafts and pulleys overhead were quite safe to the workers working in the carding department. In his cross-examination he stated that he had visited the Jubilee Mills on March 30, 1957, to inquire into the case of the said fatal accident to Gulab Punja and had entered his "inquiry" into the Inspection Book, a true copy of which is exh. 4 on the record of this case, and that he had thereafter on April 17, 1957, made further remarks, a true copy of which has been produced as exh. 5. In his said inspection notes, exh. 4, he has made no mention about the said breach about fencing having been committed and the same was also admitted by him in his cross-examination. In his said further remarks, exh. 5, however, he has stated that the overhead shaft and the pulleys of the carding driver were not securely "fixed" when Gulab Punja approached the same, that the shafting and the pulleys were in motion and "the same was also not securely fixed." The word "fixed" used at these two places appears to be a mistake for "fenced" as appearing from what is stated in exh. 5 immediately thereafter, viz., that not securely fencing the overhead shaft and the pulleys which formed part of the transmission machinery was a breach of s. 21(1) (iv) (b) of the said Act. As regards the further remarks exh. 5, he stated in his cross-examination that he made them on April 17, 1957, because it struck him on that day that that breach also had been committed and that it was after discussion with his superior officer (The Deputy Chief Inspector) that it struck him that that breach also had been committed. In his cross-examination he further stated that mounting of belts had to be frequently done.

In his statement under s. 342 of the Criminal Procedure Code, in addition to stating that the shaft and pulleys were safe by position, the respondent contended that it was not practically feasible to provide guards or fencing to the overhead shafts and pulleys, that in the normal working of the mills there would be several occasions when the belts would go out of position and they had to be readjusted or mounted, that at the time of mounting, the guards would have to be removed and re-fitted involving great loss of time and that that would naturally hamper production and keep the machinery idle.

The learned Magistrate held that, as admitted by the Factory Inspector, by position the shafts and pulleys were quite safe for workers working in the carding department. After considering various authorities cited before him, he held that "machines are required to be fenced so that the workers working on them may not come in contact with them. If the machinery is accessible to workers carrying on their ordinary work, there is, no doubt, an absolute duty to fence it. But when it is in a wholly inaccessible position the duty to fence it is not absolute for it may be safe by reason of its position and if the workers in the ordinary course of their work are not likely to come in contact with it, it is not required to be fenced."

He further held that in the case before him the conduct of the deceased worker was not reasonably foreseeable and it had not been established that in reasonably foreseeable circumstances the overhead shaft with the pulleys was not as safe as it would be if securely fenced. As regards the argument of the prosecution that sometimes the belts go off the pulleys and some worker may try to replace them and in so doing may come in contact with the overhead machinery, he held that in such a case a fencing, if provided, would have to be removed for replacing the belts on the pulleys and thus the fencing would be meaningless and that the only alternative in such cases was to ask the employers to stop their machines while carrying out such work, and if it be held that even the overhead shaft with the pulleys which was not within the reach of the workers working in the ordinary course of their work was also required to be fenced, the exception provided by the opening words of s. 21(1)(iv), viz.,

"unless they are in such position or of such construction as to be safe to every person employed in the factory as they would be if they were securely fenced" would be rendered nugatory. He, therefore, held that the offence with which the accused was charged was not proved and ordered the accused to be acquitted under s. 245(1) of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Now, in this case it is not disputed by the respondent that the Jubilee Mill was a factory within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1948, and the shaft and pulleys in question were a part of the transmission machinery within the meaning of the Act. It is, therefore, clear that by reason of the provisions of s. 21(1)(iv) the shaft and pulleys ought to have been securely fenced unless they were in such a position as to be safe to every person employed in the factory as they would be if they were securely fenced. It is not contended that they were safe by construction. What is contended is that they were safe by position. Section 21(1)(iv) in terms provides that the safety ensured by position must be the same which would result from a secure fencing. The degree of safety to be ensured whether by securely fencing or by position or by construction is identical. What the appellant contends is that the safety aimed at by s. 21(1)(iv), whether by fencing or by position or by construction, is absolute safety and that the shaft and the pulleys in this case were not, by their position, absolutely safe to every person employed in the factory. It is not disputed on behalf of the respondent that the safety provided for by s. 21(1)(iv) is absolute safety. But what is contended is that that safety, though absolute, can be only against foreseeable risks and dangers and not otherwise. In support of their respective contentions both the parties have cited several decided cases. All these cases, however, are of the English Courts but arising under parallel factory legislation in England. No Indian case has been cited, presumably because there is no such reported case.

The first case relied upon by the appellant is that of *Atkinson v. London and North Eastern Ry. Co.*¹ In that case, in the respondents' factory, there was a tube-cutting machine driven by a pulley fixed on a horizontal shaft about 13 feet above the floor. The belt for driving the machine being off the pulley, one Cresswell, a person employed in the factory, attempted to move the belt from the shaft to the pulley while the shaft was running, and in attempting to do so, he was injured. The shaft and pulley were about 13 feet from the floor of the shop and when attempting to put on the belt, Cresswell climbed a ladder and stood on a beam which was about 7 feet from the floor. The shaft and pulley were not in any way fenced or guarded. The respondents were prosecuted on a charge under s. 10(1)(c) of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, the charge being that a part of the mill gearing, namely the said shaft with the pulley on it, was not securely fenced nor in such position or of such construction as to be equally safe to every person employed or working in the factory as if it had been securely fenced. The respondents' defence was that the shaft and pulley were safe by position and, therefore, need not be fenced and that Cresswell had acted contrary to the regulations of the factory in attempting to move the belt from the shaft to the pulley while the engine was running. The Justices came to a decision that they were of the opinion that any fence would have been useless owing to the shaft being 13 feet from the ground and dismissed the case against the respondents. An appeal was filed against that decision, and that appeal was heard by Lord Hewart C. J. and Avory and Sankey JJ. It may be noted that the relevant section of the English Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, was s. 10(1)(c) which provided as follows:

"With respect to the fencing of machinery in a factory, the following provisions shall have effect:—...

(c) All dangerous parts of the machinery and every part of the mill gearing must either be securely fenced, or be in such position or of such construction as to be equally safe to every person employed or working in the factory as it would be if it were securely fenced."

The provision contained in s. 10(1)(c) is for our purposes the same as that contained in s. 21(1)(iv)(c) of the Indian Act. The decision of the appeal Court in that case turned mainly upon the interpretation of the said finding of the Justices and the appeal Court held that the said finding did not amount to a finding that the particular part of the mill gearing, viz., the shaft and the pulley, was by reason of its position or construction equally safe to every person employed or working in the factory, as it would have been if it had been securely fenced. Lord Hewart C. J. came to the conclusion that the said finding of the Justices was not a finding of fact that the particular part of the mill gearing was never approached by any person employed by the respondents except for such an occasional and temporary purpose as this, of moving the belt from the shaft to the pulley, and, secondly, it was not a finding of fact that, if fencing there had been, no ingenuity could have devised a type of fence which on the occasion of such an emergency as arose in that case would not have had to be removed. He further held that there was nothing in the said section or elsewhere in the said Act which granted a dispensation from the obligation to fence because the mill gearing was 13 feet above the ground. Avory J. also came to the conclusion that the mere fact that an unfenced shaft was 13 feet above the ground was not sufficient to show that it was in such a position as to be equally safe to every person employed or working in the factory as it would be if it were securely fenced. From the judgments delivered in the said appeal it appears that as there was no specific finding recorded by the Justices that the particular mill gearing, though unfenced, was safe by position, the order of the Justices was held to be not correct and was, therefore, reversed.

The next case relied upon by the appellant is that of *Chasteney v. Michael Nairn & Co.*² In that case the respondents were charged with having failed to have pinion-wheels of parts of their machinery securely fenced so as to be safe to every person employed or working in their factory, in consequence of which one of their workmen was injured while engaged in greasing the machinery while it was in motion. The respondents had put up a notice in the factory as follows: "Do not put your hands in the machinery while it is in motion. Persons disregard this notice at their own risk." The pinion-wheels, although usually stopped, were occasionally allowed to remain in motion, for the purpose of greasing. The Magistrate dismissed the charge, holding that the pinion-wheels were not dangerous parts of the machinery unless in motion, when it was not usual for greasing to be done. The appeal Court consisting of Lord Hewart L. C. J., Swift and Goddard JJ. held that as the wheels were dangerous part of the machinery, they ought to have been securely fenced, despite the fact that greasing was not usually done while the machinery was in motion, as it cannot be assumed that every person will always exercise necessary care, and that the offence charged was, therefore, proved. The said case also arose under the provisions of s. 10(1)(c) of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901. The point for decision in that case, however, was whether the machinery in question was dangerous machinery within the meaning of the said section or not. There was no contention in that case that the machinery did not require to be securely fenced on the ground that the same was safe by position. The only point involved in that case was whether the pinion-wheels were dangerous parts of the machinery or not. That case does not lay down any principle concerning the proposition as to when a machinery can be said to be safe by position.

Another case referred to is that of *Walker v. Bletchley Flettons*³. That case also involved a determination as to what could be said to be dangerous machinery within the meaning of s. 10(1)(c) of the said Factory and Workshop Act,

1901. But the test applied by Du Parcq J. in that case for determining the same is useful. The learned Judge has laid down that in considering whether machinery is dangerous, it must not be assumed that everybody will always be careful. A part of a machine is dangerous if it is a possible cause of injury to anybody acting in a way in which a human being may be reasonably expected to act in circumstances which may be reasonably expected to occur. For the purposes of determining what is a dangerous part of a machine Du Parcq J. has in this case enunciated the principle of reasonable foreseeability of danger resulting from the machine. It was not contended in that case that the particular machinery was securely fenced; nor was it contended that it was safe by position or construction and the judgment in that case is, therefore, of no other importance.

The next case relied upon, and strongly relied upon, on behalf of the appellant is that of *Findlay v. Newman, Hender & Co.*⁴ In that case the respondents were charged with having failed to have certain mill gearing in their factory securely fenced, or in such position or of such construction as to be equally safe to every person employed or working in their factory, in consequence of which one of their workmen was injured. The mill gearing consisted of a countershaft, 12½ feet from the ground, to which a belt was attached, and the workman was injured in replacing the belt. There was a notice put up by the factory prohibiting the workmen from putting on belts between the main shaft and the countershaft unless the engine was stopped or slowed down, but the workman had acted in disobedience of those instructions. The countershaft and the belt were not fenced in any way, but the respondents contended that the same were safe by position. The Justices dismissed the charge. An appeal was preferred against the same which was heard by Lord Hewart, L. C. J., Du Parcq and Atkinson JJ. That case also was under s. 10 of the said Factory and Workshop Act, 1901. Lord Hewart, L. C. J., came to the conclusion that as the shaft was revolving at 190 revolutions a minute and was accessible to persons who, for example, wished to replace the belt, not in any sense whatever fenced, it could not be said to be safe by position because the essential purpose of the section was to provide absolute safety, so far as fencing could provide it. It may be noted that Lord Hewart, C. J., lays down the test of absolute safety, but in his judgment he has not laid down as to against what risks such absolute safety was to be ensured. It may be further noted that in that case the very fact that the said notice had been put up by the factory indicated that the management had foreseen that the persons employed in the factory may be exposed to risk if the terms of the notice were not complied with. Lord Hewart, C. J., does not, in his judgment, at all take into consideration the aspect whether the risk was foreseeable, but the same has been taken into consideration by Du Parcq J. as is clear from the following passage from his judgment (p. 62):

"...The magistrates may possibly have thought that it was negligence; they may have thought that it was serious negligence and disobedience to orders by the man who was injured. But, even if that be so, if the occupier of the factory could have foreseen that workmen would do what this workman did, or if any reasonable person could have foreseen such a thing's happening, it is impossible to say that the machinery was safe. Here the injury was undoubtedly suffered; it was suffered by a man doing something which, clearly, from the finding that there had been a notice warning the workmen, the employers had understood might happen. The proper way to safeguard employees is not by putting up notices, is not by saying 'Do not touch,' or 'Keep clear,' or 'Keep away,' but by so fencing or by so constructing your machinery that the dangerous part ceases to be anything but secure."

The third judgment in that case is that of Atkinson J. which also, like the judgment of Lord Hewart C. J. lays down the principle that the obligation to securely fence the countershaft was an absolute obligation but does not at all deal with the aspect dealt with by Du Parcq J. that such absolute obligation was only in respect of foreseeable risks.

The next case is that of *Carrol v. Andrew Barclay & Sons, Ltd.*⁵, relied upon by Mr. Amin, the learned counsel for the respondent. That case was under s. 13(1) of the English Factories Act, 1937, which provides:

"Every part of the transmission machinery shall be securely fenced unless it is in such a position or of such construction as to be as safe to every person employed or working on the premises as it would be if securely fenced."

In that case the belt connecting the shaft and the motor in the factory broke when it was running and injured a workman who was standing at that time about 6½ feet away from the motor. The workman sued for damages on the ground that the accident was caused by a failure to fence the belt adequately and securely in breach, inter alia, of s. 13 of the said Factories Act, 1937. The case turned on the question as to against what dangers was the fencing mentioned in s. 13(1) intended to be a safeguard, whether against the risk arising by reason of a workman making contact with the machinery when in motion or against dangerous material ejected from the machinery and it was held that the requirement of the said section that 'every part of the transmission machinery shall be securely "fenced"' imposed on occupiers of factories a duty to erect a barricade to prevent any employee from making contact with the machinery, and did not in ordinary cases oblige them to erect an enclosure to prevent broken machinery from flying out and injuring him. Although the point for decision in that case was different from the point for our decision in this case, certain observations of Du Parcq J. from his judgment in that case have been relied upon by Mr. Amin. Du Parcq J. has observed in his judgment that the words "securely fenced" may well mean "so fenced as to give security from such dangers as may be reasonably expected". These observations reiterate what Du Parcq J. had already stated in his said two earlier judgments, viz. that fencing was to give security from such dangers as may be reasonably expected, i.e., which may be reasonably foreseen. These remarks are undoubtedly in a slightly different context, but they are general, and on a point of construction they are equally applicable, not only to the case of a broken part of machinery flying out and hurting a workman, but also to the case of a workman coming in contact with the machinery.

Another case relied upon is that of *Carr v. Mercantile Produce Co. Ltd.*⁶ The real point for decision in that case was whether the part of machinery in question was "a dangerous part of any machinery" within the meaning of s. 14 of the said Factories Act, 1937, and it was held that the same was not. That case is, therefore, of no assistance for the decision of the point involved in this case. But what the learned Government Pleader appearing for the appellant relied upon was a passage from the judgment of Stable J. as appearing at page 608 of the said report which is as follows:

"The Factory Acts are there, not merely to protect the careful, the vigilant and the conscientious workman, but human nature being what it is, the careless, the indolent, the inadvertent, the weary, and even perhaps in some cases, the disobedient."

In our opinion, that passage merely reiterates, in an amplified form, the principle laid down by Lord Hewart C. J. that the relevant provision of the Factories Act provides for absolute safety without at the same time laying down, as Du Parcq J. has earlier laid down, that such absolute safety is to be achieved only against reasonably foreseeable risks or dangers.

The last case relied upon by Mr. Amin is that of *Burns v. Joseph Terry & Sons, Ltd.*⁷ In that case the facts were that the plaintiff, who was seventeen years old at the time of the accident, claimed damages for breach by the defendants of the statutory duty under the Factories Act, 1937. The plaintiff alleged inter alia that his injury was due to a breach of s. 13(1) of the Factories

⁷ [1950] 2 All E. R. 987.

Act, 1937, on the basis that the machinery by which the plaintiff was injured was transmission machinery and that it had not been securely fenced. The machinery being transmission machinery had to be securely fenced unless it was safe by position or construction. The machinery had in fact been fenced, but the plaintiff's contention was that the fencing was not adequate. Hilbery J., who tried the case in the first instance, held that it was securely fenced and that there was, therefore, no breach of the defendants' duty under the Act. In considering whether the machinery was securely fenced, Hilbery J. applied what may be described as the test of reasonable foreseeability, viz. was the machinery securely fenced having regard to the circumstances which could reasonably be foreseen. The plaintiff appealed and the appeal was heard by Somervell, Cohen and Denning, L. JJ., and it was held (Denning L. J. dissenting) that the test whether machinery was 'securely fenced' within the meaning of s. 13(1) of the said Act was whether it was so fenced as to give security from such dangers as might reasonably be expected and that in the said case the machinery was securely fenced according to that test. The appeal was consequently dismissed. This case appears to be the latest case on the subject in England. Numerous previous decisions of the English Courts on the subject were cited and discussed in the judgments of the Appeal Court. The following passage from the judgment of Somervell L. J. is extremely useful (p. 990):

"I do not think there is any decision on the point binding on this Court. I think the balance of dicta is slightly against the plaintiff. On the face of them the words used by Lord Hewart, C.J., are in his favour, but Lord Hewart, C.J., did not, I think, have in mind the issue whether the 'absolute safety' was to be against foreseeable risks. Lord Du Parcq and Lord Normand were clearly addressing their minds to the point in issue, and Voules v. Armstrong Siddley Motors, Ltd. is very nearly a direct authority against the argument. I will, however, consider the question of construction on principle. In the first place, I think that in this group of sections the same test should be applied in deciding whether machinery is 'securely fenced' as is applied in deciding whether it is 'dangerous'. To an allegation that machinery which has, in fact, caused injury, is dangerous it is admittedly a good answer to prove that it was not dangerous in any reasonably foreseeable circumstances. I see no difficulty in applying the same test to the question whether machinery is securely fenced, and would respectfully adopt the form in which the question is formulated on this basis by Lord Du Parcq and Lord Normand. I think also that this construction fits in with the later words of sub-s. (1) of s. 13 of the Factories Act, 1937. They contemplate that the position of the transmission machinery may be such that there is no necessity to fence at all. If, no accident having happened, one imagines a prosecution based on these words, I would have thought the prosecution would have to establish that in reasonably foreseeable circumstances the machinery was not as safe as it would be if securely fenced. If one has to consider unforeseeable circumstances the legislature should and would, in my opinion, have provided that all transmission machinery must be completely encased. It also fits in with the later words from another angle. The later words contemplate that the position may make any fencing unnecessary. That being so, the 'position' might well be such as to make fencing, for example, on one side only necessary."

Then again (p. 991):

"...The question was not whether what the plaintiff actually did was reasonably foreseeable, but whether the occupier should have reasonably foreseen the possibility of an accident... The question is whether a prosecution would have succeeded before the accident which leads to the claim has happened. On the other hand, if, an accident having happened, no one can suggest other circumstances which would have led to an accident, the issue may, in fact, narrow itself to the question whether the circumstances which led to the accident were reasonably foreseeable... I do not think Hilbery, J., confined himself to considering the foreseeability of the plaintiff's conduct. He referred to the fact that the factory inspector had seen this fencing many times, and that there was evidence of no previous accident over the twenty years or so of its life. He considered the possibility of someone putting a hand up underneath the mesh. He said:

"I personally cannot see, if you test the question by what was reasonably foreseeable, that it can be said that the lack of a return guard over it from the face guard rendered this insecure fencing."

It is only after this that he proceeds to consider whether the employers could have foreseen what the plaintiff actually did."

In our opinion, this latest case explains the test, as laid down by Lord Hewart, C. J., about absolute safety and approves the earlier dicta of Lord Du Parc, J. that such absolute safety was to be against foreseeable risks.

On a construction of the provisions of s. 21(1)(iv), there is no doubt that transmission machinery must be securely fenced unless the same, by reason of its position or construction, is safe to every person employed in the factory as it would be if it were securely fenced. The transmission machinery can be said to be secure by position only if the safety afforded by the position is the same as would be provided if it were securely fenced. The degree of safety either by securely fencing it or by position or by construction of the machinery is the same. There can be no doubt that the safety aimed at is absolute safety. The aim is to provide absolute safety to every person employed in the factory from the risk and danger of coming into contact with the transmission machinery but that risk or danger as contemplated by this section must reasonably be foreseeable. The Legislature could not have intended that the occupier was to provide safety for the persons employed in the factory against risks which could not even be reasonably foreseen. The risks and dangers resulting from a person coming into contact with machinery can be so complex and varied that all possible risks or dangers cannot be reasonably foreseen or anticipated. Section 92 of the Factories Act imposes a penalty if the requirements of s. 21(1)(iv)(b) are not complied with. Surely, the Legislature could not have contemplated to penalise an occupier of a factory for not providing for safety against a risk or danger which he could not reasonably foresee or anticipate. Section 21 is undoubtedly for giving protection, to use the words of Stabile J., not merely to the careful, the vigilant and the conscientious workman, but human nature being what it is, to the careless, the indolent, the inadvertent, the weary, and even perhaps in some cases, the disobedient. But the carelessness, the indolence, the inadvertence, the weariness and even the disobedience of a workman are things which an occupier of a factory can and is expected to reasonably foresee and should, therefore, provide against. Such risks and dangers are foreseeable and must under the provisions of s. 21 be provided against. But s. 21 cannot be given the meaning that it imposes a duty upon an occupier of a factory to provide for safety against even unforeseeable risks and dangers and much more so, because his omission to do so would expose him to a penalty. The provisions of s. 21(1)(iv)(b) are, so far as the same are relevant to this case, substantially the same as, if not identical with, the parallel provisions in the said two English Acts. We are in respectful agreement with the observations of Lord Somervell J. in the said case of Burns v. Joseph Terry & Sons, Ltd., and, in our opinion, the same are equally applicable to the consideration of our s. 21(1)(iv)(b).

Applying the same test which has been contemplated by Lord Somervell J. in Burns v. Joseph Terry & Sons, Ltd. we have to ascertain whether the prosecution in the case before us would have succeeded before the accident to Gulab Punja occurred. What is the foreseeable risk or danger which could have emanated from the shaft and pulleys in this case against which the respondent has failed to provide a secure fencing? The prosecution has been able to point out none. On the contrary, the Factory Inspector, the only witness examined on behalf of the prosecution, has admitted that unfenced shafts and pulleys overhead are not ordinarily unsafe or dangerous to the workers doing their ordinary work in the carding department. The learned Government Pleader argued that this part of the testimony of the witness is of a limited character, because it refers to the workers doing their ordinary work in the carding department. He pointed out that the witness has not stated that the shaft and the pulleys overhead were not ordinarily unsafe or dangerous to the workers in the carding department doing other than their ordinary work or to persons employed in the factory other than the workers in the carding department. There is, however, no evidence to show that any risk or danger could be reasonably foreseen from the shaft and the pulleys to the workers in the carding department doing other than their ordinary work or to any person employed in the factory otherwise than in the carding department. On the contrary, the Factory Inspector Shah has stated that he had never heard of any fencing of the overhead shafts and pulleys in the carding department in any of the mills in India. He has worked in a Textile Mill as an Engineer for seven years and he has been a Factory Inspector for ten years. Moreover, he has stated that he had about 60 or 65 mills within his jurisdiction in Ahmedabad. Ahmedabad is known to have large and varied types of textile mills. The Factory Inspector has admitted that he had never suggested to any mill to provide fencing for the overhead shafts and pulleys. He stated that by position the shafts and pulleys overhead were quite safe to the workers working in the carding department. If with his long and varied experience the Factory Inspector had never suggested to any mill to provide fencing for the overhead shafts and pulleys, the only conclusion to be drawn is that the overhead shafts and pulleys are safe by position and no risk or danger can be reasonably foreseen to ensue to a person employed in the mill not only while doing his ordinary work in the carding department but even otherwise.

The learned Government Pleader argued that it is possible to foresee some risks or danger from the overhead shafts and pulleys to persons employed in the factory who may be assigned the work of repairing the shafts or pulleys or other machinery in the carding department connected with the shafts or pulleys. In the first place, as already pointed out, there is no evidence to show that such risk or danger can be reasonably foreseen or anticipated. But what is more, in our opinion, s. 21 does not contemplate a provision being made for the safety of an employee who is assigned the work of repairing machinery or of shifting machinery or of installing new machinery. In this connection the proviso to s. 21 and the provisions of s. 22 of the said Act which are co-related are very pertinent. The proviso enacts that for the purpose of determining whether any part of machinery is in such position or is of such construction as to be safe as aforesaid, account shall not be taken of any occasion when, it being necessary to make an examination of the machinery while it is in motion or, as a result of such examination, to carry out any mounting or shipping of belts, lubrication or other adjusting operation while the machinery is in motion, such examination or operation is made or carried out in accordance with the provisions of sub-s. (1) of s. 22. The occasions excluded by the proviso are the occasions when it becomes necessary to make an examination of the machinery while it is in motion or to carry out any mounting or shipping of belts, lubrication or other adjusting operation while the machinery is in motion. Such occasions must arise in the ordinary working of the machinery and may arise frequently. But in spite of the same, the said occasions have been excepted from the operation of the said sub-s. (1). Occasions for shifting the machinery itself or for repairing the same cannot be said to be normal operations in the working of the machinery. The occasions of shifting or repairing the machinery while in motion have not been provided for in the said proviso. It cannot be said that such occasions were not at all contemplated by the Legislature; nor can it reasonably be said that the Legislature, having in the said proviso, excepted the occasions mentioned in the said proviso, did not want to except the occasions of shifting or repairing the machinery from the operation of the said sub-s. (1). The only conclusion to be drawn is, therefore, that sub-s. (1) was never intended to provide for safety as mentioned therein against risks and dangers in connection with the shifting or repairing of machinery. As already observed, the prosecution can succeed in this case if it could possibly have succeeded before the accident to Gulab Punja occurred. But it is possible to argue, although it has not in fact been argued by the learned Government Pleader, that from the very fact that the management of the factory had issued instructions to shift the card No. 108 and the relative pulleys during recess time when the machinery was not in motion the same must of necessity indicate that a possibility of danger was foreseen if the card and the pulleys were shifted when the machinery was in motion. But even if such a danger could reasonably be foreseen, in our opinion, s. 21(1) does not contemplate that the occupier of the factory should provide against danger arising by reason of the shifting or repairing of machinery.

Another argument of the learned Government Pleader was that even if s. 21(1) (iv) (b) be construed to provide for safety only against foreseeable risks and dangers, there was a foreseeable risk in the present case inasmuch as belts may have to be mounted on the pulleys when the shaft and the pulleys were in motion. So far as this aspect of the case is concerned, it has to be borne in mind that the charge against the respondent is for not securely fencing only the shaft and pulleys and does not extend to not securely fencing the belts. It is, therefore, quite clear that the respondent cannot, in this case, be held responsible for not securely fencing the belts. The charge is confined to "not securely fencing of the shaft and pulleys". There is, however, no evidence in this case whether any risk could be reasonably foreseen to result from the operation of mounting the belt while the shaft and the pulleys were in motion only by reason of the non-fencing of the shaft and the pulleys without taking into consideration the risk or danger resulting from the non-fencing of the belt itself. Whether any risk or danger would result by the non-fencing of the shaft and the pulleys, irrespective of the non-fencing of the belt, is not a matter which we feel we are competent to decide in the absence of the necessary evidence. The relevant evidence on this point is only one sentence in the evidence of the Factory Inspector which reads: "Mounting of belts has to be frequently done." What the consequence of such mounting of belts would be and what danger or risk it would entail have not been deposed to by him. He has not deposed whether by reason of such mounting of belts any risk or danger can be foreseen to result from the shaft and the pulleys irrespective of the belt. Accepting this part of his evidence, it must be inferred that the mounting of belts must be a frequent operation not only in this particular mill, viz. the Jubilee Mill, but in all the other mills in Ahmedabad, which were within his jurisdiction, and in other parts of India. In spite of the same, the Factory Inspector has deposed that he had never suggested to any mill to provide fencing for the overhead shafts and the pulleys. What is more, he inspected the shaft and the pulleys on March 30, 1957, immediately or shortly after the accident to Gulab Punja occurred. He thereafter wrote out his report, exh. 4. But even in that report he has never envisaged any danger or risk resulting from the unfenced shaft and the pulleys. As admitted by him, it was only after some discussion he had with his superior officer (the Deputy Chief Inspector) that it occurred to him that there may possibly be some risk from the unfenced shaft and the pulleys. If a Factory Inspector with the experience of seven years as an Engineer in the Textile Mill and ten years as a Factory Inspector could not foresee any risk from an unfenced overhead shaft and pulleys, we think we are safe in concluding that such risk or danger could not be reasonably foreseen. Therefore, even apart from the fact that there is no evidence in this case in this behalf, we are further of opinion that the risk from the unfenced overhead shaft and pulleys was not a foreseeable risk and that, therefore, there was no breach of the provisions of s. 21(1) (iv) (b) committed by the respondent.

Under the circumstances, in our judgment, the respondent is not guilty of the offence with which he has been charged and he has been rightly acquitted of that offence by the learned Magistrate. We, therefore, confirm the order of acquittal and dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

LAKHAMSI GHELABHAI.*

Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872), Secs. 43, 11, 13—Judgment in Land Acquisition Reference not inter partes and relating to property in vicinity of land subject of Land Acquisition Reference—Whether such judgment admissible as an instance from which market value of land in question can be deduced—Such judgment whether transaction or instance within cls. (a) & (b) of s. 13—Whether such judgment relevant as fact under s. 11.

A judgment in another Land Acquisition Reference not inter partes and with reference to another property situate in the vicinity of the land in question is not admissible as an instance from which the market value of the land in question can be deduced.

Such a judgment is neither a transaction nor an instance under cls. (a) and (b) of s. 13 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, and it is not a fact which would be relevant under s. 11 of the Act, but is a mere opinion as to the existence or otherwise of a fact.

THE Municipal Commissioner for Greater Bombay by his letter dated October 31, 1950, requested the Government to acquire C. S. No. 43 of Sion Matunga Division admeasuring 3648 square yards, belonging to one Lakhamsi Ghelabhai (claimant), for a Municipal Combined Market at Matunga. The land was notified under s. 4 of the Land Acquisition Act on January 22, 1951, and it was finally notified for acquisition under s. 6 of the Act by notification dated July 17, 1951. The Special Land Acquisition Officer was directed under s. 7 to take order for the acquisition of the land. The Special Land Acquisition Officer made his award under s. 11 on September 11, 1954, under which the total amount payable to the claimant was declared to be Rs. 2,62,200 at Rs. 62-8-0 per square yard.

On October 5, 1954, possession of the land was handed over under s. 16 and the amount of compensation was received by the claimant under protest. As the claimant was dissatisfied with the award as regards the amount of compensation, he applied for reference to the Court under s. 18. The matter was accordingly referred to the High Court and it came up before Shelat J. At the hearing counsel for the claimant sought to include in evidence the judgment of Tendolkar J. delivered on July 6, 1953, in certain Land Acquisition References relating to some plots situate near the land concerned in the present Reference, and to deduce from their value as determined by Tendolkar J. the market value of the land in question.

M. P. Laud, for the claimant.

H. M. Seervai, Advocate General, with J. M. Thakore, for the Special Land Acquisition Officer.

SHELAT J. The question raised by Mr. Laud is one of importance under the Evidence Act. Mr. Laud urged that the judgment in L.A. Reference Nos. 2, 3, and 4 of 1949 decided by Mr. Justice Tendolkar on July 6, 1953, relating to plots Nos. 66 to 69 situate near the land concerned in this Reference is admissible as evidence to establish (i) the value of those plots and (ii) to regard those plots as instances and to deduce from the value thereof as determined by Mr. Justice Tendolkar the market value of the plot in question. The learned Advocate General has objected to that judgment being admitted as evidence on the ground that it is not relevant under any of the provisions of the Evidence Act. The question has been argued at considerable length and it being one on which there is hardly any reported precedent of our Court, both sides have requested me to give reasons for my decision.

Now the parties concerned in those References were different except that one side in all those References is always the Land Acquisition Officer representing Government. The acquisition of those lands took place in January 1946 which was the date as of which the value of those lands had to be ascertained whereas the notification under s. 4 of the Land Acquisition Act in this case is of January 22, 1951. Tendolkar J. valued those plots on several instances of sale and other evidence led before him. Neither those instances nor that evidence on which that learned Judge came to his conclusion are before me. The point for consideration, therefore, is whether a judgment in another Land Acquisition Reference not inter partes and with reference to another property, even if situate in the vicinity of the land in question, is admissible as an instance from which the market value of the land in question can be deduced.

The Advocate General contended that the only provisions under which a judgment in another case is admissible are those contained in ss. 40 to 43 of the Evidence Act, and that the judgment of Tendolkar J. does not come within anyone of those sections and, therefore, cannot be admitted. Section 40 enacts that the existence of a judgment which by law i.e. by the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure or Code of Criminal Procedure constitutes res judicata or autre fois acquit or autre fois convict, is a relevant fact. In such cases, however, the judgment is inter partes. Section 41 deals with judgments which are called judgments in rem, that is judgments which are conclusive not only against parties thereto but against all persons. Section 42 makes those judgments relevant which relate to matters of public nature, though they are not inter partes. Mr. Laud conceded that none of these three sections would be applicable, but he relied on s. 43 which provides that a judgment other than those mentioned in ss. 40 to 42 is irrelevant unless the existence of such a judgment is a fact in issue or is relevant under some other sections, e.g. ss. 8, 11, 13, 54 (Expl. 2) etc. Sections 8 and 54 (Expl. 2) have obviously no application to the question before me and therefore need not be considered. The question then is whether either s. 11 or s. 13 applies.

Section 13 enacts that where the question is as to the existence of any right or custom, any transaction by which that right or custom was created, claimed, modified, recognised, asserted or denied or which is inconsistent with its existence or any particular instance in which such right or custom was claimed, recognised or exercised or in which its exercise was disputed, asserted or departed from is relevant. Now, the right or custom referred to in this section is not confined to public right or custom but includes all sorts of rights and customs, though they must relate to property in respect of which a subsequent litigation has arisen. But even where in such subsequent litigation the question of right or custom arises, the view as expressed in *Gujju Lall v. Fatteh Lall*¹ at one time was that a judgment, if it did not fall within ss. 40 to 42, would not be relevant. But the Privy Council in *Dinomoni Chowdhrami v. Brojo Mohini Chowdhrami*² disagreed with that view and held that certain orders passed under s. 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code were admissible both under general principles and under s. 13 to show the fact that they were in fact made and that such orders would be evidence also on the question as to who the parties to the dispute were, what the land in dispute was and who were declared entitled to retain possession. Relying on this decision it has been held since then in a number of decisions that a judgment, even if not inter partes, is admissible to prove the fact of a claim to a right having been previously made and the legal effect of such a judgment.

But in order to determine whether a particular judgment, not inter partes of course, is admissible, the test laid down in cls. (a) and (b) of s. 13 have to be borne in mind. The judgment must be in a litigation in which a right or custom is created, claimed, asserted, denied etc. If it is relied on as an instance it must be one in which again a right or custom was claimed, recognised, exercised etc. Thus a judgment in a previous litigation to which one party in the subsequent litigation was not a party can be admissible for corroboration of a fact asserted by the other party in oral evidence, viz. that that party had asserted a claim, for instance, over the disputed land at some period. Thus in *Lakshman v. Anriti*³, the question was whether a partition-deed relied on by one of the parties was a genuine document. Ranade J. held that though the decision in the former suit where the same document was dealt with, would not amount to res judicata, still the record and the judgment in that suit would be relevant to show the conduct of the parties therein and their admissions. At p. 393 of the report he observes:

"...Except where they are judgments in rem, or where they relate to public matters, judgments not inter partes have been always held to be not res judicata, but they cannot be wholly excluded for other purposes in so far as they explain the nature of possession, or throw light on the motives or conduct of parties or identify property."

Similarly in *Govindji v. Chhotalal*⁴ Jenkins C. J. and Candy J. held that where a judgment not inter partes is in a suit brought by certain creditors against the same defendants in which the existence of partnership, denied in the subsequent suit, was asserted with success, the judgment in the previous suit is admissible, though it is not conclusive on that question. Likewise in *Dharnidar v. Dhundiraj*⁵ Jenkins C. J. and Batty J. held that for a judgment to be admissible it is not necessary that it should be one inter partes or a judgment in rem. See also *Mahomed v. Husan*⁶, where a previous judgment, though not inter partes was held admissible to prove that a sale-deed relied on by the plaintiff was disputed as non-genuine in the previous litigation. A judgment not inter partes may not be proof of facts therein stated, yet it is admissible for the purpose of explaining the character in which possession of a property has been enjoyed and matters of that class. It is thus a settled rule that judgments not inter partes and though not falling under ss. 40 to 42 are relevant for certain purposes under s. 13 where they are relied on as establishing the fact of a right or custom having been previously created, claimed, modified, recognised, asserted or denied.

The next section on which reliance is placed is s. 11, which enacts that facts not otherwise relevant are relevant if they are inconsistent with any fact in issue or relevant fact or if by themselves or in connection with other facts they make the existence or non-existence of any fact in issue or relevant fact highly probable or improbable. The contention is that a decision which has determined the value of a property in the vicinity of the property in question is relevant for showing that a certain value claimed for the property in question is a highly probable fact. The question is whether such determination of the value of such a property is a fact.

Though s. 11 is expressed in wide terms, a series of decisions have expressed the view that it is not to be widely construed. The sort of facts the section is intended to include are those which either exclude or imply more or less distinctly the existence of facts sought to be proved. But there is a distinction between the existence of a fact and a statement as to its existence. It is the former only that is relevant under s. 11. The words "highly probable" in s. 11 point out that the connection between the fact in issue and the collateral fact sought to be proved must be so mediate as to render the co-existence of the two highly probable. The admissibility of a particular piece of evidence that is offered must, therefore, be so closely connected with and in fact must depend on the weight to be attached to that piece of evidence if it is taken into consideration.

Is a judgment then a fact which would be relevant under s. 11? Section 2(9) defines "judgment" as a statement given by a Judge of the grounds of a decree or order. In *Gujju Lall v. Fattah Lall*⁷, Garth C. J. said that a judgment is no more than an opinion. The same view has also been expressed by a Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court in *The Collector of Gorakhpur v. Palakdhari Singh*⁸. Since s. 11 talks about collateral facts only as being relevant, a judgment, not being a fact, could not have been intended to be relevant under that section. Section 11, therefore, has no reference to judgments which are opinions in regard to the existence or non-existence of certain facts in dispute between parties. So far as s. 13 is concerned a judgment, not inter partes, can be relevant only if it falls under cls. (a) and (b) thereof and not otherwise. It is neither a transaction nor an instance. It is not relevant also under s. 11 as it is not a fact but a mere opinion as to the existence or otherwise of a fact.

But it is argued that although a judgment determining the value of another property may not fall either under s. 11 or s. 13 of the Evidence Act, it would still be admissible on general principles, for it would be illogical to admit evidence of a sale of another property and not to admit a judgment which has decided the value of another such property. Such a judgment, it is argued, may not be conclusive even with regard to the value of the property with which it is concerned; nonetheless it is relevant as a piece of evidence showing the value of that property. There are, however, difficulties in acceding to these arguments. The first difficulty is, as argued by the learned Advocate General, that whereas evidence as to a sale is subject to the test of cross-examination, a judgment is not. The second difficulty is that since such a judgment is not conclusive as it is conceded even by Mr. Laud, all the evidence on which that judgment depends must become evidence in a subsequent case and has to be subjected to the scrutiny of cross-examination. If a claimant relies on a previous judgment all that he would have to do would be to produce it, and although the burden of proof of showing a certain value of the property in question is on him, that burden in every case where such a judgment is produced would shift on the other side to establish that the determination of the value of the property involved in that case was not correct or valid. The third difficulty is that since such a judgment is admittedly not conclusive it would have to become subject to a review by another Court of an equally co-ordinate jurisdiction. Such a result could not have been intended by the draftsman of s. 11 or s. 13 of the Evidence Act.

But Mr. Land urged that a judgment in a Land Acquisition Reference must be admitted in evidence as an instance as it is a solemn determination of the value of the property involved in it by a competent Court and has consequently a better sanctity than evidence of a sale effected by private parties. He argued that such a judgment would be both a transaction and an instance within the meaning of s. 13 of the Evidence Act and has been so held in a number of decisions.

In support of this argument Mr. Land first relied on *Madan Mohan v. Secy of State*⁹, where a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court held that previous decisions in land acquisition cases are relevant in a subsequent land acquisition case where the market value of land in the same neighbourhood is in issue. There the question as to admissibility of a previous judgment arose in an appeal against an award passed by the Calcutta Improvement Tribunal whose President had disallowed the claimant to adduce evidence with regard to compensation paid to him in respect of other properties belonging to him under previous judgments. It was contended that such judgments were admissible and that the ruling given by the President of the Tribunal was erroneous. Dealing with this contention, the learned Judges observed that in assessing the market value of a certain land, price paid in transactions relating to other lands in the neighbourhood must be of some value, and though what their value is, it is for the Court to decide, a previous judgment for that reason cannot be rejected. For the view taken by them they relied on the decision of the Privy Council in *Secretary of State for India v. India General Steam Navigation and Railway Company*¹⁰, stating that that was a clear authority for the proposition that previous decisions in land acquisition cases are relevant in a subsequent case, where the market value of land in the same neighbourhood is in issue. Another decision relied on is that in *Secy. of State v. Amulya Charan*¹¹, where it was again held, relying on the same decision of the Privy Council, that prices, which are given by the Collector to persons whose lands are acquired and who accept them without protest, constitute valuable evidence in assessing the market value of the property in suit. Similarly in *Prithu Dyal v. Secy. of State*¹², decided by Tekchand and Walker JJ. certain awards made by the Collector in other acquisitions by Government were allowed to go in as evidence. Relying on these cases Mr. Land urged that awards made by the Collector and accepted by parties and previous judgments in respect of other properties in the neighbourhood of the property in question are admissible.

Now, the question as to admissibility of awards stands on a different footing than the one relating to judgments and, therefore, I will first deal with the question of awards. It is well-settled that an award made by a Land Acquisition Officer is not an admission binding on Government for the purposes of a Reference under s. 18 of the Land Acquisition Act. The Land Acquisition Officer occupies no better position than that of an agent of Government for the purpose of making an offer. That offer may be accepted or rejected by a claimant, who, if dissatisfied with it, may ask for a Reference. When the matter comes before the Court on such a Reference, it is the Court who has to determine the question of valuation on evidence and evidence alone. The award thus being a mere offer, it is difficult to see how it can become evidence in another case in which different parties and different properties are concerned. Besides, an offer is at best opinion evidence, which cannot become admissible, unless the person making the offer gives evidence about it. The decision reported in Prabhu Diyal v. Secy. of State, gives no reasons why such an award amounts to evidence binding on a person who is not a party to that award, nor does it mention any of the provisions of the Evidence Act under which it becomes relevant evidence. Allowing an award as evidence, besides, is inconsistent with its very nature for it is nothing which is final. It is at best an offer which is not binding either on the claimant or Government and is subject to its being set aside by a Court. The fact that it was accepted by a claimant without asking for a Reference is also immaterial for a claimant might not seek a Reference for fear that it would involve him into litigation involving costs and time. With great respect to the learned Judges who decided that case, it is not possible for me, therefore, to agree with the principle they are said to have laid down that an award is admissible evidence.

With regard to the question as to judgments not inter partes and dealing with other properties, it is necessary to observe that the two Calcutta decisions relied on by Mr. Laund also do not mention any of the provisions of the Evidence Act under which they are relevant. It is clear from the reports of these two decisions that the learned Judges who decided them relied solely on the decision in Secretary of State for India v. India General Steam Navigation and Railway Company as an authority. It becomes, therefore, necessary to see if that decision really lays down the principle which the two Calcutta decisions lay down. Though the Privy Council judgment is reported in 36 I.A. 200, a fuller report of it is to be had in Secretary of State for India v. India General Steam Navigation and Railway Company.¹³

The case arose out of acquisition of 53 bighas of land situate on Garden Reach Road bearing numbers, 6, 7 and 8. The land was acquired for improvement of the Kidderpore Docks at the instance of Port Commissioners of Calcutta. The Special Land Acquisition Judge of the 24 Parganas in a Reference made to him under s. 18 of the Land Acquisition Act estimated the value of the land at Rs. 500 per cottah against which an appeal was filed in the High Court claiming Rs. 1,000 per cottah and challenging the method of valuation adopted by the Special Judge. The High Court rejected the valuation placed by the Special Judge and awarded higher rates against which the Secretary of State appealed to the Privy Council. From the judgment of the High Court which is included in the report it appears that among other evidence two previous judgments of the High Court dealing with other lands in the vicinity were relied on by the claimant. At p. 971 of the report the High Court observed as follows:

"...But basing our valuation on the evidence given in this case on both sides and taking into consideration such evidence, as to rates of rent, sales and awards, we are inclined to value the land at very much the rates given by the learned Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Geldt for the land taken up at the corner of the Watganj and Garden Reach Roads. This land is very near, if it is not the nearest land, to the subject of this Reference, of the value of which we have evidence."

It is thus manifest that the High Court did take into account at least one of the two previous judgments admitted in evidence, viz. the one of the learned Chief Justice and Geldt J. and relying on it together with the other evidence raised the compensation. Before the Privy Council, Cohen K. C. who appeared for the Secretary of State argued that (p. 972):

"...The judgment in the previous case relied on by the High Court was not evidence in the present case of the value of the land in dispute. The land to which that judgment related had, by reason of its position in a highly congested business area at the junction of two traffic thoroughfares, a special and extraordinary value, and it had nothing in common with the land now in question which could form the basis of comparison between the two in estimating their respective values."

He argued further that the High Court had disregarded evidence relating to other lands which were more similar to the land in question and that the High Court had erred in setting aside the method of valuation adopted by the Special Judge and in ignoring the fact of his special knowledge in connection with such valuation. Mr. Land contended that from the summary of arguments it appeared that counsel for the Secretary of State did raise the question as to the admissibility of a previous judgment in another acquisition case and that the Privy Council assumed that such a judgment was relevant and did not, therefore, expressly answer that argument. That is not correct. If such a contention was in fact raised, counsel of the eminence of Sir R. Finlay, who appeared for the claimant, could not have remained silent over it. Lord Collins, who delivered the judgment of the Board, was also bound to deal with such an important contention. It appears, on the contrary, from the arguments of counsel that the contentions raised were mainly; (1) that the High Court erred in relying on valuation made in the previous judgment in respect of a property which was not comparable and which had special advantages and (2) that it also erred in discarding the method of valuation adopted by the Special Judge in view of his special knowledge of such cases.

As I read this judgment it is clear to me that the question whether such a previous judgment or award was admissible under the Evidence Act or not was not argued before the Privy Council and, therefore, the Board was not invited to decide that question. This is clearer still from the judgment itself. At p. 974 of the report, Lord Collins deals with the contentions of Cohen K. C. as follows:

"It seems to their Lordships that there is no question of principle involved in this appeal. In fact, the main argument of the appellant is a practical denial of the right of the High Court to review the findings of the Special Judge, whose great experience in such cases, they suggested, ought to outweigh all other considerations. Indeed, when one comes to close quarters with their objection to the decision, it seems to resolve itself to no more than this, that the Court gave undue weight to the prices paid on the sale of a particular piece of land in the vicinity as affording a guide to the compensation to be awarded in the case before them. It is by no means clear to their Lordships that there is any good ground for this suggestion."

I do not see either in this passage which deals with the contentions raised on behalf of the Secretary of State or anywhere else in the judgment Lord Collins either assuming or laying down the principle that a previous judgment in another acquisition case is admissible. That question was not raised before the Board and the Board did not answer it as it was not called upon to do so. With great respect to the learned Judges who decided the cases reported in Madan Mohan v. Secy. of State and Secy. of State v. Amulya Charan it is difficult to see how the decision in the Secretary of State for India v. India General Steam Navigation and Railway Company can be regarded as an authority for the proposition they laid down.

Another decision of the Privy Council to which my attention was drawn is to be found in Atmaram v. Collector of Nagpur,¹⁴ where some 258 acres of land belonging to 25 owners including the appellant were acquired. The Collector treated the entire land as purely agricultural and awarded Rs. 60 per acre. The other owners accepted the award but the appellant asked for a Reference asserting that the lands should be valued as building sites. The District Judge rejected the Collector's award holding that the lands should be valued on the basis of their being "problematical building sites in an undeveloped form" and valued them at Rs. 300 per acre. Against this decision Government filed an appeal before the Judicial Commissioner's Court of Nagpur in which the Collector emphasised as his main contention the inference to be deduced from the acceptance of the awards made by him by the owners of lands other than the land of the claimant. The claimant objected to this plea and claimed the right to cross-examine those owners and thereupon the Judicial Commissioners remanded the case to the District Judge to take evidence.

Evidence was taken accordingly but strangely those other owners, vouched by the Collector, were left to be called by the claimant and were cross-examined therefore not by him but by the Collector. Even so, the evidence was that they accepted the awards not because they were satisfied with them but because they did not wish to involve themselves in litigation or because they did not have the necessary funds to launch such litigation. Ignoring this fact and the rest of the evidence, the Judicial Commissioners relied only on the fact of the acceptance of the awards by those other owners, and reversed on the strength of that fact the decision given by the District Judge and restored the award of the Collector. The Privy Council held that the Judicial Commissioners erred in ignoring all the considerations pertinent to the claimant's own lands and in founding themselves exclusively on the evidence of the price accepted for other plots by those other owners, the conditions of which were not fully before them.

Now it is true that the awards made in respect of lands other than that of the claimant and the fact of their having been accepted were admitted in evidence. Mr. Laud relied, therefore, on this decision and argued that in this case also the Privy Council did not observe that the awards were not admissible or that they had been wrongly allowed to go in evidence. But that is a wrong way of viewing this decision. The mere fact that the Privy Council did not say that the awards were wrongly inserted in evidence does not mean that their Lordships therefore laid down the proposition that such awards were admissible as canvassed by Mr. Laud. It is clear from the judgment of the Privy Council that that question was again not raised before their Lordships nor was it dealt with by them. That question was not raised on behalf of the claimant probably because on merits there was clear evidence that those other owners had accepted the awards made in respect of their lands not because they considered them to be satisfactory but because of want of funds to proceed further and because of their unwillingness to involve themselves in litigation. Since acceptance in such circumstances could not make those awards conclusive on the question as to the market value of the claimant's lands, the Privy Council interfered and set aside the judgment of the Judicial Commissioners. The point whether awards in respect of other lands are relevant has thus not been dealt with in this decision. Therefore this decision again cannot be taken as an authority on that point.

The last case referred to me was *Ram Banjan Chuckerbutty v. Ram Narain Singh*¹⁵. The principle deducible from this decision is that certain decrees previously passed, to which the plaintiff's predecessors-in-title were not parties but which sustained the defendants' claim to hold the lands in dispute at certain fixed rents relating to which the plaintiffs had filed the present suits for ejectment, were admissible in evidence as showing ancient possession and assertion of title many years ago and those decrees taken along with other evidence showed defendants' possession at a uniform rate for so long a period as to raise a presumption that the tenure was of a permanent nature. It is thus clear that the decrees though not inter partes were admitted in evidence as showing the fact of the defendants having claimed as tenants the right to possession in the past and that right having been recognised. The ground of admission of these decrees in evidence is, therefore, quite different than the one submitted by Mr. Laud for admission of Mr. Justice Tendolkar's judgment. It was a ground which clearly fell under s. 13 of the Evidence Act.

In my view the Privy Council decisions relied on by Mr. Laud do not lay down the principle that a judgment not inter partes and relating to other land is admissible as either an instance or one from which the market value of the property in question can be deduced or inferred. Such a judgment cannot obviously fall under ss. 40 to 43 or under s. 11 or s. 13 of the Evidence Act. The decisions of the High Court of Calcutta cited by Mr. Laud cannot, with great respect, be accepted as authorities for the proposition that a previous judgment not inter partes and with reference to other land is admissible, for those decisions are based solely on the Privy Council decision in Secretary of State for India v. India General Steam Navigation and Railway Company, which lays down no such principle. So far as the decision in Prabhk Dyal v. Secy. of State is concerned it is one which is contrary to the well-recognised concept of an award of a Land Acquisition Officer and, therefore, again with respect, I cannot follow it. On the other hand, I find myself supported in the view I take by the observations of Mr. Justice Macleod, as he then was, in Government of Bombay, In the matter of: Karim Tar Muhamad, In the matter of,¹⁶ where the learned Judge declined to take into consideration the amount awarded by a previous judgment of this Court for another property remarking that he could not obviously do so without considering all the evidence on which that judgment was founded and that the judgment by itself was no evidence for the market value of the property in question.

For the reasons aforesaid I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of Tendolkar J. sought to be included in evidence is not admissible and the contention of Mr. Laud must, therefore, be rejected.

MUDHOLKAR J. This is a second appeal by the plaintiffs and arises out of a suit instituted by them for a declaration that they have a right to take earth from field No. 111 of manza Shegaon Buzruk belonging to the respondent for preparing earthen pots and for a permanent injunction restraining the respondent from obstructing them from taking earth from this field.

It is common ground that this field was the banjar land of the lamberdar and was purchased from him by the respondent on December 13, 1948. The appellants' claim is that the kumbhars of the village have a customary right to remove the earth from the western side of this field and that there is actually in existence a pit on that side. The existence of this pit is admitted by the respondent, according to whom, its dimensions are 25' x 20' x 4'. The sole question to be determined in this case is whether the appellants have acquired a customary right to take earth from the aforesaid pit. Whether this custom exists or not is a mixed question of fact and law.

What has been established in this case is that the kumbhars of the aforesaid village used to take earth from the pit on the western side, mix it with the earth of the village tank and then prepare earthen pots out of their mixture and that they have been doing so for about 30 years. Could it be said that this is a good custom, and if so, whether it could be recognized by the Court on the ground that it has been in existence for a long time?

It may be mentioned at the outset that Shri Mangalmurti, who appears for the respondent, relying upon the decisions in *Bholanath Nundi v. Midnapore Zemindary Company Limited*¹ and *Lakshmidhar Misra v. Rangalal*² contended, in the first place, that a custom of this kind should have been in existence from time immemorial. In the first mentioned case, their Lordships mentioned the fact that the plaintiffs had claimed a right of pasturage over the waste lands on the ground that the right was enjoyed by them and their predecessors from time immemorial. Dealing with this point their Lordships observed in their judgment:

"...the right of pasturage claimed has been enjoyed by the plaintiffs and their predecessors from time immemorial—from the time of the Hindu Rajahs long before the Watsons had anything to do with the property."

From this it would be clear that the expression 'time immemorial' was understood by their Lordships not in the sense in which it was understood, i.e., prior to the year 1189, but in a different sense. No doubt, in the second mentioned case, their Lordships have observed (p. 59):

"...What the Courts have required of a custom, if the law is to uphold it as a right, is that it should be immemorial in origin, certain and reasonable in nature and continuous in use. It is by these tests that the appellants' claim in this case must be tried." The Courts referred to by their Lordships were the Courts in England. In that case, however, their Lordships have not considered what was exactly intended to be understood by the expression 'time immemorial'. Indeed, all that was established in that case appears to be that the right claimed was exercised from generation to generation and nothing more. In the circumstances and in view of other decisions of their Lordships, I do not think it will be proper to infer that the expression 'immemorial origin' is to be understood in India in the same sense as in England. In this connection I may refer to *Musammatt Subhani v. Nawab*³ in which their Lordships have observed:

"...It will depend upon the circumstances of each case what antiquity must be established before the custom can be accepted. What is necessary to be proved is that the usage has been acted upon in practice for such a long period and with such invariability as to show that it has, by common consent, been submitted to as the established governing rule of the particular district."

Again, in *Baba Narayan Lakras v. Saboosa*⁴ their Lordships have observed that in India a custom need not be immemorial, and all that is required is the evidence of long usage, and quoted with approval the following from *Kuar Sen v. Mamman*⁵:

"...The statute law of India does not prescribe any period of enjoyment during which, in order to establish a local custom, it must be proved that a right claimed to have been enjoyed as by local custom was enjoyed." (p. 82).

I, therefore, do not accept the argument advanced on this point by Shri Mangalmurti.

Then Shri Mangalmurti says that the right exercised by the appellants cannot be upheld as a customary right inasmuch as what the appellants claim to have done was with the tacit approval and consent of the owner. In this connection he referred to an admission of the plaintiffs contained in the application made by them to the Tahsildar to the effect that they used to give some earthen pots to the malguzar. Now, in the first place, it is not clear from this whether such pots were given annually or at any fixed interval or otherwise; nor is it clear whether the pots were given by way of consideration for permitting the appellants to remove and utilise the earth from the field or merely as presents. It would not, therefore, be safe or proper to infer from this circumstance that the kumbhars removed the earth from the field with the approval and consent of the malguzar.

Then Shri Mangalmurti says that there is no certainty about the custom because the appellants are not themselves sure as to the exact portion of the field from which they could remove earth. No doubt, the plaint only says that the appellants have a right to remove the earth from the western half portion of the field and does not make any further specification as to the exact place from which they have the customary right to remove the earth. However, it has come in evidence that they exercised their right only over that portion of the field which is covered by the pit in question.

In *Mohidin v. Shivalingappa*⁶ a similar objection was taken. Dealing with it, the learned Judges observed (p. 670):

"...Here the defendants have, it is true, failed to set any limit to the space which they wish to use as a burial ground. But we must not confuse their wishes and their rights. They wish for the privilege of burial all over survey No. 1134. Their right according to custom as found by Assistant Judge seems to be to bury round about the darga. Because they fail to prove all they wish, there seems no reason for denying them the rights which they establish. A plaintiff may claim Rs. 1000, but if the evidence shows that he is only entitled to Rs. 100, he will get a decree for the latter sum albeit his claim as stated is not fully proved. What then is the uncertainty connected with this right of burial? There is no uncertainty as to the class of persons who have been in the habit of burying near the darga. It is not denied that the defendants belong to that class... The only point which can be said to be uncertain relates to the limits within which burials must be made. Those limits have not been defined. But we think that they are sufficiently indicated by the restriction of the right to a limited class and by the obligation to bury near the darga."

The learned Judges, therefore, upheld the custom, limiting it of course to that portion of the darga which was referred to in the evidence as having been used as the burial ground. The same can be done in this case.

Shri Mangalmurti then stated that the custom pleaded is not reasonable, because as a result of it the respondent will not be able to use this field for cultivation. Now, if the right is restricted to this pit, it is difficult to see how the respondent will be prevented from cultivating the field. In a case of this kind a direction similar to the one given by their Lordships in Bholanath's case could be made. In that case the villagers had claimed a right of pasturage over the waste lands belonging to the defendants. Their right was affirmed by their Lordships but they amended the decree of the Subordinate Judge in terms providing that the plaintiffs should not prevent the defendants or their successors-in-title from cultivating or executing improvements upon the waste lands in question so long as sufficient pasturage is left for the plaintiffs and the other persons entitled to the right of pasturage claimed, with liberty to the parties, from time to time, in case of difference, to apply to the Subordinate Judge as they may be advised.

The last argument, and which is the strongest argument, urged is that the claim is in the nature of a right in gross or profits a prendre, and where such a right is claimed by a fluctuating body of persons, it cannot be acquired by a custom. According to Shri Mangalmurti, it could be acquired by dedication or grant. He points out that it has not been alleged by the appellants that their right originated in either of these ways. In support of his contention he relies upon a large number of cases, starting from *Lutchmeeput Singh v. Sadaulla Nushyo*⁷. The other cases are: *Syed Ali v. Sarjan Ali*⁸; *Abdul Hosain v. Sadai Gobinda*⁹; *Kunja Paria v. Nitya Nanda*¹⁰; *Brajendra Kishore Roy Chowdhury v. Bama Charan Kaivarta*¹¹; *Arjun Kaibarta v. Manoranjan De Bhoumik*¹²; and many other cases.

Indeed, it has been pointed out at page 9 in Joshi's Easements and Licenses, Second edn.:

"Though in England, as well as in India, customary rights in gross in alieno solo in favour of a fluctuating body of persons have been recognised freely, yet in England it may be taken as settled law that a fluctuating and uncertain body of persons cannot claim a profit-a-prendre by custom; for, such rights are deemed unreasonable, as they tend to destroy the subject-matter of the right itself. In the case of Lutchmeeput Singh v. Sadaulla Nushyo the Calcutta High Court refused to recognize fishery rights in favour of a fluctuating body of persons, and thus followed the principles of English law. A different view has however been taken by the Patna High Court in *Maharajahadur v. Gandhori Singh*¹³ where a right to hunt in a certain forest and to appropriate the game hunted therein was recognized in favour of a fluctuating body of persons. With submission it is suggested that the judgment of the Patna High Court in the last mentioned case, if as widely applied as proposed therein, would cause much hardship to private owners by making their tenements liable to subserve to the uncertain needs of a fluctuating body of persons. (*Brajendra v. Ishwar Kitabla*¹⁴)"

Therefore, if it is accepted that a fluctuating body of persons cannot acquire by custom a profit-a-prendre, it cannot be said that the villagers or a particular community in a village can be regarded as a fluctuating body of persons. In Bholanath's case the right to graze cattle on waste lands was claimed by the persons living in the village on the ground that all the villagers had such a right. It was not negatived on the ground that such body of persons must be regarded as fluctuating and, therefore, incapable of acquiring a customary right by long usage. Now, it may be mentioned that the right of pasturage claimed was not by way of an easement but it was claimed by way of a customary right. It seems to me, therefore, that this decision would afford a complete answer to the argument of the learned counsel Shri Mangalmurti.

In *Rushi Bhiku v. Rushi Sheoram*¹⁵ a right of this kind was claimed by the kumbhars of a particular village on the ground of custom and was upheld by the Court of Judicial Commissioner. It may be mentioned that in that case it was found that the right was exercised for a period of 20 years. In the present case, the right has been exercised for over 30 years. In the circumstances, therefore, I see no reason for not upholding the right.

Accordingly, I allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the lower appellate Court and restore that of the trial Court. Costs throughout will be borne by the respondent.

Appeal allowed.

THE ORIENTAL METAL PRESSING WORKS (PRIVATE) LTD. v.
BHASKAR KASHINATH THAKOOR.*

Companies Act (1 of 1956), Secs. 312, 345, 2(13) & (28), 9—Transfer of office of managing director by will—Whether such transfer permissible.

Section 312 of the Companies Act, 1956, prohibits the assignment or transfer of the office of a director as well as a managing director, whether by a deed inter vivos or by a will.

ONE Dadoba Kashinath Thakoor, who was carrying on as sole proprietor a business of iron foundries and metal pressers in the firm name of Oriental Metal Pressing Works, sold this business to a private limited company named the Oriental Metal Pressing Works Ltd. (defendant No. 1) which was incorporated on May 26, 1955. The first directors of defendant No. 1 were Dadoba Kashinath Thakoor, his brother Bhaskar Kashinath Thakoor (plaintiff) and one of his sons Govind (defendant No. 2). On July 7, 1955, an agreement was entered into between Dadoba and defendant No. 1 whereunder Dadoba was appointed managing director of defendant No. 1 and he was entitled to hold that office for life. Under the agreement Dadoba was allotted a certain number of fully paid up shares of defendant No. 1. Clause 7 of the agreement was in the following terms:—

"Mr. Thakoor shall be entitled by deed inter vivos or by will or codicil to appoint any person to be a Managing Director in his place and stead and in default of such appointment the legal representatives of Mr. Thakoor shall be entitled to exercise the said power. Any appointee as aforesaid shall whilst holding office also be designated as a Managing Director and shall be entitled to be paid by the Company the same remuneration and to exercise the same powers and authorities as are vested in Mr. Thakoor and the appointee as aforesaid shall have a power of appointing any person to be Managing Director as his successor on the remuneration of not less than Rs. 1,000 (Rupees One thousand) per month and upon the same other terms and conditions as are herein contained."

The terms of the agreement were embodied in Article 109 of the Articles of Association of defendant No. 1, the relevant part of which was as follows:—

"Mr. Thakoor shall be entitled by deed inter vivos or by will or codicil to appoint any person to be Managing Director in his place and stead and in default of such appointment, the legal representatives of the said Shri Dadoba Kashinath Thakoor shall be entitled to exercise the power."

Dadoba died on January 14, 1957, leaving a will whereunder he appointed defendant No. 2 to be the Managing Director of defendant No. 1 from the date of his demise. By virtue of his appointment as Managing Director under Dadoba's will, defendant No. 2 began to act as Managing Director and the Chairman of the Board of Directors of defendant No. 1 and he also began to draw Rs. 3,500 per month as his salary.

The plaintiff challenged the validity of defendant No. 2's appointment as Managing Director and his right to convene meetings of the Board of Directors and refused to attend these meetings. In June 1957 the plaintiff received a letter from defendant No. 2 informing him that he had ceased to be a Director of defendant No. 1 under s. 283(g) of the Companies Act, 1956, and Article 85(F) of the Articles of Association of defendant No. 1, owing to his absence without leave at three consecutive meetings of the Board of Directors and/or at all such meetings for a continuous period of three months. Defendant No. 2 appointed one B. P. Sabnis (defendant No. 3) as Director in place of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff filed the present suit against the defendants inter alia for a declaration that he was and continued to be a Director of defendant No. 1, that the appointment of defendant No. 2 as Managing Director of defendant No. 1 was void, invalid and inoperative and that the appointment of defendant No. 3 as a Director was invalid, illegal and inoperative. The trial Judge decreed the plaintiff's suit, observing in the course of his judgment as follows:—

"...The question to be decided in the present case is whether the expression 'assignment' in s. 312 necessarily means only 'transfer inter vivos'. Wording of s. 312 does not throw light on the question whether the expression 'assignment' is used in a restricted sense. The word 'any' in s. 312 only indicates that all assignments are hit by s. 312, but the question is what is the scope of the expression 'assignment'. Is it used in a restricted sense? Section 2 of the Companies Act does not define the word 'assignment'. Where the Legislature intends to restrict or enlarge the meaning of a particular expression, it does so by defining that expression in the 'definition section'. If the object of the Legislature was to restrict the expression 'assignment' in s. 312 only to transfers inter vivos, it would have done so by defining that expression. In the Transfer of Property Act, s. 5 defines the expression 'transfer of property' and restricts it to 'transfer by acts inter vivos'. The relevant portion of s. 5 reads thus:

'In the following sections "transfer of property" means an act by which a living person conveys property at present or in future to one or more other living persons...' Thus the Legislature has made it clear that in the Transfer of Property Act, wherever the expression 'transfer of property' is used it means transfer by an act inter vivos. No such provision seems to have been made in the Indian Companies Act of 1956. If the object of the Legislature is not to allow a director to transfer his office to another person, and thus impose that person on the company as a director without consulting the company—and this object seems to be clear from the relevant provisions of the Companies Act—there seems to be no reason why the expression 'assignment' should be given a restricted meaning, and should be confined to transfer by act inter vivos. From the above quotations from Stroud's Judicial Dictionary and Iyer's Law Lexicon it is clear that it cannot be said that the expression 'assignment' can in no case refer to devise by a will. For the reasons stated above I am unable to accept the contention that the expression 'assignment' in s. 312 necessarily means only a transfer by an act inter vivos.

Mr. Banaji further urged that s. 312 uses the expression 'director' and not 'managing director', and hence s. 312 cannot apply to the facts of this suit. Section 2(26) defines 'managing director'. That definition clearly shows that 'the managing director' is necessarily a director, and there can be no doubt that the expression 'director' in s. 312 must necessarily include 'the managing director'. In my opinion s. 312 would apply to the assignment of the office of the 'managing director' as it necessarily includes the office of a 'director'.

It was further urged on behalf of defendants Nos. 1 to 3 that defendant No. 2 was and is 'a director' of defendant No. 1 company, and what was assigned to him by Dadoba is merely the additional powers of the managing director, and hence s. 312 would not apply. It is true that defendant No. 2 was already a director when he was nominated as the next managing director by the deceased Dadoba under his will, and also on the date when the provisions of the said will came into operation. But that would not help defendant No. 2, if in view of s. 312 read with s. 9, art. 109(b) and the corresponding clause in the agreement dated July 7, 1955, exh. 2 must be deemed to be void and hence non-existent in the eyes of the law from April 1, 1956, the date on which the Indian Companies Act of 1956 came into force. The relevant portion of art. 109(b) as well as the corresponding clause in the agreement dated July 7, 1955, read thus:

"The said Shri Dadoba Kashinath Thakoor may by deed inter vivos or by will or codicil appoint any person to be a managing director in his place and stead...' Thus art. 109(b) as well as the corresponding clause in the agreement dated July 7, 1955, authorised the said Dadoba Thakoor to transfer his office, which necessarily included a director's office, to 'any person', whether a director or not, by will or codicil or by deed inter vivos. It is obvious that this would be inconsistent with s. 312 of the Companies Act, and hence it must be held that the above-said provision in the articles of association and the agreement dated July 7, 1955, became void, and thus non-existent in the eyes of 'law' since April 1, 1956, the date on which the Indian Companies Act, 1956, came into force. It is not disputed before me that the deceased Dadoba Thakoor exercised his powers under art. 109(b) and the corresponding clause in the agreement dated July 7, 1955, in appointing by his will, defendant No. 2 as the next managing director. The said will was made on August 18, 1956, i.e. after the Companies Act of 1956 came into force, the deceased Dadoba had no right to do so, and hence the appointment of defendant No. 2 as the next managing director under that will must be held to be invalid.

Mr. Bhatt for defendant No. 2 urged that defendant No. 2 does not want to claim any right under any of the provisions of the Companies Act with regard to a managing director, and therefore the definition in s. 2(26) would have no bearing. The question for determination is whether the appointment of defendant No. 2 by the deceased Dadoba by his will is valid or not. I have quoted above the relevant passage from Dadoba's will, and there can be no doubt that Dadoba exercised the power given to him by art. 109(b) and the corresponding clause in the agreement dated July 7, 1955, in appointing defendant No. 2 as his successor. Plaintiff relies on the definition given in s. 2(26) to show that the office of a managing director would necessarily include the office of a director and hence s. 312 would apply. The fact that defendant No. 2 does not in this suit claim or seek to enforce any of the provisions of the Act with regard to a managing director would not, in my opinion, be relevant while considering the question whether the expression 'director', rather 'any director' would include 'managing director' or not. While considering that expression reference to the definitions of 'director' and 'managing director' would certainly be permissible.

It was further urged on behalf of defendants Nos. 1 to 3 that the board of directors could delegate their power of appointing a managing director to the deceased Dadoba, they had done so, there is no prohibition in the Companies Act against such delegation, and hence appointment of defendant No. 2 as the managing director is valid. Article 105 of the articles of association lays down that the directors may from time to time appoint one or more of their body to be a managing director. If the board of directors had delegated to the deceased Dadoba only their power to appoint one of them as the managing director as his successor, that perhaps may have been valid. But that is not what has in fact happened. The relevant portion of deceased Dadoba's will quoted above clearly indicates that he exercised powers conferred on him by art. 109(b) and the corresponding clause in the agreement dated July 7, 1955, which—as I have said above—must be deemed to be void, non-existent in the eyes of law. Hence appointment made in exercise of power non-existent in the eyes of law must be held to be invalid. The mere fact that the 'appointee' i.e. defendant No. 2 happens to be a director cannot validate the appointment. Paragraph 5 of the deceased Dadoba's will quoted above does in no way indicate that he took into account the fact that defendant No. 2 was already a director, and he merely assigned his additional powers which he enjoyed as the managing director. In view of this I must hold that defendant No. 2's appointment as the managing director by the will of the deceased Dadoba Thakoor is invalid, and not binding on the plaintiff and defendant No. 1 company."

The defendants appealed to the High Court. The appeal was heard by S. T. Desai and K. T. Desai JJ. S. T. Desai J. was of the view that the plaintiff was entitled to the reliefs sought by him and that the appeal should be dismissed whereas K. T. Desai J. was of the view that the appeal should be allowed and the plaintiff's suit dismissed. Their Lordships referred the following points, on which they had differed, to one or more of the other Judges of the High Court as the Hon'ble the Chief Justice might be pleased to direct.

"(1) Whether the second appellant [defendant No. 2] was validly appointed Managing Director of the first appellant company,

(2) Whether the first respondent (plaintiff) ceased to be a director of the company, and

(3) Whether the third appellant [defendant No. 3] has been validly appointed a Director of the company."

Their Lordships' judgments, which were delivered on November 17 & 18, 1958, were as follows:—

S. T. DESAI J. This appeal raises an important question of construction of s. 312 of the new Companies Act which section now imposes total prohibition against any assignment of his office by a director. The prohibition applies in case of both a public and a private limited company. The facts are not in dispute nor disputable. Appellant No. 1 (original defendant No. 1) is a private limited company incorporated on May 21, 1955. Prior to that Dadoba Kashinath Thakoor was the sole proprietor of a business of metal pressing works which he carried on in the firm name of Oriental Metal Pressing Works. Appellant No. 1 company acquired that business as a going concern. The agreement dated July 7, 1955, between Dadoba and the company states that Dadoba was appointed managing director of the company and was entitled to hold that office for life. Clause 7 of that agreement is as under:—

"Mr. Thakoor shall be entitled by deed inter vivos or by will or codicil to appoint any person to be a Managing Director in his place and stead and in default of such appointment the legal representatives of Mr. Thakoor shall be entitled to exercise the said power. Any appointee as aforesaid shall while holding office also be designated as a Managing Director and shall be entitled to be paid by the Company the same remuneration and to exercise the same powers and authorities as are vested in Mr. Thakoor and the appointee as aforesaid shall have a power of appointing any person to be Managing Director as his successor on the remuneration of not less than Rs. 1,000 (Rupees One thousand) per month and upon the same other terms and conditions as are herein contained."

Under the agreement Dadoba was to be allotted a certain number of fully paid up shares of the company. Article 109 of the articles of association of the company is material and is as under:

"109. (a) The said Shri Dadoba Kashinath Thakoor shall be the first Managing Director of the company at a remuneration of Rs. 2,500 per month subject to the said remuneration being increased by the Board of Directors of the Company. He shall be entitled to hold such office for life and will not be subject to clauses 87, 88 and 91 of these Articles;

(b) The said Shri Dadoba Kashinath Thakoor may by deed inter vivos or by will or codicil appoint any person to be a Managing Director in his place and stead and in default of such appointment, the legal representatives of the said Shri Dadoba Kashinath Thakoor shall be entitled to exercise the power;

(c) Any appointee as aforesaid shall, whilst holding office, also be designated a Managing Director and shall be entitled to the same remuneration and to exercise the same powers and authorities as were vested in the Managing Director in whose place and stead he is appointed;

(d) The appointee as aforesaid shall have a power of appointing any person to be a managing director as his successor on the remuneration of not less than Rs. 1,000 per month and with the same powers as are vested in Shri Dadoba Kashinath Thakoor." Dadoba died on January 14, 1957. By his will executed on August 18, 1956, he appointed his son, appellant No. 2 (original defendant No. 2) to be the managing director of the company from the date of his demise. Respondent No. 1 to the appeal (plaintiff to the suit) is the brother of Dadoba. Respondent No. 2 to the appeal (original defendant No. 4) is another son of Dadoba. The first directors of the company were (1) Dadoba; (2) Bhaskar; and (3) Govind, one of the sons of Dadoba. The same persons continued to be directors till January 14, 1957, when Dadoba died. At the time of Dadoba's death, the shares of the company were held as under:

Dadoba		1,917 shares.
Plaintiff		845 shares.
Defendant No. 2		844 shares.
Defendant No. 4		843 shares.

We are told that Dadoba died leaving 3 sons and his shares were inherited by his three sons as part of his estate.

Disputes arose between the plaintiff and defendant No. 2 soon after Dadoba's death when the latter assumed the managing directorship and chairmanship of the board of directors of the company on the basis of the appointment made by the will of Dadoba. Defendant No. 2 began to act as the managing director and the chairman of the board of directors of the company and also began to draw a salary of Rs. 3,500 per month. The plaintiff addressed letters to defendant No. 2 on March 23, 1957, and March 29, 1957, and contended that defendant No. 2 had no right to act as managing director and/or chairman of the board of directors of the company. He also contended that defendant No. 2 had no authority to call a meeting of the board of directors as he had purported to do and that the appointment of defendant No. 2 as managing director of the company by the will of Dadoba was not valid and not binding on the plaintiff or the company. Correspondence ensued in the course of which defendant No. 2 contended that he was the managing director and entitled to call meetings and conduct the business of the company as its managing director. The plaintiff contended that the power of Dadoba to appoint a managing director by his will given by the articles of association and the agreement was invalid, illegal and inoperative on the ground that in the meantime the new Indian Companies Act had come into force and the provisions of that enactment rendered any such power invalid and illegal. The plaintiff also contended that defendant No. 2 was acting in his own interest and in a manner detrimental to the interest of the company. He made reference to the agenda of a meeting dated May 13, 1957, which included an item viz. "To consider the provision for bonus to late Shri Dadoba Kashinath Thakoor in his capacity as the Managing Director". The plaintiff also contended that defendant No. 2 claimed to be the beneficiary under the will of Dadoba and his attempts were to add to the estate of Dadoba to the detriment of the company. In the last week of June, 1957, the plaintiff received a letter dated June 28, 1957, from defendant No. 2 alleging that the plaintiff had ceased to be a director of the company under s. 283(g) of the Companies Act and art. 85(f) of the articles of association of the company owing to his absence without leave at three consecutive meetings of the board of directors and/or at all such meetings for a continuous period of three months. The plaintiff brought a suit for a declaration that he was and continued to be a director of defendant No. 1 company and was entitled to act as such. He also sought a declaration that the appointment of defendant No. 2 as a managing director and/or chairman of the board of directors of the defendant No. 1 company was void, invalid and inoperative. He also sought a declaration that the appointment of defendant No. 3 as a director was invalid, illegal and inoperative. It seems that some time before the suit was filed, defendant No. 2 in the purported exercise of his powers had co-opted defendant No. 3 as a director of the company. The plaintiff also sought relief by way of certain injunction in that suit. He asked for an injunction restraining defendant No. 2 from acting as managing director of the company and for an injunction against defendant No. 3 restraining him from acting as a director of the company. He also sought a further injunction restraining the defendants from holding an annual general meeting of the company which was proposed to be held on November 28, 1957. In the suit, he impleaded the company as defendant No. 1. Defendant No. 3 to the suit (appellant No. 3), as I have already mentioned, was co-opted by defendant No. 2 as a director of the company. Various issues were raised by the learned Judge, City Civil Court, who tried the suit. It is not necessary for the purpose of the present narrative to state them and it will suffice to observe that the main question which had to be determined by the learned Judge was whether the appointment of defendant No. 2 as the managing director of the company by the will of Dadoba was invalid and ineffective in law by operation of s. 312 of the new Companies Act. That section, as I shall have occasion to point out little later, appears under the heading "miscellaneous provisions" and is as under:

"Prohibition of assignment of office by a director.—Any assignment of his office made after the commencement of this Act by any director of a company shall be void." It will be convenient here to set out s. 9 of the new Companies Act which is as under:

"Act to override memorandum, articles, etc.—Save as otherwise expressly provided in the Act—

(a) the provisions of this Act shall have effect notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in the memorandum or articles of a company, or in any agreement executed by it, or in any resolution passed by the company in general meeting or by its Board of Directors, whether the same be registered, executed or passed, as the case may be, before or after the commencement of this Act; and

(b) any provision contained in the memorandum, articles, agreement or resolution aforesaid shall, to the extent to which it is repugnant to the provisions of this Act, become or be void, as the case may be."

The expressions 'director' and 'managing director' are defined in the Act. I shall refer to those definitions a little later when examining one of the arguments urged on behalf of the appellants. It will be noticed that the marginal note to s. 312 suggests that the section lays down a prohibition of assignment of office by a director and the section is in terms of such prohibition. The learned Judge took the view that the object of the Legislature in imposing the prohibition laid down in s. 312 was that a director should not be clothed with the power to transfer his office to any person whether by an act inter vivos or by a testamentary instrument. He reached the conclusion that the expression "assignment" in the section should not be given a restricted meaning but must be read in a broad sense as applicable also to an appointment of any person as managing director of the company made by his will by a managing director to come into effect on his demise. He upheld the contentions of the plaintiff and gave the declarations and the injunctions sought by him. The Company and defendants Nos. 2 and 3 have now come to this Court in this appeal.

The first and the principal contention of the appellants pressed before us by Mr. Maneksha, learned counsel for the appellants, is that the appointment of defendant No. 2 as a managing director made by Dadoba by his will is not "an assignment of an office" within the meaning of that expression in s. 312. It is said that what art. 109 conferred on Dadoba is not any power of assignment but merely a power of appointment. It is also said that the word "assignment" means actual transfer. A transfer of office by a director, it is stressed, can only be by an act inter vivos and in no circumstances by a testamentary instrument. The greatest emphasis has been laid on the factor that on his death Dadoba naturally ceased to be a managing director. The argument has been stressed in the form of an interrogation: By will a person can bequeath any property; he can by an act inter vivos transfer any property. But how can a person transfer something which is non-existent?—something he ceased to hold immediately on his demise? It will be noticed that the argument is founded in the context of property and not of an office of a director which is purely personal and is not property. It is impossible to contend, says Mr. Maneksha, that there could be any assignment when Dadoba's appointment as managing director was only for his life and nothing was left for him to give at the point of time of his death. It is said that this is the most crucial question.

At first blush the argument, under the latter head, that a person cannot transfer what he has not got may perhaps seem somewhat attractive from a sheer legal point of view, however repugnant it may be to the object of the Legislature in laying down the absolute bar against the transfer of an office of a director. But on closer examination I think it defective even from the legal standpoint in paying too little attention to a number of relevant and material considerations, which, in my judgment, must weigh with the Court on this question of interpretation of the rule which aims to prevent use and abuse of a power. The argument, if I may so describe it, asks us to apply to the situation before us the maxim Nemo dat quod non habet—you cannot give what you do not have; you cannot give what you do not have the right to give. The equivalent maxim is assignatus utitur jure auctoris—An assignee is clothed only with the right of his principal. Now, these maxims pithily express one of the leading rules as to titles and tersely state the well-known general rule that no man can transfer a greater right or interest in property than he himself possesses, and if he has none, he can give no title whatever to the property which is the subject-matter of the transaction.

The principle of these maxims is indubitably sound and it has bearing firstly on the quantity and secondly on the quality or nature of interest in property which can be assigned by the owner to another party. Now, what Mr. Maneksha contends for is the same principle but the contention assumes as a major premise an equivalence between the nature of a right or interest in property and the office of a director which by no stretch of argument can be termed as property or any interest or right in property. Such an equation, to my mind, is impermissible. We have nothing to do with any right or interest in property nor are we concerned with any question of title or transmission of a title which could or could not vest in Dadoba. The question before us is not whether a person can or cannot give what he has not got. The question is whether a director in a public or private company, who is empowered by the articles of association of a company to appoint another person in his place and stead by an act inter vivos or by his will, can be said to assign that office to the latter when he does so by an act inter vivos or by his will. It has not been possible for Mr. Maneksha to dispute that if this was done during the lifetime of the director by an act inter vivos it would be an assignment and hit by s. 312, though at one stage of the argument that position was not accepted. But that line had to be abandoned in view of the language of certain sections in the Act and particularly s. 86B of the repealed Act of 1913 and the proviso to the same to which I shall refer a little later. This present argument of learned counsel for the appellants is founded on certain observations of the learned editors of Gore-Browne's work on Companies Law, and it will be necessary for me to quote the same and examine them when I refer to s. 86B of our repealed Act of 1913. It will suffice here to state that those observations are made in the context of a private company and not a director of a public company, and even in the context of a director of a private company the opinion of editors of standard treatises on Companies law in England, as I shall point out, is to treat that point as one in dubio. Besides the point has little cogency since there is no section in the English law analogous to s. 312 of our Act of 1956.

We are concerned primarily and principally with the connotation of the expression "assignment of his office...by a director" and the legal inhibition contained in the section which is applicable in case of a director both in a public and a private company and the question is can he, if the articles of association permit it, appoint a person to be the director of the company in his place and stead by making such appointment by his will or is he prohibited by s. 312 from doing so notwithstanding such articles since s. 9 renders void any such articles which are repugnant to any provisions of the Act. Section 312 applies equally to a director in a public and a private company, and I have stressed that aspect because considerable emphasis was laid on behalf of the appellants on the fact that there are cases where an owner of a business transfers it to a private limited company and he is appointed a managing director of the company with powers to appoint any person in his place and stead by a deed or will as for instance in the case before us. I am not concerned with the object of giving such powers but with the validity of such powers, and the considerations relating to the object of conferring such powers in case of a private company would mostly be irrelevant in the case of a director of a public company. The prohibition in s. 312 is imposed for an object which I shall point out little later can be gathered from the enactment itself. I prefer in the first place to examine the language of the section itself and shall turn to an enquiry as to its object only in so far as it is permissible and required by the well-known canon of construction that the meaning of the words of a statute is to be found not so much in strictly grammatical or in etymological propriety of language, nor even in its popular use, as in the subject, or in the occasion on which they are used and the object to be attained. Of this more hereafter.

The crucial consideration, therefore, is not that a person cannot transfer something which he has not got. But it must be as to what is the connotation of the expression "assignment" in the context of an office of a director which, indisputably, is not property or any right or interest in property. The Legislature has said that a director cannot assign his office, meaning thereby that he cannot transfer it to any other person. It is not questioned and could not be questioned that transfer of the office of a director in any shape or form is expressly prohibited by the statute. The crux of the matter, therefore, is what is it that is prohibited when it is enacted that you cannot assign the office of a director of a company. Now, one thing is clear that in case of a prohibition or restriction of this nature which is absolute and unqualified, the intention and object of the law-giver is to restrain and prevent a director from putting some one in his place and stead by any act on his part or doing any act which would have the same effect. The question, of course, must be: Has the intended object been carried out in appropriate language capable of bringing out that result? I put to myself the questions: Is this word "assignment" to be read in the narrow sense—in a sense wanting in breadth in which it is used in conveyancing language and by conveyancing men or in the context of rights in property where it may mean only a transfer by an act inter vivos or is to be understood in the broad comprehensive sense that the holder of the office is not to give it by any act of his in presenti and also not to give it to another by any testamentary disposition or direction or appointment. I have perhaps dwelt little longer than I need have done on the argument of learned counsel for the appellants that Dadoba could not transfer what he did not have at the point of time of his death because his office came to an end that very time and, therefore, the appointment by him of defendant No. 2 cannot be called an assignment of the office of a director. The argument would have cogency if there was any dispute about the quantity or quality or the nature of any interest or right in property when such consideration would certainly have had bearing on the enquiry. But in the context of an assignment of an office of the nature before us, it has little import.

The argument suffers from a patent weakness and it is this. It is indubitable that a right can be transferred by assignment of the nature of transfer inter vivos or by operation of law provided the transfer of that right is not prohibited by law and it is made in accordance with the requirements of law as to form such as writing, registration etc. In respect of a right not ordinarily transferrable, for instance one which involves personal element and which ceases on death or disablement, the law lays down that the right cannot be transferred unless other parties interested in the matter gave their consent to the transference of the right or imposes conditions subject to which alone the right may be transferred, as for instance in a case of a company if it is accepted in a meeting of the shareholders. In all such cases there is, in the first instance, no right of transfer either by an act inter vivos or by a testamentary instrument. But when the right is given and the condition necessary for the exercise of the power of transference is fulfilled as required by law, it is extremely difficult to see how it can be said that there cannot be a transfer of the right by testamentary disposition. To my mind, there is here no justification for any overrefined distinction between appointment and assignment. In the first place, we are not dealing with property. We are dealing with an office which can only be the subject-matter of an appointment. Whether you call it an assignment or transfer or alienation or appointment, it has the same meaning and the effect is the same. I fail to see how in such a case it can be said that what is done is not a transfer because the right to transfer was not there. Of course, it was not there at the inception but it was there when the power to transfer the right was conferred. This, to my mind, is the weakness underlying the argument of learned counsel so strongly pressed for our acceptance.

To turn to the former head of the argument of Mr. Maneksha relating to the connotation of "assignment of an office" within the meaning of that expression as used in s. 312. Now, it is well understood that the expressions "assign" and "transfer" are often used in our statutes to convey the same meaning and the same sense and that the primary meaning of the word "assign" is to legally transfer or to legally make over any property or any right. It is equally well understood that the expression "transfer" is one of wide import and embraces both a transfer by an act inter vivos as well as a transfer by operation of law, that is by sale in execution, forfeiture, insolvency, intestate succession or testamentary disposition. In view of this connotation of the word 'transfer' the argument on behalf of the appellants was that a distinction must be drawn between an assignment of the office of a director and appointment of another person as a director by a person holding the office of director. Learned counsel, however, had to agree that if a director in a private company appointed for life and clothed with the power to appoint any other person in his place and stead were to exercise that power by an act inter vivos that would be an assignment of an office and hit by s. 312 even though it might be called an appointment. But it was said that appointment by a will in such a case would be wholly a different matter. It would not be within the ambit of the section because that would not be an assignment. The argument of necessity had to rest on the principle "one cannot give what one has not got." I have already examined that argument.

It has been argued by Mr. Khambatta, learned counsel for the respondents that there is no justification for giving a limited and narrow construction to the expression "assignment of office" which can mean passing of any right from one person to another. Counsel has referred to Law Lexicons and to Murray's English Dictionary. In Wharton's Law Lexicon, 14th edn., as to the verb "assign" it is stated that the verb is variously applied and the meaning given in that lexicon to the word "assign" is "generally to transfer property, especially personal estate, or set over a right to another, or appoint a deputy." It is common knowledge that the draftsmen of our Indian statutes do not prefer to use the expression "assign" in the context of property and have for a long time since the enactment of the Transfer of Property Act chosen to use the expression "transfer". Wharton defines "assignee" as a person appointed by another to do an act or perform any business. The expression "assignment" is defined as "transfer of an estate or interest in property". Mr. Khambatta has strongly relied on the meaning of the verb "assign" given in Murray's Dictionary and one of the meanings is "to appoint". He has also relied on the meaning of that verb given in that dictionary as "to transfer or formally make over to another." He has also relied on the meaning given there as "to appoint authoritatively" as also another meaning which is "to appoint, designate, ordain, depute". Counsel has also referred to certain provisions of the Transfer of Property Act. But I do not think it necessary to refer to those provisions because it has not been disputed and could not be disputed by Mr. Maneksha that the meaning of the expression "transfer" includes a transfer by an act inter vivos as well as by a testamentary disposition or direction. Great reliance has been placed by Mr. Khambatta on the meaning of the verb "assign" as "to appoint or to designate". Mr. Khambatta has also argued that the contention on behalf of the appellants in asking the Court to give a restricted meaning to the expression "assignment" ignores the existence of a third party viz. the company. It is said that this is not a case of an ordinary assignment between an assignor and an assignee whereby some property is transferred by the assignor to the assignee. Here, what was being done, though called an assignment, was really an appointment to the post of the office of a director and which had the effect of imposing the will of one person on a third party and the third party was affected. This aspect of the matter, to my mind, cannot be ignored. It is not a bilateral act pure and simple with which we are concerned in this case. We are concerned with the office of a director in a company and one person is clothed with the power to appoint another person and the appointee is the third party. Therefore, the ordinary sense in which the expression "assignment" may be used in the context of transfer of property by an act inter vivos is a concept which need not be introduced in reading the expression "assignment" in s. 312. Learned counsel has also drawn our attention to the scheme of the Act. He has referred to s. 253 which lays down that only an individual can be a director of a public or a private company and not any body corporate or association or firm of partners; and he has also drawn our attention to s. 254 which requires that subscribers to the memorandum of any company can only be individuals and in default of and subject to any regulations in the articles of a company, subscribers of the memorandum who are individuals, shall be deemed to be the directors of the company until the directors are duly appointed under s. 255. He has also drawn our attention to s. 255(2). These sections have been referred to for the purpose of showing that the Act does not contemplate any continuity in the matter as must occur if the director could be a body corporate or an association or a firm of partners. It is urged that it is clear from various provisions of the Act that the intention of the Legislature was to prevent the mischief of any director introducing into the company any other person as a director at his own volition even though he might have been authorised by an agreement between him and the company to do so and even though the articles of association of a company may expressly permit that to be done. Numerous prohibitions have been laid down by the new Companies Act in case of managing agents, managing directors, managers and directors of the company and other officers of a company. It is not necessary for me to examine the scheme of the Act in any detail since it is now well understood that the new Companies Act aims at eradicating many serious mischiefs which the principle of perpetual management of companies had caused in the past. The argument of counsel is: Why permit that mischief to continue by reading s. 312 in a narrow sense by attributing any undue restricted meaning to the words "assignment of his office"? It is stressed that the real meaning of this expression and one to be gathered from the section itself is that a person cannot introduce another person as a director in that company even though authorised to do so by the articles of association of the company. This it is urged is the effect of reading s. 9 with s. 312. Then it is said that if the argument urged on behalf of the appellants were to be accepted, an inconsistent and incongruous position is bound to arise.

In my opinion, Mr. Khambatta is right when he says that an inconsistent and incongruous position must arise if the argument urged on behalf of the appellants is to be accepted by us. Of course, the Court will not attach any undue importance to this consideration, but any inconsistent or incongruous position that might arise has to be borne in mind even in interpreting a statute the language of which is plain and unambiguous. Moreover, it is not possible to say that the expression "assignment" is capable of only one meaning and one meaning alone nor has any such attempt been seriously made before us to suggest that the word "assignment" is capable of only one meaning. The inconsistent and incongruous position that can arise if the argument for the appellants is accepted is that while a director cannot during his lifetime appoint another person as a director in his place and stead, though authorised by an agreement between him and the company and the articles of association to do so, he can do so by an appointment which is to be effective immediately on his demise. Of course, where the language of the section is plain, unambiguous and is not capable of more than one meaning, then ordinarily that meaning would have to be given by the Court. But in such a case, question of interpretation can hardly be said to arise. There will be no need of interpretation. The language itself being clear and manifest best declares the intention of the Legislature—Absoluta sententia expositor non indiget. But it is not possible to say that the expression “assignment” which is usually used in the context of property law and which has been pitchforked in a provision relating to the Companies Act in the context of a personal office which is neither an interest nor a right in any property and obviously is not an office of profit can be said to have a plain and simple meaning and which, as Wharton has said, is variously applied even in England.

Learned counsel for the respondents has also drawn our attention to s. 317 of the Companies Act. That section rules that a managing director of a company cannot be appointed for more than 5 years at a time. The argument has been that a managing director of a public company if clothed by any agreement between him and the company and the articles of association to appoint a successor would have power to make a will and appoint a successor, and in such a case, on his demise within the period of the allotted span of five years mentioned in s. 317, the appointee would step in as a managing director. The suggestion is that in case of a public company such a position would be inconceivable and intolerable. It is not necessary for me, however, to examine in any detail what would happen in case of a managing director clothed with any power as in the illustration suggested by learned counsel. But it does seem that such a strange and impermissible situation can arise and it does seem that the present argument lends support to the contention pressed on behalf of the respondents.

The next argument of Mr. Khambatta turns on the meaning and effect of art. 109. It is said that cl. (b) of that article authorised Dadoba to appoint any person to be a managing director in his place and stead, and in default of such appointment, the legal representatives of Dadoba were entitled to exercise the power. It is said that the appointment by Dadoba by an act inter vivos of any person as managing director in his place and stead would be within the mischief of s. 312, and if he appointed any person to be a managing director in his place and stead by a will or codicil, the appointment would be valid if the contention of the other side were to be accepted. The argument here is that there is no warrant for splitting art. 109 under two heads of ‘appointment by Deed’ and ‘an appointment by Will or Codicil’. It is said that if one part of art. 109 is bad, then the whole of art. 109 is bad. It is also said that not merely Dadoba but the legal representatives of Dadoba have also been given the power to appoint a managing director. The contention is that for this reason the whole of art. 109(b) must be treated as bad because it is not divisible. Now, this argument can have force only in case of matters which are not severable. I do not think that an appointment by a deed inter vivos and an appointment by a will or codicil are matters which are not severable. Therefore, there is little scope for the present argument urged before us by Mr. Khambatta. There is, however, considerable force in the argument of learned counsel that a restricted meaning should not be given to the expression “assignment” in the context of the personal office of a Director of a company under our Company law. Evidently, the construction pressed for our acceptance by learned counsel for the appellants relies—to put it in his own words—on ‘the rule of literal construction’. It has been strenuously urged that s. 312 must be literally construed, and so construed the expression “assignment” must be given the meaning pressed for our acceptance on behalf of the appellants. Not only that, but the argument asks us to put a restricted meaning on an expression ordinarily used in the context of property and rights and interest in property whereas in the section which we have to interpret, it is not used with reference to property but a personal right involving confidence as a main element as well as the character, credit and substance of the person who is a director and who is sought to be appointed as a director in his place and stead. It also involves a third party viz. the company.

We have to construe an expression which is capable of a sufficiently flexible meaning as well as a restricted and narrow meaning. The elementary rule of literal construction, as has so often been said, is confined to cases where the language is precise and capable of but one construction or where neither the history nor the cause of the enactment, nor the context, nor the consequences to which the literal interpretation would lead, show that that interpretation does not embrace the real intention. It has also been repeatedly said that language is so often capable of being used in more than one sense and to adhere rigidly to its literal and primary meaning in all cases would be to miss its real meaning in many. Words, if sufficiently flexible, must be construed in the sense which, if less correct grammatically, is more in harmony with the intention of the law-maker. These are well settled principles of interpretation of a statute.

To turn to examine the object of the enactment. The expression "director" includes any person occupying the position of director by whatever name called and "managing director" means a director who is entrusted with any powers of management which would not otherwise be exercisable by him, and includes a director occupying the position of a managing director, by whatever name called. Only an individual can be a managing director of a company. It is plain from art. 109 that the right to appoint a director was given to Dadoba and the right could be exercised from generation to generation. A company is a perpetual body and the effect of accepting the construction pressed on behalf of the appellants would be that in this private limited company which is a perpetual body, the managing director was given a right to appoint the future managing director and if the right was not exercised by him, then his legal representatives could exercise that right so that the same process of appointment could continue from generation to generation. That, to my mind, is wholly foreign to the object and scheme of the new Companies law. I entertain no doubt that the object of the mandatory prohibition in s. 312 was to prevent any such appointment being operative in the lifetime of the director as well as after his death and the only doubt that must naturally arise is from the fact that my brother K. T. Desai J. holds a view different from mine. This type of perpetual management whether in the form of a director, manager, managing agent or managing director was an evil which had to be eradicated and the precise object of the whole Act read in the context of s. 9 was to eradicate that evil. I do not propose to burden this judgment by referring to the numerous sections of the Act which leave no doubt that such was the intent and object of the law-giver. I shall have occasion to refer a little later to s. 86B of the repealed Act of 1913 the language of which when compared with s. 312 does throw considerable light on this point. According to the argument of learned counsel for the appellant, the Legislature, although it has dealt with the matter of appointment of the nature before us made by a director in his lifetime, has not dealt at all with the matter of such appointment if it is to operate after death. It is said that if there is any lacuna in the Act, it is for the Legislature to remedy the defect. Of course, the Court cannot reach a casus omissus and no canon of construction permits the Court to cure a lacuna in a statute. That is simple. But it is equally true that omissions are not to be readily inferred. The Court, it is firmly established, will not wrest the language of a statute and will not lightly create or infer a lacuna. It will at the same time see "that the true meaning of any passage is to be found not merely in the words of the passage, but in ascertaining also among other things what was the circumstance with reference to which the words are used, in what context they are used and what was the object which the Legislature had in view."

There is another aspect of the same question. We are not dealing with a codifying enactment but with an Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to companies and certain other associations. It is well settled that in an enactment of this nature, it is legitimate to refer to the previous state of the law for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the Legislature. Many provisions of the Indian Companies Act of 1913 were adopted from analogous provisions in the English Companies Acts. A number of provisions in our Companies Act of 1956 have been adopted from the English Act of 1948. It is also true that there are numerous sections in which the language of the English enactment has only partially been adopted. There is no section in the analogous English enactment similar to s. 312 of our Act which, as I have already said, enforces prohibition of assignment of office of a director and that prohibition is absolute and unqualified. Under our repealed Companies Act, there was some analogous provision in s. 86B, the relevant part of which was as under:

"If in the case of any company provision is made by the articles or by any agreement entered into between any person and the company for empowering a director or manager of the company to assign his office as such to another person, any assignment of office made in pursuance of the said provision shall, notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in the said provision, be of no effect unless and until it is approved by a special resolution of the company:

Provided that the exercise by a director of a power to appoint an alternate or substitute director to act for him during an absence of not less than three months from the district in which meetings of the directors are ordinarily held, if done with the approval of the board of directors, shall not be deemed to be an assignment of office within the meaning of this section:—"

That section was one of a group of sections 86-A to 86-I which were inserted in 1936 in the Companies Act of 1913. The corresponding provision in the English enactment was s. 151 of the Act of 1929. Section 204 of the English Act of 1948 was in pari materia with s. 151 of the earlier English enactment. Section 151 of the English enactment was as under:

"If in the case of any company provision is made by the articles or by any agreement entered into between any person and the company for empowering a director or manager of the company to assign his office as such to another person, any assignment of office made in pursuance of the said provision shall, notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in the said provision, be of no effect unless and until it is approved by a special resolution of the company."

It is noticeable and it is of some importance to observe that the first proviso to our s. 86-B, which I have quoted above, did not find place in s. 151 of the English Act of 1929 nor did it find place in the later English enactment of 1948. Section 86-B laid down certain restrictions on the powers of a director or a manager of a company to assign his office as such to another person. The restriction was that even though the articles of the company might have permitted it, no such power could be exercised unless and until the assignment was approved by a special resolution of the company. The proviso engrafted a material rule on the section. The effect of the proviso was that the power to make a temporary appointment of an alternate or substituted director to act for him which could be exercised by a director in favour of another person during his absence from the district could be exercised without any special resolution of the company and it was sufficient if the board of directors gave its approval to the same. Such a case, the proviso expressly stated, would not be deemed to be an assignment of office. It is clear from the language of the proviso that the Legislature took the view that there was ample scope for the suggestion that even such a temporary appointment of alternate and substituted director for a short period may be regarded as an assignment of office by a director. Therefore, one thing is clear from the language of that proviso read with the section that it was thought possible that a temporary appointment for a short period of a substituted director to act for him during his temporary absence made by a director could fall within the meaning of the expression "assignment of office". It is implicit in the proviso that even though the articles of association may permit it, a director or a manager of a company had no right to put in his place and stead another person as a director even during his temporary absence. I have referred to that section to show what the intention of the Legislature was even under the provisions contained in s. 86-B. Although articles of companies do in some cases empower a director to appoint an alternate or a substituted director, the Legislature did not approve of any such right being created in favour of a director by an agreement between the director and the company or by recognising that right in the articles of association and laid down conditions which were restrictive of that right. It is a well-established principle of construction that when one finds a proviso to a section, the presumption is that but for the proviso the enacting part of the section would have included the subject-matter of the proviso. Of course, that presumption need not arise where it is clear that the proviso was inserted only ex abundanti cautela. A comparison of s. 86-B and the first proviso to the same with the language of s. 312 with which we are here concerned seems very instructive. In s. 312 the Legislature not being content with the restrictions imposed under the old section, decided to lay down an absolute and unqualified prohibition against the assignment of the office of a director in any circumstance and the only qualification that it has made is contained in s. 313, the relevant part of which is as under:

"313. Appointment and term of office of alternate directors.—(1) The Board of Directors of a company may, if so authorised by its articles or by a resolution passed by the company in general meeting, appoint an alternate director to act for a director (hereinafter in this section called 'the original director') during his absence for a period of not less than three months from the State in which the meetings of the Board are ordinarily held."

Now, I have already pointed out that s. 86-B followed the language of s. 151 of the English Act of 1929 and s. 204 of the English Act of 1949 is in pari materia with s. 151, and neither that section nor the earlier s. 151 contained any proviso of the nature engrafted on s. 86-B of our Act of 1913. I have referred to the sections of the English enactment for the purpose of showing that the language of s. 86-B without the proviso had been borrowed from the English Act of 1929. I may observe that s. 204 of the English Act of 1949 does not impose any rigid bar on the assignment of his office by a director but the condition it imposes is that there should be a special resolution of the company. A curious and somewhat interesting position emerges if one turns to the standard text-books on the English Companies Act. The note of the editors of Palmer's Company Precedents under s. 204 of the Act of 1949 is as under (p. 874):

"The precise connotation of a power 'to assign office' as mentioned in the section is not clear. It is not thought that it would refer to a provision for the appointment of a successor; see, for example, paragraph (4) of Form 255, ante."

Now, Form 255 is in respect of a peculiar type of managing directorship and the person who holds that directorship is referred to in England as a governing director. It is not necessary for me to examine the Form 255 which is given in Palmer's Company Precedents. No clear opinion seems to have been expressed by the editors but they say that it is not thought that s. 204 would refer to a provision for the appointment of a successor by a governing director. They also say that the precise connotation of a power "to assign office" is not clear. Therefore, one thing is certain that the editors of that book were not inclined to state any definite opinion about the meaning of the expression "to assign office" in s. 204 and left the matter as one in dubio. Since the greatest reliance has been placed by Mr. Maneksha, learned counsel for the appellants, on certain observations made by the editors of the forty-first edition of Gore-Browne's Text-Book of Companies Law, I shall set out those observations in extenso (pp. 341-342):

"Where, in the case of a private company, the vendor of a business to the company is appointed a director by the Articles, he is frequently styled as 'governing director', and has conferred upon him all the powers of a board of directors, with a right from time to time to appoint a successor during his life, or by his will, or for his legal personal representatives to make such appointment after his death. In connection with such powers to appoint a successor the question whether its exercise constitutes an 'assignment' of the office within Section 204 may arise. That section renders the assignment of the office of director as such to another person of no effect unless and until it is approved by a special resolution of the company. It is difficult to see how a deceased person or his legal personal representatives could assign an office, and possibly in no case would the exercise of a power to appoint a successor under such an Article constitute an 'assignment' of the office, unless the appointment is made by the governing director during his life. The point is, however, a doubtful one, and it would be advisable for any person appointed as successor under such a power to obtain the support of a special resolution."

I do not think these observations are helpful in interpreting s. 312 of our Act of 1956. The argument on behalf of the appellants leans heavily on the very insecure foundation of these observations of the learned editors made in the context of a section (204) which does not contain any proviso similar to that under the repealed s. 86-B of our Act of 1913. What is more important is that s. 204 is not in pari materia with s. 312 with which we are really concerned and which lays down a stricter prohibition on the powers of a director. It is also noticeable that in England this point is not one of particular importance because there is no provision in the English Act similar to our s. 312 which imposes an absolute prohibition on the assignment of the office of a director. All that is required there is a special resolution of the company. None of the two statements of the learned editors of Palmer's Company Precedents or Gore-Browne's work claim the high authority of the illustrious authors of the works and the editors also have left the matter in doubt. It is well-known that Buckley who was later Lord Wrenbury was conservative in the matter of expressing his opinion and the editors of that work have been conservative in the matter of expression of opinions and that is one reason why Buckley's work has been very often referred to by Courts both in England and India. Now, the editors of the present edition of Buckley's work on Company law have made a significant note under s. 204 and the note is this (p. 401):

"Quære, what is meant by the expression 'assignment of office' used in this section which reproduces section 151 of the 1929 Act."

Mr. Manekshaw says that the expression "quære" only means that a question is put by the editors. To my mind, it is more than that. It is a question of the nature of objection. It is used at times to question accuracy of what has been said or written by another. In any case one thing is plain that the opinions of these editors expressed in the context of a rule which is different from the rule laid down in s. 312 would be slender support for the construction urged on behalf of the appellants.

We have here an express and unqualified rule in s. 312 which is manifestly intended to set at nought the mischief which must result if a director of a company public or private were to be permitted to exercise the power of introducing another person of his own choice as a director in his place and stead by assigning his office in favour of such person. The expression "assignment" so dear to the heart of English conveyancing lawyers is not used here in any context of conveyancing or transfer of any property or any right or interest in property, but in the context of making over of an office of director by one person to another. The expression is capable of being variously applied and I see no reason and no principle why its connotation should be confined to transference of any right by an act inter vivos. It is an expression of larger import than that. In reference to something which is not property or right or interest in property it can certainly mean making over or setting over of any right by one person to another or appointment to an office by one person of another when the person holding the office makes it over to another by appointing him to hold that office. The argument pressed for our acceptance, as I have already mentioned, could not go to the length of suggesting that a director can during his lifetime make over his office to another person by calling it an appointment and not an assignment. It makes no difference to my mind whether he does it in his lifetime by an act inter vivos or by a will so that it operates from the date of his death. In either case it is an appointment to the office of director. In the course of the arguments I put it to learned counsel for the appellants if he could suggest any reason why the Legislature should deem it necessary to prohibit a director of a company from appointing another person as a director in his place and stead by an act inter vivos, that is, during his lifetime and should not deem it necessary to prevent him from doing so by a will. No answer was given save that it would be entering the region of speculation. It would be strange indeed to attribute to the Legislature the intention to create the anomalous position that must arise if it were to be accepted that s. 312 prohibits appointment by a director to his office of another person in his place and stead by an act inter vivos and yet permits such appointment to be made by him by his will. Moreover this incongruous position can arise not only in case of a director in a private company but also in case of a director in a public company if the construction urged on behalf of the appellants is to be accepted. To take the simple illustration of a case where by articles of association of a public company the promoters or managing agents are given the power to appoint one or more ex-officio directors for life. Such a power would be valid under s. 253 of the Companies Act so long as the number of such directors does not exceed one-third of the total number of directors of the company. Section 255 is as under:

"255. Appointment of directors and proportion of those who are to retire by rotation.—(1) Not less than two-thirds of the total number of directors of a public company, or of a private company which is a subsidiary of a public company, shall—

(a) be persons whose period of office is liable to determination by retirement of directors by rotation; and

(b) save as otherwise expressly provided in this Act, be appointed by the company in general meeting.

(2) The remaining directors in the case of any such company, and the directors generally in the case of a private company which is not a subsidiary of a public company, shall, in default of and subject to any regulations in the articles of the company, also be appointed by the company in general meeting."

So, if the regulations in the articles of the company empower the promoters or managing agents to appoint a director or directors within the number permissible under sub-s. (2) for the lifetime of such director or directors, the appointment would be valid. Now, in such a case if the articles were to provide that a director or directors so appointed will have the power to appoint another person to his or their office of director by an act inter vivos or by will the position would be that the appointment by an act inter vivos would be void while the appointment by will would be valid if the construction which we are asked to put on the expression "assignment" were to be accepted. It is inconceivable to my mind that such is the object or effect of s. 312 of the Act of 1956. It seems indubitable to me that any such appointment of a director in a public company by will is within the prohibition imposed by the section. Cadit questio it is within the ambit of the prohibition in case of appointment of a director in a private company. The only answer to this suggested by learned counsel for the appellants was that s. 317 prevents appointment of a managing director of a public company for a term exceeding five years at a time. But that section has no bearing whatever on the present discussion about assignment of his office by a director. It is extremely difficult for me to see why an intention should be attributed to the law-giver of laying down a rule the effect of which would be to rule that a director in a public or private company, authorised by the articles of the company, cannot make any such appointment five minutes before his death—that would be by an act inter vivos—and yet he can do it by inserting a clause to that effect in his will. It was, however, said that s. 255(2) has the effect of permitting appointment of a director in a public or private company being made by a third person who may be a total outsider and not a director of the company and the argument was that an appointment made by such third person cannot be called an “assignment” of the office of director. The argument ran that there was no difference between any such appointment made by a third party and an appointment made by a person who happens to be a director. The argument to my mind is not sound. The section speaks of assignment of his office by a director and the prohibition is evidently imposed on a person who is a director. It is the office held by a person as a director that is not permitted to be assigned by any act on his part. Therefore, there is a difference between an appointment made by a third party and one made by a director. In the former case it cannot be said that there is an assignment of his office by the person exercising the power. On a consideration of the whole matter it seems to me that having regard to the nature of the office of a director it cannot make any difference whether the act is called an assignment of his office by a director or transfer of his office by a director or appointment by such director of another person to that office in his place and stead either by a deed or will. I fail to see any reason why we should recognise the over-refined distinction sought to be made in case of an appointment by will by attributing any restricted and technical conveyancing meaning to the expression “assignment” of the nature suggested on behalf of the appellants. This is not a matter of doctrinaire technicalities but a matter to be considered on broad principles and rules of interpretation.

I have not yet made any reference to another argument urged before us by learned counsel for the appellants. It has been argued that s. 312 speaks only of a director and the prohibition imposed is against the assignment of office of a director and not against the assignment of office of a managing director. Section 312 is one of a group of three sections headed “miscellaneous provisions”. Chapter II of the Companies Act deals with directors. Learned counsel for the appellants has drawn our attention to certain sections where the Legislature has referred to a director and certain sections where reference is made to a managing director. The suggestion is that in respect of every provision of law affecting a managing director, the framers of the Act have taken care to lay down separate rules affecting them and where they have only referred to a director, the rule is only applicable to a director, though a managing director being a director the rule may also apply to him. But that, it is said, would be in a distinguishable capacity as a director and not as a managing director. An examination of the relevant provisions of the Companies Act would show that such is not the position. There are sections which apply to a director and are equally applicable to a managing director. Moreover, in sections which speak of a director the Legislature has taken special care to state necessary qualifications to the rule there stated if the section is not to apply to the case of a managing director. Before I examine one or two of such sections I should refer to the definitions of ‘director’ and ‘managing director’ which are as under:

“Sec. 2. (13) ‘director’ includes any person occupying the position of director, by whatever name called;”

“Sec. 2. (26) ‘managing director’ means a director who, by virtue of an agreement with the company or of a resolution passed by the company in general meeting or by its Board of Directors or, by virtue of its memorandum or articles of association, is entrusted with any powers of management which would not otherwise be exercis-able by him, and includes a director occupying the position of a managing director, by whatever name called."

The definition of 'managing director' makes it abundantly clear that a managing director is necessarily a director entrusted with powers of management and that the expression managing director includes a director occupying the position of a managing director by whatever name called. In certain sections the Legislature has drawn a distinction between a director and a managing director by express words of qualification and it is impossible to say that the expression 'director' wherever it is used in the Act excludes a managing director. The definition of 'director' is rather comprehensive than restrictive. Now these expressions which are defined by the Legislature are always to be read in their context and as is usual in modern legislative practice s. 2 which gives definitions begins with the words "Unless the context otherwise requires". The expression "director" is not to be read in s. 312 or any other section as if it could apply only to a person who is a director and not to one who is also a managing director or to put it slightly differently as if it excluded per se a director who is also a managing director. When question arises whether the expression 'director' in any section is to be understood in a comprehensive or exclusive sense it would be necessary to examine the scope and ambit of the particular section and the nature and object of the rule and the context in which it is used. Now, as I have already pointed out, s. 312 is one of the sections under the heading of "Miscellaneous Provisions". That itself, to my mind, is some indication that the expression director is used in the sections under that head in a comprehensive and not an exclusive sense. What is more important is that there is ample support to be derived for the view that the expression director in these miscellaneous provisions is used in a general sense. Section 313 must evidently apply to a managing director although only the expression 'director' is used there. Then if s. 314 is scrutinised it is clear that the Legislature having used the expression director has expressly made reference to a managing director. Now one thing is quite clear that ss. 312 and 313 are to be read as dealing with a matter of the same nature and that the expression 'director' in those sections must have the same meaning. Section 307 also lends support to the same view and it is not possible to rule out consideration of that section by saying that a managing director is also a director, and that it must be read as applicable to a managing director only in his capacity of a director and not of a managing director. The point is whether the expression is always used in the exclusive sense contended for on behalf of the appellants. I may permit myself to refer to s. 86-B of the repealed Act for the purpose of examining the present argument. That section applied both to a director and a managing director. Section 2(24) of the Act of 1956 defines "manager" to mean:

"an individual (not being the managing agent) who, subject to the superintendence, control and direction of the Board of Directors, has the management of the whole, or substantially the whole, of the affairs of a company, and includes a director or any other person occupying the position of a manager, by whatever name called, and whether under a contract of service or not;"

Section 86-B to which I have already made reference placed certain restriction on the powers of a director as well as a manager of a company. Section 388 of the Act of 1956 rules that the provisions of s. 312 shall apply in relation to a manager of the company as they apply to a director thereof. If we accept the argument urged on behalf of the appellants, the effect of the rule read with s. 312 would be that the manager of a company who is a paid employee or servant of a company can by his will appoint another person to occupy the post of manager after his death if the articles of association of the company authorises him to do so. It is extremely difficult for me to see that such could be the intention or object of the law-maker. The prohibition in s. 312 applies equally to a director as to a manager and not only in a private company but also in a public company. No reason whatever could be suggested why the Legislature should have wanted to exclude a managing director and that too of a public as well as a private company from the salutary prohibition laid down in s. 312. Here also it was said on behalf of the appellants that s. 317 lays down that a managing director of a public company cannot be appointed for more than five years at a time and that it does not apply to a private company. I do not think that advances the contention urged on behalf of the appellants. I need not pursue the examination of some other sections which, to my mind, support the view that the expression 'director', when used without any qualifying words, is to be read in a comprehensive sense as inclusive of a managing director and not in the exclusive sense in which we are asked to read it. These considerations, in my judgment, lead to the result that the expression "director" in s. 312 includes a managing director of a public or a private company.

Another phase of the argument on behalf of the appellants on the question of construction of the expression "assignment" in s. 312 was that art. 109 only amounts to delegation of power by the directors to one of them viz. Dadoba. I have read the relevant arts. 105 to 109 of the articles of association of the company more than once and I see no support whatever in them for the present argument. There is nothing in those articles which even faintly suggests anything like delegation nor any exercise by Dadoba of any delegated power. The present argument must, therefore, fail.

For all these reasons, the conclusion seems to me inescapable that the expression "assignment of his office" cannot be read in the narrow restricted sense in which we have been asked to read it on behalf of the appellants and s. 312 must be read as applicable to a director including a managing director and in the comprehensive sense in which it would include appointment by any testamentary disposition or direction. In my judgment the learned Judge was right in the conclusion reached by him.

I now turn to examine another contention urged before us by Mr. Manekshaw. It has been argued that in any event the plaintiff ceased to be a director of the company because he failed to attend certain meetings of the directors and became disqualified from acting as a director by operation of art. 85(f) and s. 223(g). A few dates and facts are necessary to dispose of this contention. There was a meeting of the board of directors soon after the death of Dadoba which was in the nature of a condolence meeting and it was attended by the plaintiff. That was on February 13, 1957. On February 14, 1957, defendant No. 2 sent out a notice calling a meeting of the board of directors of the company for February 14, 1957. He sent that notice as chairman of the company. The next notice sent out by defendant No. 2 was signed by him as a director and was on March 19, 1957. By his letter dated March 23, 1957, the plaintiff protested against the notice of March 19, 1957, which had been sent out by defendant No. 2. A notice dated March 27, 1957, convening a meeting of the board of directors was sent by defendant No. 2 as a managing director of the company. A notice dated May 4, 1957, was also sent by defendant No. 2 describing himself as a managing director. A notice dated May 21, 1957, was also sent by defendant No. 2 as a managing director of the company. So also a notice dated May 23, 1957, was sent by defendant No. 2 as the managing director of the company. It will be seen that all but one of the notices relating to the convening of the meetings of board of directors were sent by defendant No. 2 as chairman or managing director and at all relevant period the plaintiff protested against the right of defendant No. 2 to convene any meeting in his capacity as managing director or chairman of the board of directors of the company. Since I have taken the view that the appointment of defendant No. 2 as the managing director was invalid and bad in law, it must follow as a necessary corollary to that conclusion that defendant No. 2 had in law no power to convene any meeting as a managing director of the company, and if he did so, those meetings were not duly and legally convened meetings and if they were not duly and legally convened meetings, it cannot be said that the plaintiff absented himself from any properly convened meeting of the board of directors of the company. I must point out that it was also argued by Mr. Maneksha that in any event defendant No. 2 had continued all along to be a director of the company, and even if it be held by the Court that he had no right to convene the meetings as a managing director of the company, he had the right to convene those meetings as a director, and on that ground the plaintiff should be disqualified because he had failed to attend the meetings as required by the articles of association and by the provisions of law. I do not think this argument is tenable. In express terms, the meetings were called by defendant No. 2 in his alleged capacity as a managing director and there is nothing on the record to show that he called those meetings simply as a director of the company. It is not, therefore, necessary to examine this argument at any length. The meetings, being called by him in the exercise of a capacity which he did not have, were bad and it is not open to him now to fall back on his position as a director of the company. I may also refer to art. 94 of the articles of association of the company which deals with the question as to when a director may summon a meeting. That article lays down that the managing director may at any time and shall upon request of any director convene a meeting of the directors. The power to call a meeting of the directors is primarily with the managing director and defendant No. 2 in terms called those meetings as managing director. Mr. Maneksha has also drawn our attention to Form No. 184 from Palmer's Company Precedents and relied on the following observation:

"In the absence of any article otherwise providing or a contrary practice established by the directors it would seem that any director may summon a meeting."

There is nothing before us to show that any contrary practice has been established and art. 94 is the relevant article which must be taken into consideration in this matter. There is no other article in the articles of association of the company which can be said to deal with the matter. The present contention fails and must be negatived.

There remains to consider one more contention urged before us by Mr. Maneksha. It is said that the appointment of defendant No. 3 has been erroneously declared by the trial Court to be bad in law. It is not necessary to refer to what I have already said in my judgment about the appointment of defendant No. 2 as a managing director being invalid and bad in law. If his appointment was invalid and bad in law, he had no power to appoint defendant No. 3 as a director by co-option. That contention also must be rejected.

In the result I agree with the conclusion reached by the learned Judge that the plaintiff was entitled to the reliefs sought by him. I would hold that the appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs.

K. T. DESAI J. A point of law involving the construction of s. 312 of the Companies Act, 1956, arises in this appeal. The facts are few and are not in dispute. One Dadoba Kashinath Thakoor was carrying on business at Bombay under the name and style of the Oriental Metal Pressing Works. On May 26, 1955, a private limited company was floated named the Oriental Metal Pressing Works Ltd. The subscribers to its memorandum were Dadoba, his son Govind, who is defendant No. 2 in the suit, and his brother Bhaskar who is the plaintiff in the suit. One of the principal objects of the company was to acquire and take over as a going concern the business then carried on at Bombay by the said Dadoba Kashinath Thakoor under the name and style of Oriental Metal Pressing Works, and enter into an agreement in that connection and to carry into effect such agreement. After the company was formed, a meeting of the board of directors was held on July 7, 1955. At that meeting Dadoba was appointed as chairman of the board of directors for the period of his lifetime. At that meeting Dadoba was appointed as the managing director of the company for the period at the remuneration and upon the other terms and conditions contained in the draft agreement which was placed before the meeting of the board of directors which was to be entered into by the company with Dadoba. It was resolved at that meeting that the company should enter into that agreement. On that very day, an agreement was entered into between the company on the one hand and Dadoba on the other in terms of the said draft. By cl. 1 of the agreement it was provided that Dadoba was appointed managing director of the company with powers and upon the terms and subject to the conditions thereafter set out. By cl. 2 of the agreement it was provided that he was to hold the said office of managing director for life from the date of the incorporation of the company. By cl. 4 of that agreement it was provided that Dadoba as such managing director shall be one of the principal officers of the company and subject to the control and supervision of the directors he shall have the general control and management of the business and affairs of the company. Clause 7 of that agreement, which is material for the purpose of the present appeal, runs as follows:—

"Mr. Thakoor (Dadoba) shall be entitled by deed inter vivos or by will or codicil to appoint any person to be a Managing Director in his place and stead and in default of such appointment the legal representatives of Mr. Thakoor shall be entitled to exercise the said power. Any appointee as aforesaid shall whilst holding office also be designated as a Managing Director and shall be entitled to be paid by the company the same remuneration and to exercise the same powers and authorities as are vested in Mr. Thakoor and the appointee as aforesaid shall have a power of appointing any person to be Managing Director as his successor on the remuneration of not less than Rs. 1,000 (Rs. one thousand) per month and upon the same other terms and conditions as are herein contained."

Article 109 of the articles of association of the company also provided as follows:—

"109. (a) The said Shri Dadoba Kashinath Thakoor shall be the first Managing Director of the company at a remuneration of Rs. 2,500 per month subject to the said remuneration being increased by the Board of Directors of the Company. He shall be entitled to hold such office for life and will not be subject to clauses 87, 88 and 91 of these Articles;

(b) The said Shri Dadoba Kashinath Thakoor may by deed inter vivos or by will or codicil appoint any person to be a Managing Director in his place and stead and in default of such appointment, the legal representatives of the said Shri Dadoba Kashinath Thakoor shall be entitled to exercise the power;

(c) Any appointee as aforesaid shall, whilst holding office, also be designated a managing director and shall be entitled to the same remuneration and to exercise the same powers and authorities as were vested in the managing director in whose place and stead he is appointed;

(d) The appointee as aforesaid shall have a power of appointing any person to be a managing director as his successor on the remuneration of not less than Rs. 1,000 per month and with the same powers as are vested in Shri Dadoba Kashinath Thakoor." The said Dadoba continued to be the managing director of the company right upto the date of his death. On August 18, 1956, the said Dadoba made his last will and testament. The relevant provision of that will, so far as it concerns the present appeal, is as under:—

"I am the Managing Director of The Oriental Metal Pressing Works Private Limited on the remuneration and subject to the terms and conditions contained in an Agreement dated the 7th day of July 1955 and made between the said Company of the one part and myself of the other. Under the Articles of Association of the said Company and under the said Agreement dated the 7th day of July 1955 I am entitled by deed inter vivos or by will or codicil to appoint any person to be a Managing Director in my place and stead. Accordingly, I hereby appoint my said son Govind Dadoba Thakoor to be a Managing Director of the said Company from the date of my demise."

The said Dadoba died on January 14, 1957. Govind Dadoba, defendant No. 2, claimed that he had been validly appointed as a managing director of the company under the provisions contained in the will of the said Dadoba set out above. It is this appointment of Govind as the managing director of the company which is sought to be challenged by the plaintiff in the suit.

The plaintiff contends that this appointment is bad having regard to the provisions contained in s. 312 of the Companies Act, 1956. That section provides as follows:—

“Any assignment of his office made after the commencement of this Act by any director of a company shall be void.”

Reliance has also been placed upon the provisions contained in s. 9 of the Act. That section runs as follows:—

“9. Save as otherwise expressly provided in the Act—

(a) the provisions of this Act shall have effect notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in the memorandum or articles of a company, or in any agreement executed by it, or in any resolution passed by the company in general meeting or by its Board of directors, whether the same be registered, executed or passed, as the case may be, before or after the commencement of this Act; and

It is not disputed that the appointment that was made by Dadoba by his will was an appointment that fell within the terms of art. 109 and the terms of the agreement referred to by me above. What is contended is that to the extent that this article and the agreement provide for such an appointment being made by a will, the provisions contained in the article and in the agreement are void in law and are inoperative and that the power thereby conferred cannot be exercised. It is urged that the expression “director” in s. 312 is wide enough to cover a managing director and that the appointment of defendant No. 2, who was already a director of the company, as the managing director was void by reason of the provisions contained in s. 312 of the Act. It may be mentioned here that Govind, defendant No. 2, is and has continued to be a director of the company since the date of its incorporation.

It is strenuously urged by Mr. Maneksha, the learned counsel for the appellants, that s. 312 of the Companies Act, 1956, has no application to the facts of the present case. He says that the only thing done by Dadoba by his will was to appoint Govind, who was already a director of the company, as the managing director and that the appointment was to take effect from the date of the demise of Dadoba. He says that in order to invoke the provisions of s. 312, it is necessary that there must be an assignor, that such assignor must be the holder of the office of a director and that he should assign his office as such director. He says that Govind was already a director of the company and that there cannot be an assignment of the office of a director to a person who already holds that office. He further says that there cannot be the assignment of his office by a director to operate after his death. The argument is that the office of a director is personal to the holder and that his office would, in any event, end with his death. Mr. Maneksha urges that the office of a director is by its very nature such that it must of necessity cease, so far as the holder is concerned, on his death, and that it is an office which cannot be assigned by will which can only operate on the death of the holder. He says that the words of the section read in their context must necessarily refer to an assignment of office by an act inter vivos.

As against these weighty arguments, it has been contended that the expression “assignment” is an expression of wide import. Diverse meanings of the expressions “assignment”, “assignee”, “assigns” appearing in various dictionaries and lexicons were cited at the Bar, and it was urged that as the word “assignment” would include an assignment by a will or a testamentary instrument, there was no reason why the ambit of the section should be confined to an assignment only by act inter vivos. It was further urged that this section was enacted in order to prevent the ill effects which might result from the assignment of his office by a director and that if the expression "assignment" was wide enough to cover an assignment by a testamentary writing, full effect should be given to that expression. It is said that if persons are permitted to appoint others as directors by will, and if the persons so appointed could equally have the power to appoint others by will, there would result a perpetuity which it must have been the object of the Legislature to prevent. Reference in this connection was made to the provisions of law contained in s. 86B of the Indian Companies Act, 1913. Section 86B was introduced by the Legislature in the year 1936. That section provided inter alia as follows:—

"86B. If in the case of any company provision is made by the articles or by any agreement entered into between any person and the company for empowering a director or manager of the company to assign his office as such to another person, any assignment of office made in pursuance of the said provision shall, notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in the said provision, be of no effect unless and until it is approved by a special resolution of the company."

This provision was enacted as a remedial measure. This remedial measure being found insufficient, the Legislature when it passed the consolidating and amending Act of 1956 laid down by s. 312 that after the commencement of the Act the assignment of his office by any director would be void.

The question that falls for consideration in the present case is whether the assignment that is contemplated by the section is the assignment of his office held by a director whose term has not expired or whether it contemplates the appointment of a person to fill that office after the holder of that office is to cease to hold it by reason of lapse of time or by reason of his death. In my view, when the Legislature uses the expression "assignment of office", it is of the essence that the office was one which not merely the assignor was holding at the moment of the assignment, but was one which he would have continued to hold if the assignment had not been made. In the case of an appointment which is to take effect after the period of office of the assignor expires by reason of lapse of time or death, it would be inappropriate to use the expression "assignment of his office". If a person has the power to appoint another as a director after the appointor ceases to be a director by reason of lapse of time or death, it would be purely the exercise of a power of appointment and not an assignment of his office. In the present case, the appointment of Govind as a managing director was to take effect after the period of office of Dadoba was to expire on the death of Dadoba and it cannot be said that there is an assignment of his office by Dadoba within the meaning of s. 312.

In determining the meaning to be attached to the words "assignment of his office...by any director of a company" within the meaning of s. 312, one has to bear in mind the scheme of the Act. Under the Act the office of a director is personal to him. Section 253 of the Companies Act, 1956, in terms provides that no body corporate, association or firm shall be appointed director of a public or private company, and only an individual shall be so appointed. The Legislature has now confined the appointment of directors to individuals. Not merely that, but by s. 280 of the Companies Act, 1956, an age limit for directors is sought to be provided in the case of a public company and of a private company which is subsidiary of a public company except in cases provided by s. 281. When the Legislature was dealing with the question of the assignment by a director of his office as director in the context of the company law of 1956, it was only dealing with the assignment of an office which must of necessity in all events terminate on the death of the assignor. The assignment by a director of his office cannot possibly operate beyond the period for which the assignor could have held that office. If that period is limited to the life of the assignor, there is no scope for effecting an assignment by means of a testamentary instrument, which must of necessity operate on the death of the person executing that instrument. In this view of the matter, it is not necessary for me to examine the dictionary meaning of the expression "assignment" and it is not necessary to consider whether an assignment in the abstract can or cannot be effected by a testamentary instrument.

Even if the expression "assignment" was wide enough to include an assignment by devise i.e. by means of a will or testamentary instrument, having regard to the context in which that expression is used, it cannot refer to any assignment that may be made by a testamentary instrument. It can refer only to an assignment by act inter vivos. It is urged that the expression "assignment" has not been used in the context of property law and that it is used in connection with an office. It is undoubtedly true that the expression "assignment" has been used in connection with an office. It is because it is used in connection with an office, which the assignor must cease to hold on his death, that it is possible to say that the section only contemplates an assignment by act inter vivos. The appointment of Govind as a managing director by Dadoba by his will does not fall within the ambit of s. 312.

It is then urged that the expression "assignment" may be equated with appointment, and that in the context in which that expression is used in s. 312 of the Companies Act, the parties involved are not merely the assignor and the assignee, but a third party viz. the company and that quæ the company the assignment must of necessity operate as an appointment to the office of a director. It is no doubt true that when an assignment by a director of his office is permitted by an agreement with the company or under the articles of association of the company, it must of necessity result in the appointment of the assignee as a director of the company. But that does not mean that every appointment must result in the assignment of his office by a director. The power of appointment can be exercised by a person who is not a director. Such appointments are contemplated under the Company law and do take place. The power may be reserved to third parties to appoint directors. See British Murac Syndicate, Limited v. The Alperton Rubber Company Limited.¹ Sometimes a vendor who sells his property to a company may be given a right to appoint directors by the articles. Sometimes a person who advances moneys to the company may be given a right to appoint his nominee on the board. It is usual for banking companies and finance corporations making loans to companies to acquire a right to appoint a representative on the board of directors to see to the proper utilisation of the funds for the purpose for which they are lent. Debenture holders are often given such a right. So far as the Act is concerned power is given to the Government in certain circumstance and in the case of certain companies to appoint directors. It is not every appointment that is covered by s. 312. The section is operative only when that appointment is made by a director by the assignment of his office.

It is urged by the learned counsel for the appellants that in the present case defendant No. 2 was the holder of the office of a director, that he had been a director since the date of the incorporation of the company and that there could not possibly be an assignment to him of the office of a director which he already held. It is urged that s. 312 is applicable to those cases where the office of a director is assigned by the holder of that office to a person who is not a director of the company. There is considerable force in this argument of Mr. Maneksha. It is urged on behalf of the respondents that the expression "assignment of his office...by any director" in s. 312 is wide enough to cover the case of the assignment of the office of a managing director. It is no doubt true that a managing director is a director. But the converse is not true. A director need not be a managing director. All cases of transfer of the office of a managing director are not covered by the section. It may be possible for a person, who is a managing director, to appoint another person who is a director to be the managing director of the company, he himself ceasing to be managing director and remaining only as a director. In such a case, there can only be an assignment of the office of a managing director without there being an assignment of the office of a director. The section, as it is worded, is not wide enough to cover such an assignment. There are separate provisions in the Act dealing with directors and managing directors. A director is defined by s. 2(13) of the Act to include any person occupying the position of director, by whatever name called. A managing director is defined by s. 2(26) of the Act to mean a director who by virtue of an agreement with the company or of a resolution passed by the company in general meeting or by its board of directors or by virtue of its memorandum or articles of association, is entrusted with any powers of management which would not otherwise be exercisable by him, and includes a director occupying the position of a managing director, by whatever name called. Sections 267, 269, 316 and 317 deal with managing directors. It is not necessary for the purpose of the present case to consider the effect of these sections. It is sufficient to say that in a case where an assignment of his office by a managing director to another operates as an assignment by such managing director of his office as a director to another person, who does not hold any office as a director, it would fall within the ambit of the provisions contained in s. 312. In cases where there is no such assignment of the office of a director, they would fall outside the ambit of that section. In the present case, the person appointed was already a director. The person appointed was to hold office from the date of the demise of the person appointing and in my view it is not possible to say that there was any assignment of his office by a director within the meaning of s. 312 of the Act.

Some support for the conclusion to which I have reached may be derived from a statement by the editors of Gore-Browne's Hand-book on Joint Stock Companies, 41st edn., at pp. 341, 342 and of Palmer's Company Precedents, 17th edn., at p. 736. There the editors were dealing with the provisions contained in s. 204 of the English Companies Act, 1948. That section is in these terms:—

"204. If in the case of any company provision is made by the articles or by any agreement entered into between any person and the company for empowering a director or manager of the company to assign his office as such to another person, any assignment of office made in pursuance of the said provision shall, notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in the said provision, be of no effect unless and until it is approved by a special resolution of the company."

In connection with this section, editors of Gore-Browne's Hand-book on Joint Stock Companies observe at pp. 341 and 342 as follows:—

"Where, in the case of a private company, the vendor of a business to the company is appointed a director by the Articles, he is frequently styled a 'governing director', and has conferred upon him all the powers of a board of directors, with a right from time to time to appoint and remove other directors, and with a power to appoint a successor during his life, or by his will, or for his legal personal representatives to make such appointment after his death. In connection with such powers to appoint a successor, the question whether its exercise constitutes an 'assignment' of the office within Section 204 may arise. That section renders the assignment of the office of director as such to another person of no effect, unless and until it is approved by a special resolution of the company. It is difficult to see how a deceased person or his legal personal representatives could assign an office, and possibly in no case would the exercise of a power to appoint a successor under such an Article constitute an 'assignment' of the office, unless the appointment is made by the governing director during his life."

After expressing themselves in these terms, they further proceed to observe that the point was, however, a doubtful one and that it would be advisable for any person appointed as successor under such a power to obtain the support of a special resolution.

In Palmer's Company Precedents, 17th edn., at p. 874, the editors of that work observe in connection with s. 204 as follows:—

"The precise connotation of a power 'to assign office' as mentioned in the section is not clear. It is not thought that it would refer to a provision for the appointment of a successor."

The editors of Buckley on the Companies Acts, 13th edn., have in connection with s. 204 merely observed at p. 401 as follows:—

"Quære, what is meant by the expression 'assignment of office' used in this section, which reproduces s. 151 of the 1829 Act."

The editors of Palmer's Company Precedents and Gore-Browne's Hand-book on Joint Stock Companies prefer to express their individual opinions on the subject. The editors of Buckley on Companies Acts have chosen to remain silent.

It is urged on behalf of the respondents that in construing the provisions of s. 312, which appear in a consolidating and amending Act, the Court must consider the mischief which was sought to be avoided and the evil which was sought to be remedied. It is well-known that persons when making advances to companies or persons when transferring properties to companies reserve to themselves the power to appoint directors by act inter vivos as well as by will. As observed by the learned editors in Palmer's Company Precedents, 17th edn., at p. 736:

"The most natural persons, by reason of their interest, to fill the office of director, as well as the most competent, are generally the original owners of the business, and accordingly the articles of a private company commonly provide that some or one of such owners shall be the directors. The terms of their tenure of office vary. Sometimes it is provided that the owner or owners shall be entitled to hold office, for instance, for so many years, or for life, provided he or they continue to hold a certain number of shares; sometimes an owner is empowered at any time, and from time to time, to act, so long and whenever he chooses, as sole director, and at his discretion to appoint and remove other directors. Occasionally an owner is empowered to authorise his executors or trustees, whilst holding a certain number of shares, to appoint directors, and to define and restrict their powers and give them their share qualifications."

Reservation of such powers had been so extensive and so common that in Form No. 255 contained in Palmer's Company Precedents, 17th edn., at pp. 734 to 736 there is an express clause which runs as follows:—

"If the said A B dies whilst he holds the office of Governing Director, he may by his will or any codicil thereto appoint any person to be Governing Director in his place, and direct and determine within the limit of this article what shall be the powers, authorities and discretions of such Governing Director, and his remuneration and qualification, and how long he shall be entitled to hold office, and in default of such direction and determination such appointee shall only have the powers of an Ordinary Director."

Now, what I have to consider in this case is the extent to which this was regarded as an evil by the Legislature and the extent to which the Legislature has sought to interfere with the freedom of persons to enter into contracts with companies when transferring properties to companies or lending moneys to companies. As I have already stated, it is well-known that powers of appointment were being conferred which could be exercised by a testamentary instrument. Is there anything in the Act to show that the exercise of such a power to appoint directors by testamentary instruments has been rendered void by the Legislature? Now, so far as the power to appoint a director by a person, who does not hold the office of a director, by will is concerned, one does not find a single section in the Act which prohibits such an appointment in toto. The restrictions which have been put by the Legislature on the powers of appointment of directors are contained in Chapter II. Section 255 which deals with appointment of directors provides as follows:—

"255. (1) Not less than two-thirds of the total number of directors of a public company, or of a private company which is a subsidiary of a public company, shall—

(a) be persons whose period of office is liable to determination by retirement of directors by rotation; and

(b) save as otherwise expressly provided in this Act, be appointed by the company in general meeting.

(2) The remaining directors in the case of any such company, and the directors generally in the case of a private company which is not a subsidiary of a public company, shall, in default of and subject to any regulations in the articles of the company, also be appointed by the company in general meeting."

This provision makes it abundantly clear that so far as a public company and a private company which is a subsidiary of a public company are concerned, two thirds of the directors have to be appointed by the company in general meeting. There is a fetter imposed to that extent upon the powers of appointment. As regards the remaining one-third, it is provided that such appointments can be made in accordance with the regulations in the articles of the company, and it is only in those cases where there is an absence of a provision in the articles of the company that such appointments have to be made by the company in general meeting. As regards a private company, which is not a subsidiary of a public company, that section provides that all the directors of the company have to be appointed in accordance with the regulations in the articles of the company, and it is only in default of any provision therein contained that they are to be appointed by the company in general meeting. The result is that the power to appoint directors in accordance with the articles, whether it vests in a stranger or in the directors, whether it is exercisable by act inter vivos or by will has been kept intact and has been preserved qua a public company and a private company which is a subsidiary of a public company to the extent of one third of the directors, and qua a private company which is not the subsidiary of a public company, to the fullest extent. If such a power is so preserved, there is nothing in the policy of the Act or the scheme of the Act which can make me infer that when such a power of appointment is vested in a director, the same cannot be exercised by will. It is no doubt true that when as a result of the exercise of such a power by act inter vivos there is the assignment by the appointing director of his office as a director, then s. 312 will supervene and nullify the said appointment. There is nothing in the scheme of the Act which would lead to the conclusion that the Legislature by s. 312 sought to render a testamentary appointment by a director invalid.

As regards the scheme of the Act, it may be observed that there are various provisions in the Act dealing with the assignment of his office by the holder thereof. Section 312 is the section which deals with assignment by a director of his office. Section 343 is the section which deals with transfer of his office by a managing agent. That section provides as under:—

"A transfer of his office by the managing agent of a company shall not take effect unless it is approved both by the company in general meeting and by the Central Government."

In the case of transfer of his office by a managing agent there is no total prohibition, but safeguards are provided in the shape of an approval by the company in general meeting and an approval by the Central Government. So far as managers of companies are concerned, s. 388 provides that the provisions of s. 312 shall apply in relation to the manager of a company, as they apply to a director thereof. It is somewhat interesting to observe that when the Legislature was considering the case of a managing agent, it has thought fit to enact two other sections which deal with the question of succession to the office of a managing agent by inheritance or devise. Section 344 runs as follows:—

"Any agreement made by a company other than a private company which is not a subsidiary of a public company, with its managing agent after the commencement of this Act shall be void so far as it provides for succession to the office by inheritance or devise."

Section 345 runs as follows:—

"345. (1) Where the office of the managing agent of a company is held by an individual at the commencement of this Act and the managing agency agreement provides for succession to the office by inheritance or devise, no person shall succeed to the office on the death of the holder thereof, unless the succession of such person thereto is approved by the Central Government; and that Government shall not accord such approval unless in its opinion, such person is a fit and proper person to hold the office of managing agent of the company.

(2) The provisions of sub-section (1) shall not apply to a private company which is not a subsidiary of a public company."

These provisions make it clear that the Legislature contemplated in the case of a managing agent the question both of transfer of his office by a managing agent and of the succession to that office by inheritance or devise. The Legislature in the case of a director of a company has not sought to legislate specifically for succession to the office by inheritance or devise. The question is whether the Legislature not having done so, the Court should so interpret s. 312 as to see in it the expression of the will or the intention of the Legislature to legislate also in connection with succession to the office of a director by inheritance or devise. I see no warrant for doing so. The words used in the section are not wide enough to include the case of appointment of a director by will or by a testamentary instrument and I do not see anything in the scheme of the Act which would enable me to give an extended meaning to those words in furtherance of what is stated to be the object of the Legislature which I, speaking for myself, am unable to see. The provisions contained in s. 312 are provisions which are intended to take away the rights hitherto exercised by directors of companies. If there is to be any interference with such rights and if any of such rights are intended to be taken away, the Legislature must use appropriate language. Where such language has not been used by the Legislature, it is not for the Court to speculate about the intention of the Legislature and attempt to give effect to it. In the view which I take of the matter, the appointment of defendant No. 2 as a managing director from the date of the demise of Dadoba is a valid appointment as a managing director and is not rendered void by s. 312 of the Companies Act, 1956.

Mr. Maneksha urged that s. 312 does not apply to private companies. I am unable to see how the operation of the provisions of s. 312 can be so excluded. Wherever the Legislature has thought it fit not to apply any particular provision of the Act to a private company or to apply a particular provision of the Act only to a public company or to a private company which is a subsidiary of a public company, it has expressly stated so. In the Chapter in which s. 312 appears s. 315 also appears. That section in terms says that ss. 316 and 317 shall not apply to a private company unless it is a subsidiary of a public company. There is no such reservation in connection with s. 312 and there is nothing in the language of s. 312 which would exclude its operation in relation to private companies.

It has also been urged by Mr. Maneksha that the provisions of art. 109 of the articles of association of the company amount to a delegation of the power of appointing a managing director by the directors of the company. Article 105 of the articles of the company provides that the directors may, from time to time, appoint one or more of their body to be managing director or managing directors of the company, either for a fixed term or without any limitation as to the period for which he or they is or are to hold such office, and may from time to time (subject to the provisions of any contract between him or them and the company) remove or dismiss him or them from office and appoint another or others in his or their place or places. The power conferred on Dadoba is an express power conferred by the articles of the association themselves and cannot be regarded as a power which arises by virtue of any delegation by the directors of their power. The instrument giving rise to the power of the directors to appoint a managing director and to the power of Dadoba to appoint a managing director is one and the same. The source of the power being the same, it is not possible to say that the directors having derived their power under that instrument have thereafter delegated it to Dadoba.

It has been urged on behalf of the respondents that art. 109 contains provisions which are rendered void under s. 312. It is said that art. 109 deals with the power of Dadoba, who was the managing director for life, to appoint by deed inter vivos a managing director in his place and stead, that such appointment is rendered void under s. 312, and that if that be so, no other power under art. 109 can be exercised. In my view, this argument is not well-founded. The power to appoint by will is severable from the power to appoint by deed inter vivos. One power can be exercised without exercising the other.

The next point that has been urged on behalf of the appellants is that the plaintiff has ceased to hold his office as a director. Reliance has been placed for this purpose on s. 283(1)(g) of the Companies Act, 1956, and art. 85(f) of the articles of association of the company. Section 283(1)(g) runs as follows:—

“283. (1) The office of a director shall be vacated if—...

(g) he absents himself from three consecutive meetings of the Board of directors, or from all meetings of the Board for a continuous period of three months, whichever is longer, without obtaining leave of absence from the Board;”

Article 85(f) is to the same effect. After the death of Dadoba various meetings of the board of directors of the company had been called by defendant No. 2. On March 19, 1957, defendant No. 2 purporting to act as a director of the company called a meeting of the board of directors on March 25, 1957. On March 23, 1957, the plaintiff addressed a letter to defendant No. 2 protesting against the action of defendant No. 2 in calling that meeting. He contended that under the articles of association of the company defendant No. 2 was not entitled to call a meeting of the board of directors of the company. In the course of the letter it was stated that as defendant No. 2 was neither the chairman nor the managing director, he was not entitled to call a meeting of the directors. The plaintiff did not attend that meeting. On March 27, 1957, defendant No. 2 purporting to act as the managing director of the company called a meeting of the board of directors of the company on April 2, 1957. On March 29, 1957, the plaintiff addressed a letter to defendant No. 2 contending that the notice convening the meeting on April 2, 1957, was invalid as defendant No. 2 was neither the chairman nor the managing director of the company and was not entitled to call a meeting of the directors without the consent or concurrence of the plaintiff. The plaintiff did not attend the meeting of the board of directors on April 2, 1957. On May 4, 1957, defendant No. 2 purporting to act as the managing director of the company called a meeting of the board of directors on May 13, 1957. On May 8, 1957, the plaintiff addressed a letter to defendant No. 2 reiterating his earlier stand. The plaintiff did not attend that meeting. On May 21, 1957, defendant No. 2 purporting to act as such managing director called a meeting of the board of directors on May 29, 1957. The notice was duly served on the plaintiff. On May 23, 1957, defendant No. 2 as such managing director issued another notice stating that the meeting of the board of directors of May 29, 1957, was postponed to May 31, 1957. The said notice was duly served on the plaintiff. The plaintiff did not attend that meeting. If these meetings had been validly convened, it is not disputed that the plaintiff would cease to be a director of the company having regard to the provisions contained in art. 85(f) and s. 283(1)(g) of the Companies Act, 1956. Article 94 of the articles of association of the company which deals with the summoning of meetings of the board of directors provides as follows:—

“94. The Managing Director may at any time and shall upon the request of any Director convene a meeting of the Directors.”

As I have already held that defendant No. 2 was duly appointed as a managing director of the company at the time when the notices for calling these meetings were given by defendant No. 2 and these meetings were called, he had the right under the provisions of the articles to call such meetings. Such meetings were validly convened and held. The plaintiff absented himself from these meetings without leave of absence from the board of directors and in my judgment he ceased to be a director of the company. On June 28, 1957, a letter was rightly addressed by the company to the plaintiff stating that he had ceased to be a director of the company.

It is urged by Mr. Maneksha that even if the contention of the plaintiff was correct that defendant No. 2 had not been validly appointed as a managing director of the company, defendant No. 2 was admittedly a director of the company and had a right as such director to call a meeting of the board of directors of the company and that the meetings that had been convened by defendant No. 2 were validly convened meetings of the board of directors and that the plaintiff having absented himself therefrom had ceased to be a director. He strongly relies upon a passage in Palmer's Company Precedents, 17th edn., appearing at p. 581, where it has been stated that in the absence of any article otherwise providing or a contrary practice established by the directors it would seem that any director may summon a meeting. It is not anyone's case that there was any contrary practice established by the directors as regards the calling of the meeting of the board of directors. Apart from art. 94, there is no other article dealing with the calling of a meeting of the board of directors, and if in fact there had not been a validly appointed managing director, a director would have the right to call a meeting of the board of directors of the company. It is, however, urged on behalf of the respondents that the meetings other than the meeting called by the notice dated March 19, 1957, were meetings convened by defendant No. 2 in his capacity as the managing director of the company in the exercise of the powers conferred upon him under art. 94 of the articles of association and not in the exercise of his right as a director to call a meeting of the board of directors in the absence of the managing director and that the plaintiff was under no obligation to attend any meeting convened by defendant No. 2 purporting to act as a managing director of the company. Mr. Maneksha urged that if defendant No. 2 had a right as a director to call a meeting, a mere false description of his as a managing director would not render the notices convening the meetings bad. The plaintiff could very well have attended the meetings without prejudice to his contention that defendant No. 2 was not a managing director. There is considerable force in Mr. Maneksha's argument. However, in the view which I take of the matter that defendant No. 2 was a validly appointed managing director of the company, it is not necessary to determine whether if he had not been so appointed the meetings convened by defendant No. 2 as a managing director could be said to be validly convened.

The last point that arises for consideration is as regards the validity of the appointment of defendant No. 3. As the plaintiff ceased to be a director of the company, defendant No. 2 had a right to appoint a director in the place and stead of the plaintiff and the appointment of defendant No. 3 is valid in law.

In the view which I take of the matter, the decree would be that the appeal be allowed with costs and that the suit be dismissed with costs.

S. T. DESAI J. Since we are equally divided on certain points stated below by us, this appeal will have to be heard by one or more of the other Judges of this Court as the Hon'ble the Chief Justice may be pleased to direct. The points on which we are equally divided are:

- (1) Whether appellant No. 2 was validly appointed managing director of appellant No. 1 company.
- (2) Whether respondent No 1 (plaintiff) ceased to be a director of the company, and
- (3) Whether appellant No. 3 has been validly appointed a Director of the company.

THE matter was heard by Mudholkar J.

M. L. Maneksha, with P. N. Bhagwati and B. P. Bhatt, instructed by Amarchand & Mangaldas, for the appellants.

P. P. Khambatta, with Mahendra Shah and P. C. Gawde, for respondent No. 1.

H. S. Singh, instructed by Cama & Jayakar, for respondent No. 2.

MUDHOLKAR J. This matter has come before me under cl. 36 of the Letters Patent on a difference between Mr. Justice S. T. Desai and Mr. Justice K. T. Desai. I have to answer the points on which they have differed, and I shall presently state these points.

The appellants before me are original defendants Nos. 1 to 3. The suit was instituted by the plaintiff respondent No. 1 for obtaining three declarations: that he is and continues to be a director of defendant No. 1 company; that defendant No. 2's appointment as the managing director of defendant No. 1 company was void and that the appointment of defendant No. 3 as a director of the company is invalid, illegal and inoperative. The plaintiff has also asked for grant of injunctions restraining the defendants from preventing the plaintiff from acting as a director of the company and for restraining defendants Nos. 2 and 3 from acting respectively as managing director and director of the company. The suit was decreed by the City Civil Court, which held that defendant No. 2 was not validly appointed as managing director for defendant No. 1; that the plaintiff has not ceased to be a director of the company, and that the appointment of defendant No. 3 as a director of the company was illegal and ineffective.

Defendant No. 1 is a private limited company incorporated under the Indian Companies Act. Prior to the incorporation of the company, the business carried on by it was being carried on by Dadoba, the father of defendants Nos. 2 and 4 and the brother of the plaintiff, and this business was sold by Dadoba to the company. That was on May 21, 1955. On July 7, 1955, an agreement was entered into between Dadoba and the company, whereunder Dadoba was appointed Managing Director of the company. Clause 7 of that agreement which is relevant runs as follows:—

"Mr. Thakoor shall be entitled by deed inter vivos or by will or codicil to appoint any person to be a Managing Director in his place and stead and in default of such appointment the legal representatives of Mr. Thakoor shall be entitled to exercise the said power. Any appointee as aforesaid shall whilst holding office also be designated as a Managing Director and shall be entitled to be paid by the company the same remuneration and to exercise the same powers and authorities as are vested in Mr. Thakoor and the appointee as aforesaid shall have a power of appointing any person to be Managing Director as his successor on the remuneration of not less than Rs. 1,000 (Rupees One thousand) per month and upon the same other terms and conditions as are herein contained."

Under the agreement, Dadoba was to be allotted a certain number of fully paid-up shares of the company. The terms of the agreement are embodied in art. 109 of the articles of association of the company. The relevant part of that article is cl. (b), and it runs as follows:—

"The said Shri Dadoba Kashinath Thakoor may by deed inter vivos or by will or codicil appoint any person to be a Managing Director in his place and stead and in default of such appointment, the legal representatives of the said Shri Dadoba Kashinath Thakoor shall be entitled to exercise the power."

Dadoba died on January 14, 1957. Prior to his death, he had executed a will whereunder he appointed one of his sons, defendant No. 2, to be the managing director of the company from the date of his demise. It may be mentioned that Dadoba has left three sons: defendant No. 2 Govind, defendant No. 4 Harish, and one Deepak, who is a minor and is not a party to this suit. Dadoba held 1971 shares in the company, while defendants Nos. 2 and 4 held 844 and 843 shares respectively. The present plaintiff was also a Director of the company and holds 845 shares. The shares held by Dadoba have devolved, according to the plaintiff, on his three sons.

By virtue of his appointment as managing director under Dadoba's will, defendant No. 2 assumed managing directorship of the company and commenced to draw a sum of Rs. 3,500 per month as his salary, as provided for under the articles of association. The plaintiff challenged the validity of his appointment as a managing director and also of his right to convene meetings of the board of directors. The plaintiff refused to attend these meetings on the ground that defendant No. 2 was not validly appointed managing director and had no right to convene a meeting. Eventually defendant No. 2 informed the plaintiff that he ceased to be a director of the company because of his failure to attend three consecutive meetings of the board of directors and also because of his refusal to attend any meeting for three months. In his place defendant No. 3 Harish was appointed as director by defendant No. 2.

According to defendants Nos. 1 to 3 the appointment of defendant No. 2 is valid, because Dadoba who made the appointment was given a power to make that appointment both under the agreement entered into between him and the company and the articles of association of the company. They also asserted that the meetings of the board of directors were lawfully convened by defendant No. 2 and that the plaintiff, by his failure to attend three consecutive meetings as well as to attend any meeting for three months, had incurred a forfeiture of his rights to hold the office of the director under the articles of association. They further contended that because of the vacancy caused by the cessation of the plaintiff as director, defendant No. 3 was appointed a director by defendant No. 2 under the powers conferred on him by the articles of association and that his appointment is valid.

The learned Judge of the City Civil Court upheld the plaintiff's contentions and negatived those of defendants Nos. 1 to 3 on all these points and decreed the plaintiff's suit. At this stage, I may mention that defendant No. 4 not only did not contest the plaintiff's claim but actually supported it. That is also his stand in this appeal.

It is quite clear from cl. 7 of the agreement, as also from cl. (b) of art. 109, that Dadoba was empowered to appoint another person as managing director in his place. The fact that such power was conferred on Dadoba by the agreement and the articles of association is not disputed. It is, however, contended by the plaintiff that subsequent to the coming into force of the Companies Act, 1956, the assignment of the office of managing director is prohibited, and that, consequently, the assignment made by Dadoba of that office—which is alleged to have become effective upon Dadoba's death on January 14, 1957—in favour of defendant No. 2 in his will is void. In the second place the plaintiff contends that the will executed by Dadoba has not been proved; that caveats have actually been entered, and that until the executor of the will obtains the probate thereof, defendant No. 2 cannot be permitted to assert in this suit the right which he claims to have obtained under the will.

As regards the second point, it is sufficient to observe that though it was raised before the City Civil Court, it does not appear to have been raised before the division bench of this Court, which heard the appeal from the decision of the City Civil Court. The learned Judges of the division bench have differed on three points, which are as follows:—

- (1) Whether the second appellant was validly appointed Managing Director of the first appellant company,
- (2) Whether the first respondent (plaintiff) ceased to be a director of the company, and
- (3) Whether the third appellant has been validly appointed a Director of the company.

They have not set out any other points of difference. Under cl. 36 of the Letters Patent, I have to confine my opinion to these three points, and I do not think that it is open to me to consider any point other than these three points. If the plaintiff thinks it fit so to do, he can raise the point before the division bench after my judgment containing the opinion on the points of difference goes back to it.

Coming to the main point in the case, the argument of the plaintiff is that s. 312 is very widely worded, and it has enacted a prohibition on the assignment of his office by a director, including that by a managing director, to any person, not only by a deed inter vivos but also by a will. Section 312 reads thus:

"Prohibition of assignment of office by director.—

Any assignment of his office made after the commencement of this Act by any director of a company shall be void."

Mr. Maneksha, who appears for the contesting defendants, (who hereafter will be referred as defendants), says that what is prohibited by this section is an assignment, that is, a transfer made inter vivos, and that the appointment or nomination of a person to an office by a will is not prohibited by it. Further, according to him, the prohibition enacted by this section relates only to the transfer of the office of a director, and not to that of a managing director. Also according to him, what the section forbids is the transfer of an office to a person who is not a director, and that consequently it cannot apply to the appointment by a managing director of a director to the office of the managing director.

The first question which falls for consideration is whether the word 'assignment' as used in s. 312 is to be construed widely, so as to include the transmission of an office of a managing director, by will, as contended for by Mr. Khambatta on behalf of the plaintiff, or narrowly, so as to mean only transfer inter vivos, as contended for by Mr. Maneksha. It was contended by Mr. Khambatta that the Courts must bear in mind the object which the Legislature had in view in enacting the section, and accord to the word 'assignment' an appropriate meaning so that the object which the Legislature had in view would be carried out and not frustrated. According to Mr. Maneksha, every statute which takes away the rights of a citizen must be strictly construed, and that the words used by it should not be construed unduly widely. It is no doubt true that a statute which curtails the liberty of the subject, or which takes away or restricts the rights of a citizen, has to be construed strictly. But it does not follow from that that the Courts are free to ignore the object which the Legislature had in view in enacting the statute. It is the primary duty of the Court to give effect to a law made by the Legislature, and when the language used by the Legislature is not clear it is open to the Court to look into the history of the legislation that led up to the enactment of that law or the particular provision which it has to interpret, and to construe the language used by the Legislature keeping in view the historical background. In this connection, I would point out that in the Indian Companies Act of 1913 as originally enacted there was no prohibition against transfer of an office by a director. It was for the first time that the Legislature by enacting the Amending Act of 1936 added s. 86-B, which places a restriction on the assignment of office by a director. The relevant portion of that section is as follows:—

"If in the case of any company provision is made by the articles or by any agreement entered into between any person and the company for empowering a director or manager of the company to assign his office as such to another person, any assignment of office made in pursuance of the said provision shall, notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in the said provision, be of no effect unless and until it is approved by a special resolution of the company:

Provided that the exercise by a director of a power to appoint an alternate or substitute director to act for him during an absence of not less than three months from the district in which meetings of the directors are ordinarily held, if done with the approval of the board of directors, shall not be deemed to be an assignment of office within the meaning of this section."

This provision was the predecessor of s. 312 of the present Act, whereunder the transfer of office by a director is completely prohibited. From the fact that the Legislature thought it fit to go further and to engraft an entirely new provision in the existing Act, it is clear that the Legislature had decided upon a certain policy, and that policy was to prevent wholly the transfer of an office of a director. It is this policy which the Courts must bear in mind and effectuate while construing the new provision.

It was, however, argued by Mr. Maneksha that though the Legislature may have thought it fit to prohibit the transfer of the office of a director, it may not have wanted to do likewise with respect to the office of a managing director. No doubt, the argument proceeded, the managing director enjoys much higher powers than an ordinary director, but so does a managing agent, and transfer of a managing agent's interest is not forbidden. Therefore, according to him, it would not be proper to place wide construction on the words 'director' as well as 'assignment'. Section 343 of the Act does show that a managing agent's office is capable of being transferred, but that section clearly provides that the transfer of that office cannot take effect, unless it is approved both by the company in general meeting and by the Central Government. Thus, though a transfer of this office is not prohibited, it is expressly subjected to certain restrictions. The object of these restrictions is to safeguard the interest of the company. Then again the managing agents have an interest in the company which is in the nature of property. Therefore, the right to transfer it, which is an ordinary incident of property, is attached to it. No one can be said to have property in an office, and ordinarily an office is not transferable. It has been observed by K. T. Desai J. that there are various provisions in the Act dealing with the assignment of office by the holder thereof, but this fact shows that the transferability of the office had to be provided for. No doubt this could be done by statute or by a contract which is not repugnant to the provisions of a statute or is not contrary to public policy. Here, the Legislature in its wisdom has enacted a total prohibition in respect of the transfer of the office of a director and has not made any exception with respect to the office of a managing director.

Then it was contended by Mr. Maneksha that since third parties are often given a right to nominate directors and managing director, the Courts need not look askance at a provision made in an agreement or in the articles of association of a company which permits an existing managing director to transfer his office to another. It is true that financiers, managing agents, Government, etc. are ordinarily given such power to safeguard their interest, but the object underlying the prohibition with respect to directors and managing directors is, apparently, to prevent the establishment of perpetual succession at the will of successive directors or managing directors. There is no danger of this being done where the power to nominate is exercised by a third party from time to time. Apart from that, even if the conferral of power in third parties to make such nominations is open to objection, it cannot be disputed that the Legislature, which is aware of the existence of several evils, has the right to select any of them and provide for their suppression though not of others.

Since it is the policy of the Legislature to prohibit the transfer of an office of a director, it follows that it will not be proper to construe the language of s. 312 in such a way as to give only a partial effect to the policy by holding that all that was prohibited by the section was a transfer inter vivos and that it did not apply to a transfer by a will. If we look at the proviso to s. 86-B, we find therein a reference to the 'power to appoint' a director. The main section, however, refers to the power "to assign the office of a director" and the 'assignment' of the office of a director. Reading the section and the proviso together, it is clear that the Legislature, when it spoke of such assignment or power to assign, understood each of the expressions to include the 'power to appoint'. It did not use the words 'assign' or 'assignment' in this provision in the sense they are used in the law of property. The argument advanced on behalf of the defendants before the division bench that the power of assignment of an office must always be distinguished from the power of appointment or for nomination of another to an office, does not, therefore, appear to be sound.

A reference to Murray's Dictionary as well as to Wharton's Law Lexicon indeed shows, as was pointed out by Mr. S. T. Desai, J., that one of the meanings of the word 'assign' is 'to appoint, designate, ordain, depute'. One of the meanings of the word 'assignment' is 'appointment to office, nomination, designation'. The word 'assign', therefore, is not of a narrow connotation at all.

As I have already stated, the Legislature, when it used in s. 86-B the expressions 'assign his office' and 'assignment of office,' was fully conscious of the fact that the words 'assign' and 'assignment' include 'appointment' or 'power to appoint'. The Legislature consolidated the law relating to companies and amended certain provisions of the pre-existing law and enacted the Companies Act of 1956, and it used the same words 'assign' and 'assignment' in s. 312. It would, therefore, be reasonable to conclude that by repeating these words, the Legislature intended that they should be accorded the same meaning which was ascribable to them under the old law, viz. s. 86-B of the Act of 1913. Upon this view, the word 'assignment' used in s. 312 must not be construed in the narrow sense in which it is used in connection with the law of property, but in a wider sense.

It is, however, strenuously argued by Mr. Maneksha that the assignment by a director of his office by a will does not fall within the provisions of s. 312, because assignment must necessarily be of an existing interest only, and the interest of a director would automatically cease upon his death, and there is thus nothing left for him to transfer or assign. This argument, if accepted, would lead to further difficulties for defendant No. 2, because on that basis it could be held that even in the absence of a provision such as s. 312 of the Companies Act a director would not be able to appoint his successor by a will to take his place. With this part of the matter I shall deal presently. At the moment, however, it would be sufficient to say that the words 'assign' and 'assignment' would include appointment by any mode, whether by deed inter vivos or by a will. If the words are so construed, the question whether the appointer's interest subsisted when the appointment could take effect becomes immaterial.

I may mention that Mr. Maneksha referred me to s. 845 of the Companies Act and s. 31-A of the Insurance Act of 1938 for the purpose of showing that wherever the Legislature intended to prohibit something from being done by a will it has said so expressly, and that since the Legislature has not said expressly that the assignment prohibited by s. 312 includes also one made by will, it must be held that the appointment to an office made by a will is permissible though one made inter vivos may not be. In the first place, the Legislature has not referred in this section to the modes of transmission of office prohibited by this section. It is only upon the construction sought to be placed on the word 'assignment' that the argument is founded, and, as already stated, that construction is not correct. It may further be pointed out that even Mr. Maneksha conceded that the expression 'assignment of office' would also include appointment to the office, provided it was made inter vivos and was not to one who is a director. Once the concession is made as to the scope of the expression, the controversy must be deemed to have ended, because, as already pointed out, the mode of exercising the power is not in any way limited by s. 312, and, therefore, any mode permitted by law can be resorted to. As regards the person in whose favour the exercise of the power is prohibited, s. 312 makes no exceptions in favour of a director. It is true that the appointment of a person who is already a director as a director will be meaningless, but such an appointment, if purported to be made, will fail not only because it is meaningless, but also because of s. 312, which enacts a total prohibition of transmission of a director's office. Thus the two limitations attached to the concession made by Mr. Maneksha must be left out of account. Finally, if this argument is accepted, it would lead to the curious result that what a person cannot do during his life he can, in a sense, do so after his death. I have no doubt that the Legislature could not have intended to bring about such a curious result.

Apart from these considerations, I may refer to the observations of Lord Goddard, C.J. in *Lines v. Hersom*¹ (p. 686):

"...A statute, as we know, has to pass through committee in both Houses of Parliament and amendments are moved from time to time, and it is quite possible to find that an amendment which is moved to an early section in the statute may be worded in one way, while an amendment which is moved to a later section having exactly the same idea is worded in another way; but it does not at all follow that the legislature intends something different because the language of the two sections is not exactly the same."

I may also refer to the following statement of law in Maxwell's Interpretation of Statutes, 10th ed., at p. 326:—

"But, just as the presumption that the same meaning is intended for the same expression in every part of an Act is, as we have seen, not of much weight, so the presumption of a change of intention from a change of language (of no great weight in the construction of any documents) seems entitled to less weight in the construction of a statute than in any other case, for the variation is sometimes to be accounted for by a mere desire to avoid the repeated use of the same words, sometimes by the circumstance that the Act has been compiled from different sources, and sometimes by the alterations and additions from various hands which Acts undergo in their progress through Parliament. Though the statute is the language of the three estates of the realm, it seems legitimate in construing it, to take into consideration that it may have been the production of many minds and that this may better account for any variety of style and phraseology which is found than a desire to convey a different intention. Even where the variation occurs in different statutes, the change is often not indicative of a change of intention, though, where the variation occurs in two different statutes, the presumption of a change of meaning is rather stronger."

From these observations it would be clear that the omission to use the words 'by a will' in s. 312 does not indicate that assignment or transmission of office by will is not prohibited by s. 312. Had the words 'inter vivos' been mentioned in the section, the matter would have stood differently. But the Legislature, as already stated, has contented itself by merely stating that "any assignment" is prohibited. These words are comprehensive enough to include every assignment or transfer of the office of a director or of the appointment by a director of a person to the office of a director in his place, whether by a deed inter vivos or by a will.

I will make a brief reference here to the opinion of text-book writers on the company law in England upon which reliance was placed before me by Mr. Maneksha, though he was at pains to explain, he had cited them before the division bench only upon the suggestion of the Judges constituting it. It may be mentioned that the provisions of s. 204 of the English Companies Act, 1948, to some extent correspond to s. 312 of the Indian Companies Act. In that section also the word 'assignment' has been used. While commenting on that section, Gore-Browne in his Hand-book on Joint Stock Companies observes as follows (pp. 341 and 342):—

"...That section (sec. 204) renders the assignment of the office of director as such to another person of no effect unless and until it is approved by a special resolution of the company. It is difficult to see how a deceased person or his legal personal representatives could assign an office, and possibly in no case would the exercise of a power to appoint a successor under such an Article constitute an 'assignment' of the office, unless the appointment is made by the governing director during his life."

After making these observations, the editor of the book expressed the opinion that the question was a doubtful one and that it would be advisable for any person appointed as successor under such a power to obtain the support of a special resolution.

In Palmer's Company Precedents, 17th edn., at p. 874, the editors of that work observe while commenting on s. 204 as follows:—

"The precise connotation of a power 'to assign office' as mentioned in the section is not clear. It is not thought that it would refer to a provision for the appointment of a successor;..."

The editors of Buckley on the Companies Acts, 13th edn., have, while commenting on s. 204, stated as follows:—

"Quære, what is meant by the expression 'assignment of office' used in this section, which reproduces s. 151 of the 1929 Act."

As pointed out by Mr. Justice K. T. Desai, the editors of Palmer's Company Precedents and Gore-Browne's Hand-book on Joint Stock Companies prefer to express their individual opinions on the subject. The editors of Buckley on Companies Acts have chosen to remain silent.

In my opinion, the fact that a doubt is entertained by some of the authors as to the precise scope and meaning of the word 'assignment' and the fact that according to the editors of one of the books the word 'assignment' must be given a narrow meaning is not very relevant for the purpose of interpreting that word occurring in s. 312 of the Indian Companies Act. It may be mentioned that s. 204 of the English Companies Act does not enact a complete prohibition on a transfer of the office of a director. It merely places a restriction on such a transfer.

A reference was also made by Mr. Maneksha to Form No. 255 in Palmer's Company Precedents, 17th edn., at pp. 734 to 736, the relevant portion of which runs thus:—

"If the said A B dies whilst he holds the office of Governing Director, he may by his will or any codicil thereto appoint any person to be Governing Director in his place, and direct and determine within the limit of this article what shall be the powers, authorities and discretions of such Governing Director, and his remuneration and qualification, and how long he shall be entitled to hold office, and in default of such direction and determination such appointee shall only have the powers of an Ordinary Director."

It is no doubt true that in England the practice still prevails of conferring on a "Governing Director" (who corresponds to a managing director in India) power to appoint any person to be Governing Director in his place by a will. It is not possible to ascertain whether this form, which has no statutory authority, was evolved before the provisions of s. 204 were enacted or afterwards.

In these circumstances, I do not think that much assistance can be gained by reference to these opinions and this form.

The next question to be considered is whether the prohibition enacted in s. 312 is limited to the assignment of an office of a director only, or whether it also extends to the office of a managing director. Now, there is no doubt that a managing director enjoys greater powers than a mere director of a company. It would stand to reason that what is prohibited in the case of a director should also be prohibited in respect of a managing director. Indeed, there may be greater reasons and stronger grounds for prohibiting the assignment of an office which carries with it greater powers than one which does not carry with it such powers.

The word "director" has been defined in s. 2(13) of the Act as follows:—

"'director' includes any person occupying the position of director, by whatever name called;"

It is not disputed that managing directors are a species of directors. Therefore, the expression "managing director" would clearly fall within the definition of "director". It is no doubt true that the expression "managing director" has also been defined in the Act. The definition in s. 2(26) is as follows:—

"'managing director' means a director who, by virtue of an agreement with the company or of a resolution passed by the company in general meeting or by its Board of directors or, by virtue of its memorandum or articles of association, is entrusted with any powers of management which would not otherwise be exercisable by him, and includes a director occupying the position of a managing director, by whatever name called;"

But as this expression falls within the more general expression 'director', it is to be accorded its special meaning only when the context in which it is used so requires. From the fact, therefore, that the expression "managing director" is defined in the Act, it cannot be concluded that the definition of the word "director" is in any way curtailed and that it cannot be deemed to include a 'managing director'. It was contended by Mr. Maneksha that if it was intended that s. 312 should apply to managing directors also, the Legislature would have said so expressly. He also said that wherever the Legislature wanted to do so, it has mentioned both directors as well as managing directors in certain sections of the Act, and that the failure of the Legislature to mention expressly 'managing director' in s. 312 must be deemed to indicate that that section was not intended to apply to his case. In support of his argument, he has referred to ss. 269, 303, 305, 311 and 316. Section 269 deals with the appointment of managing or whole-time director. That section is clearly intended to apply only to that particular kind of directors and is not one which is intended to apply to directors in general. Section 303 deals with register of directors, managing agents, secretaries and treasurers etc. It provides that a body corporate shall maintain a register of its directors, managing director, managing agents, secretaries and treasurers etc. Here the provision requires that a managing director should also be shown as such (and not merely in his capacity of director), in the register, and that is why the Legislature did not limit itself to using the word 'directors' for including the word 'managing director'. Section 305 deals with the duty of directors etc. to make certain disclosure. Every director, managing director etc. must disclose certain particulars to the public relating to the office of any other body corporate which such person owns. But the reason why the Legislature uses the expression 'managing director' also in this section is that the disclosure has to be made by a person within 20 days of his appointment. In order to cover the case of a director who subsequently becomes managing director and has in the meanwhile acquired an interest in any other body corporate, it was necessary to make a special mention of 'managing director' also. As regards ss. 311 and 316, special mention is made of managing directors only, and the word 'director' is not used in those sections, because those sections are intended to apply only to managing directors and not to non-managing directors. On the other hand, it would be clear that the Legislature has in a number of sections contended itself by using the word 'director' only. It cannot be disputed that those sections are intended to apply to all directors including managing directors. In this connection, I may refer to ss. 253, 283, 290, 297, 300 and 312. Mr. Maneksha indeed conceded that in all these sections the word 'director' has to be construed so as to include the managing director also. Now, s. 2, the defining section, states: 'unless the context otherwise requires', every word or expression defined therein shall have the meaning given to it in the definition. In s. 312 the word 'director' alone appears, and therefore unless the context shows that it is to be given a narrower or different meaning, it must be given the meaning which is contained in the definition.

Mr. Maneksha has not been able to show from the context any reason why the word 'director' used in s. 312 should be accorded a meaning narrower than or different from the one given in the definition. He has, on the other hand, contended that the word 'director' should not be deemed to include managing director, unless there were good reasons for doing so. I am afraid there is no warrant for that proposition. It is not supported by any canon of construction. The rule of construction that a general provision must, when inconsistent with a special one, yield to the latter cannot be pressed in aid when the question is whether an expression defined in one Act is to be given its full meaning or not. I, therefore, hold that the prohibition enacted in s. 312 applies not merely to the assignment or transmission of the office of a director, but also to that of a managing director. I, therefore, come to the conclusion that s. 312 not only applies to managing directors but also prohibits the transmission of the office of a director as well as a managing director, whether inter vivos or by will.

The next question which falls for consideration is whether it prohibits the transfer of the office by a managing director to a director. As already pointed out, Mr. Maneksha has argued that a managing director being merely a director with some additional powers, the transfer by him of his office to a person, who is already a director, cannot be regarded as transfer of the office of the director, which would be meaningless but that it is only a transfer of the rights of a managing director of his right of management. He, therefore, contended that such a transfer would not be hit by s. 312, inasmuch as that section does not expressly prohibit the transfer of the right of management. It is no doubt true that a managing director is a director who has the right of management and who is charged with certain responsibilities. It is conceivable that a managing director purports to effect a transfer of only his right of management and nothing more, or he transfers all his rights: Whether he has done one or the other would depend upon the construction of the document by which he makes the transfer. Therefore, what we must ascertain here is whether Dadoba, when he assigned his office to defendant No. 2, merely assigned his right of management, or the totality of his rights as a managing director.

Before doing so, I would, however, like to make one observation, and it is this. Section 312 speaks merely of the assignor or the appointer, and not the assignee or the appointee. What it says in terms is that a director cannot assign his office. It does not say that a director cannot assign the office to persons belonging to a particular class and that it is open to him to assign his office to persons belonging to another class. What is, therefore, to be considered is, what is it that the director is prohibited from doing? That is to say, what is the kind of assignment which a director is precluded from making, and not what is the class of persons in whose favour he cannot make an assignment.

What has thus to be ascertained is the power which Dadoba was entitled to exercise under the agreement and under cl. (b) of art. 109, and what Dadoba did in the exercise of that power. The relevant words of cl. 7 of the agreement and cl. (b) of art. 109 are conferring the identical power, and, therefore, it is not necessary to consider these two clauses separately. I will, therefore, content myself by keeping in view cl. (b) of art. 109. Now, that clause says that Dadoba may, by deed inter vivos or by will or codicil, appoint any person to be a managing director in his place and stead. Now, the words 'appoint any person' are very important. By using these words an unrestricted or unlimited power was conferred on Dadoba in the matter of making an appointment to the office of managing director. This clause did not confine Dadoba's power to appoint only a director to the office of managing director. Now, if s. 312 is construed to prohibit the appointment of a person as managing director, who is not already a director, as contended for by Mr. Maneksha, even then the source of Dadoba's power to make an appointment must be held to be repugnant to the provisions of s. 312. If, on the other hand, s. 312 is interpreted as prohibiting the appointment by a managing director of a director as a managing director in his place, then no further question arises.

Section 9 of the Act expressly provides that the provisions of the Act shall have effect notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in the articles of a company, or in any agreement executed by it, and that any provision contained in the articles of the company, to the extent to which it is repugnant to the provisions of the Act, becomes void. Now, in order to consider whether a particular provision in an agreement or articles of association is saved or is rendered void because of any repugnancy to a provision of the Act, what the Court must examine is the provision itself. This provision, as I have already pointed out, is wide in its terms, and is, therefore, even on the argument of Mr. Maneksha, repugnant to the provisions of s. 312. Mr. Maneksha, however, argued that the provision would be rendered void only to the extent of the repugnancy, and that that part of the provision which is not repugnant to any of the provisions of the Act would be saved. He further said that though the conferral of any wide power to appoint any person as managing director may be repugnant to the provisions of s. 312, the power to appoint a director to the office of the managing director, which would fall within the power conferred on Dadoba under cl. (b) of art. 109, will not be repugnant to that section, and will therefore be saved. I am afraid this argument cannot be accepted, because it would involve reading in the clause some words which are not there. It would have been a different matter, if cl. (b) of art. 109 had read "appoint a director or any other person" to the office of the managing director. No doubt, the power to appoint any person conferred by this clause would include power to appoint a person, who happens to be a director. But that is not the consideration to be borne in mind, while deciding the question as to whether the power conferred by that clause is saved by s. 9, or is rendered void by it. We must read the clause as it is, and we must give the fullest meaning to what is said there, and then consider whether the clause as it exists is repugnant to any provision of the Act. Looking at the clause that way, it is clear that the unqualified or unlimited power conferred on Dadoba to appoint any person to be a managing director is wholly repugnant to the provisions of s. 312, and is, therefore, void. From this it would follow that on the date on which the new Companies Act came into force, the source of Dadoba's power to make an appointment dried up, inasmuch as the conferral of the power to appoint any person as managing director was rendered void. According to the defendants Dadoba exercised this power in appointing defendant No. 2 as a managing director in his place by will. As the source of the power had dried up Dadoba possessed no power which he could effectively exercise by his will.

At this place, it would be convenient to mention another argument advanced by Mr. Maneksha. He contended that cl. (b) confers two kinds of powers on Dadoba; one is to make an appointment by a deed, and the other, to make one under will or codicil, and that even though the power to make an appointment inter vivos is affected by s. 9 of the Act, that to make an appointment by will or codicil is not so affected. It would be mere repetition to state that s. 312 applies both to appointment inter vivos as well as to one by will or codicil. Apart from that, I am of opinion that cl. (b) does not confer two powers, but only one, and that is the power to make appointment. No doubt, it prescribes two modes in which that power can be exercised, that is, by deed inter vivos, or by will or codicil. But there is a difference between the conferral of a power to do a thing and prescribing ways or modes in which that thing could be done. Merely because a thing could be done in two or more different ways, it cannot be said that two or more different powers to do that thing were conferred.

•One more argument advanced by Mr. Maneksha must be considered. He says that while interpreting cl. (b) of art. 109, we must also bear in mind the provisions of arts. 105 and 106, and that if these provisions are considered, it would be clear that only a director can be appointed as a managing director, and, therefore, the words "any person" used in cl. (b) must be interpreted to mean only a director. Article 105 deals with the power of the directors to appoint a managing director. It no doubt says that the directors' power will be confined to appoint only one of them as a managing director. This article deals with the powers of directors only, and not those of Dadoba, which are separately dealt with in cl. (b) of art. 109. There is nothing in the latter clause to indicate that the provisions thereof are in any way controlled by art. 105. This article, if I may say so, embodies the relevant terms of the agreement. The agreement makes no reference to the powers of the directors to appoint a managing director, and, therefore, it would not be correct to hold that what was not in the contemplation of the parties at the time of the agreement ought to be borne in mind while construing cl. (b) of art. 109. Article 106 specifies the provisions to which a managing director will be subject, and says that a managing director shall not be reckoned as a director for the purpose of determining the rotation of retirement of the directors, or in fixing the number of directors to retire. Here again, the article deals with the matter which is independent of art. 109, and there is no reason why the language used in cl. (b) of art. 109 should be deemed to be controlled by anything said in this article, art. 106.

Earlier in my judgment I have said that I shall deal with Mr. Maneksha's argument to the effect that where a managing director makes the appointment of another as managing director in his place or stead after his death, there can be no effective transmission of office by assignment, because whatever interest Dadoba had had ceased to exist at his death. In connection with this argument, Mr. Khambatta referred to a Madras case, which says that the law knows no vacuum, and that as soon as the managing director, who makes the assignment or appointment of another managing director, died, the assignee or the appointee takes his place and that there is no hiatus. Mr. Maneksha rightly pointed out that the maxim that law knows no vacuum applies to succession to property, and not to succession to office. I will, therefore, proceed on the basis that Dadoba's interest as a managing director ceased at the moment of his death, and that in a narrower sense he could not assign that interest to any one by will. But, as already stated, the word 'assignment' must be understood in a wide sense, so as to include the power to appoint another in one's place.

However, even if one proceeds on the basis of the argument of Mr. Maneksha, the result would be almost the same. Now, a will speaks from the death of the testator. The exercise by a person of a power to appoint by will becomes irrevocable only from the moment of death, inasmuch as the will is liable to be revoked till death. A power to make appointment by will cannot, therefore, be deemed to have been exercised effectively, until it has been so exercised or revoked. We have seen that the agreement and the articles of association empowered Dadoba to appoint another person "in his place and stead" as a managing director. The term in this regard, therefore, contemplates Dadoba's continuing to be a managing director, till he exercised the power to make the appointment. Dadoba was to be a managing director for life, and, therefore, he ceased to be one upon his death. Since, as already observed, the will operates from death, the powers are deemed to have been exercised effectively by Dadoba at the moment of his death. It is true, as contended by the defendants, that Dadoba had no interest left and held no office which he could transfer after the moment of his death. The term in art. 109, cl. (b), it must be remembered, allowed him to appoint another as managing director only "in his place and stead". This means that he was entitled to substitute another person for himself. Such a substitution is possible only when at the point of time the substitution came into effect Dadoba continued to be a managing director. It was not within the competence of Dadoba to so make an appointment as to bring substitution into effect after he ceased to be a managing director. In my opinion, if the exercise of the power became effective only after Dadoba's death, there was nothing existing at the time of his death upon which that power could operate, because at the moment of death he ceased to be a managing director. The conclusion to be drawn from this, therefore, is that the substitution permitted by cl. 7 of the agreement and in art. 109, cl. (b) of the articles could be made only during the lifetime of Dadoba and while he continued to be a managing director. No doubt, the agreement does refer to the exercise of the powers to make an appointment by will or codicil; but by reason of the use of the words "in his place and stead", effect cannot be given to those words which gave him power to make an appointment by will or codicil. I, therefore, hold that though Dadoba has exercised his power by will, but no effect can be given to the exercise of his power, for the simple reason that at the moment the exercise of the power could become effective Dadoba had ceased to have any interest left.

For all these reasons, therefore, agreeing with S. T. Desai J. I hold that the appointment of defendant No. 2 by will as the managing director was invalid. Accordingly I answer the first question in the negative.

Now, coming to the second question on which the learned Judges of the Division Bench have differed, my answer is also in the negative..

The contention on behalf of the defendants is that the plaintiff, by his failure to attend certain number of meetings, has forfeited his office of director. Now, if the meetings are validly convened by someone who is empowered to convene them, a director by failing to attend them, may incur a forfeiture of the office of the director. But here the person who convened the meetings as managing director had no right as such to convene them. It is, however, contended by Mr. Maneksha that the meetings could be convened by any director, and that since all the meetings during the period in question were convened by defendant No. 2, who was at least a director then, the plaintiff, by his failure to attend those meetings, has incurred forfeiture. There is no provision in the Act or in the articles which entitles any director to call a meeting. Article 94 of the articles runs thus:

"The Managing Director may at any time and shall upon request of any Director convene a meeting of the Directors. It shall not be necessary to give notice of a meeting of the Directors to a Director who is not in Bombay. Questions arising at any meeting shall be decided by a majority of votes, and in case of an equality of votes, the Chairman shall have a second or casting vote."

It is implicit in this article that a meeting can be convened only by a managing director, and that when a director wants a meeting to be convened, he must request the managing director to convene it. This article thus negatives the right of a director to convene a meeting. Mr. Maneksha has said that if there is no managing director in existence, it would create an impasse if the Court were to hold that no meetings could be convened by a director. Perhaps, such a result would ensue; but even so there is no ground for holding that despite the provisions of art. 94, any director has a right to convene a meeting. Where there is no managing director, the remaining directors can, by acting jointly, convene a meeting. It may, of course, happen that there is a disagreement among the directors about this matter; but if there is such disagreement, the parties must necessarily have recourse to the Courts of law. This is what always happens where there is a conflict of rights and disagreement among the parties about any matter.

Since, in my opinion, the plaintiff has not forfeited his office of a director, it follows that no question arose for appointing another in his place. Furthermore, a vacancy in the office of the director could be filled either by a managing director making an appointment, or by the directors doing so. Here, as already stated, defendant No. 2, who purported to make the appointment of or director, had no right to make the appointment. Accordingly, my answer to the third question is also in the negative.

The papers may now be sent back to the Division Bench with my answer. The matter will be dealt with further by the learned Judges constituting the Bench, including the question of costs.

Answers accordingly.

M/S JASWANTLAL JAGJIVANDAS AND CO. v. "WESTERN

Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act (Bom. LVII of 1947), Secs. 28, 15, 13(1)(e), 5(3) & (11)—Applicability of s. 28—Suit not between landlord and tenant and in which no claim or question arises out of the Act or its provisions as disclosed in plaint—Defendant in suit contending that he is a tenant—Whether such suit covered by s. 28—Sub-tenancy as between tenant and sub-tenant whether unlawful under s. 15.

In order to decide whether a suit comes within the purview of s. 28 of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, what must be considered is what the suit as framed in substance is and what the relief claimed therein is. If the suit as framed is by a landlord or a tenant and the relief asked for is in the nature of a claim which arises out of the Act or any of its provisions, then only and not otherwise will it be covered by s. 28 of the Act.

A suit which is essentially one between the landlord and tenant does not cease to be such a suit merely because the defendant denies the claim of the plaintiff. In the same way, a suit which is not between the landlord and tenant and in which judging by the plaint no claim or question arises out of the Act or any of its provisions does not become a suit covered by the provisions of s. 28 of the Act as soon as the defendant raises a contention that he is a tenant.

Govindram Salamatrai v. Dharampal¹ and Babulal Bhurmal v. Nandram Shitoram², referred to.

Under s. 15 of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, there can be no valid sub-tenancy after the coming into operation of the Act notwithstanding anything contained in any other law. Therefore, under s. 15 what has been made unlawful is not only a sub-tenancy as against the landlord but also a sub-tenancy as between the tenant and the sub-tenant.

Narayanrao Krishna Ghate v. Purushottam Kalidas³, agreed with.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

M. A. Sakhardande, S. Redis and P. B. Naik, instructed by P. R. Gandhi and M. D. Pathak, for the appellants.

D. P. Madan, with N. S. Phatharphekar, instructed by Crawford Bailey & Co., for the respondents.

V. S. DESAI J. The respondents are a company incorporated in the State of Delaware in the United States of America and have a place of business in Bombay at Metro House, Mahatma Gandhi Road, Bombay 1. The respondents were the tenants of a godown situate at 51, Dockyard Road, Mazgaon, Bombay. On December 1, 1955, the respondents purported to create a sub-tenancy in favour of the appellants in respect of the eastern portion of the godown at 51, Dockyard Road, on certain terms and conditions as set out in the letter which they wrote to the appellants on December 1, 1955. In respect of the goods stored in the godown there was an insurance effected by the respondents and they were paying certain insurance premium. It appears that as a result of the use made by the appellants of the portion sub-let to them the insurance premium which the respondents had to pay was increased. Therefore, on January 5, 1956, the respondents asked the appellants to remove storing of rice bags and also stop polishing of rice which they were alleged to be doing in the sub-let portion of the godown. The appellants denied the correctness of the facts alleged by the respondents with the result that the respondents informed the appellants by their letter dated January 30, 1956, that the purported sub-tenancy did not create any rights in their favour and they were, therefore, trespassers and called upon them to vacate the premises occupied by them by the end of February 1956. The appellants claimed protection under the Bombay Rent Act. This led to some further correspondence between the parties and a meeting was fixed to see if the matter could be settled. However, the meeting did not materialise and after some further correspondence the respondents filed a suit in the City Civil Court, out of which the present appeal arises, alleging that the appellants were trespassers having no right to continue in possession or in the alternative they were at best licensees in respect of the eastern portion of the godown and their licence was validly revoked and terminated by the respondents. In the suit which they filed, the respondents claimed to recover possession with mesne profits and costs.

The defendants resisted the suit contending that there was a valid contract of sub-tenancy subsisting between the parties; that the said sub-tenancy had not been legally and validly terminated and the plaintiffs were not, therefore, entitled to the relief of possession. They also contended that the suit was one which fell within the purview of s. 28 of the Bombay Rent Act and was not, therefore, capable of being entertained by the City Civil Court and could be entertained only by the Court of Small Causes, Bombay. The defendants denied that they were trespassers and contended that they had paid all dues payable by them up to and inclusive of May 1956. They further denied that they had committed any acts contrary to the terms of the sub-tenancy and also denied that there was any nuisance of rats because of the storage of rice. They also denied having polished the rice in the godown and that their acts were responsible for the increase in the premium rates. It was also contended by the defendants that even if the contract of sub-tenancy was unlawful, the plaintiffs were not entitled to sue them in ejectment by taking advantage of their own wrong. The defendants contended that the letter of December 1, 1955, did not create only a licence in their favour, and even if it created a licence in their favour, the said licence was not validly revoked nor had they committed any breach of the terms and conditions of the licence. They denied their liability to pay any extra premium and further contended that the sum of Rs. 1,200 which they had kept with the plaintiffs could not be treated as deposit because of the provisions of the Bombay Rent Act.

The trial Court held that it had jurisdiction to entertain and try the suit and that the existence of the contract of sub-tenancy dated December 1, 1955, did not disentitle the plaintiffs from maintaining their suit. It further held that the defendants were not sub-tenants of the plaintiffs in respect of the eastern portion of the godown in suit as contended by the defendants and the plaintiffs were entitled to eject the defendants from the premises in suit. The trial Court, however, did not think it necessary to consider the question whether the defendants were licensees of the plaintiffs in respect of the suit premises and whether there was any breach of the terms of the licence or whether the licence was validly revoked and terminated by the plaintiffs. In respect of the claim made by the plaintiffs for the increased amount of insurance premium or for past mesne profits, the trial Court took the view that those claims could not be allowed. It also appears that the plaintiffs did not press for those claims and stated to the Court that they were giving up those claims. In view of these conclusions, the trial Court passed a decree in favour of the plaintiffs ordering the defendants to deliver possession of the suit premises to the plaintiffs and future mesne profits at the rate of Rs. 400 per month for a period of three years from the date of the decree or until delivery of possession, whichever event happened first. Plaintiffs were also awarded costs of the suit. Against this decree passed by the trial Court the defendants have come to this Court in the present appeal.

Mr. Sakhardande, who appears for the defendants-appellants, has urged before us that the lower Court has erred in holding that it had jurisdiction to try the suit. According to Mr. Sakhardande, this was a suit which fell within the purview of s. 28 of the Bombay Rent Act and was within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Court of Small Causes, Bombay. Section 28 of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, so far as it is material, provides:

"Notwithstanding anything contained in any law and notwithstanding that by reason of the amount of the claim or for any other reason, the suit or proceeding would not, but for this provision, be within its jurisdiction,

(a) in Greater Bombay, the Court of Small Causes, Bombay, ... shall have jurisdiction to entertain and try any suit or proceeding between a landlord and a tenant relating to the recovery of rent or possession of any premises to which any of the provisions of this Part apply. . . and to deal with any claim or question arising out of this Act or any of its provisions and subject to the provisions of sub-section (2), no other Court shall have jurisdiction to entertain any such suit, . . . or to deal with such claim or question."

In order that the provisions of this section may apply, the suit must be between a landlord and a tenant. It must relate to the recovery of rent or possession of any premises to which any of the provisions of Part II of the Act apply and in which any claim or question arising out of the Act or any of its provisions must arise. Now, in the present case, the suit relates to the recovery of possession of premises to which the provisions of Part II of the Act apply. What must, however, be found is whether it is a suit between a landlord and a tenant. The words 'landlord' and 'tenant' are both defined under the Act, and we have to see whether the parties to the present suit are within those definitions. The word 'landlord' which is defined in s. 5(3) includes in respect of his sub-tenant a tenant who has sub-let any premises, and the word 'tenant' which is defined in s. 5(11) states, so far as is material for our purposes, that a "tenant" means any person by whom or on whose account rent is payable for any premises and includes—(a) such sub-tenants and other persons as have derived title under a tenant before the coming into operation of this Act,..."

It will be seen from the provisions of the Act that a sub-tenant whose sub-tenancy is created after the coming into operation of the Act is not recognised at all. It is only those sub-tenants, who have derived their title as sub-tenants before the coming into operation of the Rent Act, i.e., before February 13, 1948, that are included within the inclusive part of the definition of the word 'tenant'. The word 'tenant' therefore, in s. 28 must mean, so far as sub-tenants are concerned, only a sub-tenant whose sub-tenancy is created prior to February 13, 1948. A person in whose favour a sub-tenancy is created after February 13, 1948, is not a tenant within the definition of the word 'tenant' in the Rent Act at all and no provisions of the Rent Act can apply to such a person. In the present case, it is admitted that the sub-tenancy on which the defendants rely has been created for the first time on December 1, 1955. They are, therefore, not a "tenant" within the meaning of the word as used in s. 28 and the suit against the defendants, therefore, is not a suit between a landlord and a tenant so as to be triable exclusively by the Court of Small Causes, Bombay. Therefore, the provisions of s. 28 do not apply to the present case, and the suit, is not within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Court of Small Causes, Bombay.

Moreover, the suit which has been filed in the present case is on the basis of title by an owner against a trespasser or alternatively on the basis of a license by a licensor against a licensee. No doubt, the letter of December 1, 1955, which purports to create a sub-tenancy has been referred to in the plaint, but it has been referred to not with a view to admit that the plaintiffs are landlords and the defendants tenants but to emphasise that the defendants are trespassers or at best licensees. The suit, therefore, is a suit as against a trespasser or licensee, on the plaint which the plaintiffs have filed, and such a suit is certainly not one which is within the jurisdiction of the Court of Small Causes, Bombay. The jurisdiction of the Court has to be decided initially at the time of the inception of the suit, and on the plaint which the plaintiffs have filed, there is no doubt that the suit is within the jurisdiction of the City Civil Court. It is, however, contended that although the plaintiffs have filed their suit on the basis of a suit by an owner against a trespasser or alternatively on the basis of a suit by a licensor against a licensee, the defendants have set up a contention of tenancy and, therefore, the suit is one which is governed by s. 28 of the Bombay Rent Act. Now, the question whether a suit, in which the plaintiff alleges that the defendant is a trespasser or a licensee but the defendant contends that he is a tenant, is a suit which can be tried only by the Special Court under the Bombay Rent Act has been the subject-matter of decision of a division bench of this High Court in Govindram Salamatrai v. Dharampal.¹ In that case, a suit was filed on the Original Side of this High Court by the plaintiff alleging that the defendant was a licensee. The defendant contended that he was a tenant entitled to protection of the Rent Act. It was urged that the question whether the defendant was a tenant or a licensee was one which arose under the Bombay Rent Act, and since s. 28 of the Bombay Rent Act conferred exclusive jurisdiction on the special Courts under the Act to deal with any claim or question arising out of the Bombay Rent Act it was the Small Causes Court alone and not the High Court which had jurisdiction to deal with and dispose of the question whether the defendant was a tenant or not. In negating this contention the division bench held that when a plaintiff files a suit against a defendant alleging that the defendant is a licensee or a trespasser it is a suit which cannot be entertained by the Small Causes Court, because it is not a suit between a landlord and a tenant, and judging by the plaint no question arises out of the Rent Act or any of its provisions which would have to be determined on the plaint as it stands. The jurisdiction of a Court is normally and ordinarily to be determined at the time of the inception of the suit and a suit by a plaintiff against the defendant alleging that the defendant is a licensee or a trespasser is at its inception within the jurisdiction of the High Court or the City Civil Court and not in the Small Causes Court. The Court in which the suit is filed does not cease to have jurisdiction as soon as the defendant raises a contention that he is a tenant. The question which such contention raises is a jurisdictional question which has got to be determined in order to decide whether the particular Court in which the suit is filed has or has not jurisdiction to try the suit and s. 28 of the Rent Act does not deal with jurisdictional questions which have got to be decided in limine before matters arising under the Act can be decided by the Court. It was held that there was nothing in s. 28 of the Rent Act to warrant the contention that the High Court had been deprived of its jurisdiction in all suits for possession wherever the defendant took up the contention that he was a tenant. The jurisdiction was deprived in cases where the landlord filed a suit against a tenant and the tenant claimed protection under the Rent Act or in cases where although the plaintiff alleged that the defendant was a trespasser or a licensee but it ultimately turned out that the defendant was not a trespasser or a licensee but a tenant and that he was entitled to the protection of the Rent Act. In view of this decision, which is directly in point, Mr. Sakhardande's contention that the present suit was not within the jurisdiction of the City Civil Court cannot succeed.

1 (1951) 53 Bom. L.R. 386.

It is urged by Mr. Sakhardande that the authority of this decision is considerably shaken by a recent decision of the Supreme Court in Babulal Bhurmal v. Nandram Shivram.² We do not think that Mr. Sakhardande is right in this submission. On the other hand, the observations in this decision, to which Mr. Sakhardande has invited our attention, in our view, far from supporting his submission, go against his contention. In that case, a landlord after giving a notice to quit to his tenant on December 6, 1947, filed a suit against him in the Court of Small Causes, Bombay, joining to the suit two other persons who were alleged to be sub-tenants of the tenant. The landlord's case was that the tenancy of his tenant was validly terminated and he was entitled to evict his tenant; that the alleged sub-tenants of the tenant were trespassers who had no right to be on the premises. The suit succeeded in the Small Causes Court, the Court holding that the sub-tenants were not lawful sub-tenants, the sub-letting by the tenant to them being contrary to law. The Small Causes Court, therefore, passed a decree against the plaintiff and the alleged sub-tenants. Thereafter, the tenant as plaintiff No. 1 and the alleged sub-tenants as plaintiffs Nos. 2 and 3 filed a suit against the landlord in the City Civil Court for a declaration that plaintiff No. 1 was a tenant of the defendant and was entitled to protection under the Rent Act and that plaintiffs Nos. 2 and 3 were lawful sub-tenants of plaintiff No. 1 and were entitled to possession and occupation of the premises as sub-tenants thereof. A question was raised in the City Civil Court as to whether the City Civil Court had jurisdiction to entertain the suit. The City Civil Court held that it had jurisdiction to entertain the suit, but dismissed it on merits. In the appeal which was filed in the High Court, the High Court dismissed the appeal holding that the City Civil Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit and, therefore, the suit filed by the plaintiffs in the City Civil Court was not maintainable. It was from this decision of the High Court that an appeal was filed in the Supreme Court and the question which the Supreme Court had to consider was whether the suit, filed by the plaintiffs was within the jurisdiction of the City Civil Court. It was urged before the Supreme Court that the suit was maintainable under s. 29A of the Bombay Rent Act which provided that nothing contained in ss. 28 or 29 should be deemed to bar a party to a suit, proceeding or appeal mentioned therein in which a question of title to premises arises and is determined, from suing in a competent Court to establish his title to such premises. The Supreme Court held that a suit which was competent to establish title under s. 29A was a suit to establish title de hors the Bombay Rent Act and not a suit which sought to establish title which required to be established under the Rent Act itself. It was held:

"...It is possible to conceive of cases where in a suit under s. 28 of the Act a question of title to the premises which does not arise out of the Act or any of its provisions may be determined incidentally. Any party to the suit aggrieved by such a determination would be free to sue in a competent Court to establish his title to such premises by virtue of the provisions of s. 29A of the Act. On the other hand, in a suit where a question of title entirely arises out of the Act or any of its provisions, the jurisdiction to try such a suit is exclusively vested in the Courts specified in s. 28 and no other. That is to say, a title which could not be established outside the Act but which arose under the provisions of the Act by virtue of a claim made thereunder must be determined by a Court specified in s. 28 and a title de hors the Act may be determined in any other Court of competent jurisdiction. By enacting s. 29A the Legislature clearly intended that no finality should be attached to the decision of a Court trying a suit under s. 28 on a question of title de hors the Act."

It will thus be seen that the question which arose before the Supreme Court and was decided in this case related to the scope of suits which were permitted under s. 29A of the Rent Act and had no direct bearing on the question which was decided in the case reported in Govindram Salamatrai v. Dharampal. It is argued, however, that in deciding the question which was before them their

Lordships of the Supreme Court have construed the provisions of s. 28 of the Rent Act and discussed the scope of these provisions and the suits which fall within the purview of the said section, and the observations which their Lordships have made in that connection support the contention that a suit in which the plaintiff alleges that the defendant is a licensee or trespasser, but the defendant contends that he is a tenant, falls within the purview of s. 28 of the Rent Act and the jurisdiction to entertain and try such suits belongs exclusively to the special Courts as specified in s. 28. The observations on which reliance is placed occur firstly at p. 957 of the report in Babulal Bhurmal v. Nandram Shivram. Their Lordships have observed:

"...Do the provisions of s. 28 cover a case where in a suit one party alleges that he is the landlord and denies that the other is his tenant or vice versa and the relief asked for in the suit is in the nature of a claim which arises out of the Act or any of its provisions? The answer must be in the affirmative on a reasonable interpretation of s. 28." These observations do not lend support to the submission which is urged before us by Mr. Sakhardande. With great respect, it appears clear to us from these observations that in order to decide whether a suit comes within the purview of s. 28 what must be considered is what the suit as framed in substance is and what the relief claimed therein is. If the suit as framed is by a landlord or a tenant and the relief asked for is in the nature of a claim which arises out of the Act or any of its provisions, then only and not otherwise will it be covered by s. 28. This is made abundantly clear by what their Lordships have observed immediately after the observations quoted above. Their Lordships have observed (p. 959):

"Suit No. 483/4400 of the Court of Small Causes, Bombay, was admittedly by a landlord. Eviction of the tenant and those to whom he had sublet the premises was sought on the ground that the latter were trespassers and the former was not entitled to remain in possession, that is to say, that none of the defendants to that suit were protected from eviction by any of the provisions of the Act. The suit, in substance, was a denial of the right of the defendants as tenants. The claim of the defendants was that they were protected by the provisions of the Act. In such a suit the claim of the defendants was one which arose out of the Act or any of its provisions and only the Courts specified in s. 28 and no other could deal with it and decide the issue."

Mr. Sakhardande has next relied on the observations at p. 958 of the report in Babulal Bhurmal v. Nandram Shivram where their Lordships have stated:

"...On a proper interpretation of the provisions of s. 28 the suit contemplated in that section is not only a suit between a landlord and a tenant in which that relationship is admitted but also a suit in which it is claimed that the relationship of a landlord and a tenant within the meaning of the Act subsists between the parties."

These observations also do not help Mr. Sakhardande for, here again the emphasis is on the suit as framed and on what the suit as framed in substance is. These observations occur in the context where their Lordships were considering the suit filed in the City Civil Court. Considering the suit filed in the City Civil Court, their Lordships pointed out that the suit was one relating to possession of premises to which the provisions of Part II of the Act applied and claims and questions arising out of the Act or any of its provisions were required to be dealt with in the suit. Independently of the Act, the plaintiff in the suit disclosed no cause of action. Their Lordships then observed (p. 958):

"...The suit, therefore, was essentially a suit between a landlord and a tenant. The suit did not cease to be a suit between a landlord and a tenant merely because the defendants denied the claim of the plaintiffs."

In view of these observations it is not possible to accept the contention which has been urged by Mr. Sakhardande. A suit which is essentially one between the landlord and tenant does not cease to be such a suit merely because the defendant denies the claim of the plaintiff. In the same way, a suit which is not between the landlord and tenant and in which judging by the plaintiff no claim or question arises out of the Rent Act or any of its provisions does not become a suit covered by the provisions of s. 28 of the Act as soon as the defendant raises a contention that he is a tenant. As we have already observed earlier, the observations of their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Babulal Bhurmal v. Nandram Shivram on which Mr. Sakhardande seeks to rely far from supporting him go against his contention.

Mr. Sakhardande has then contended that the lower Court has erred in holding that the defendants are not the lawful sub-tenants of the plaintiffs. He argues that under s. 15 of the Bombay Rent Act what has been made unlawful is a sub-tenancy as against the landlord but not a sub-tenancy as between the tenant and the sub-tenant. Mr. Sakhardande says that reading s. 13(1)(e) together with s. 15 of the Act, it would be clear that sub-letting is not unlawful as between the tenant and the sub-tenant. Section 13(1)(e) provides that if a tenant sub-lets the whole or part of the premises, the landlord will be entitled to evict him. Section 15 states that it will not be lawful for a tenant to sub-let the whole or any part of the premises let to him. It is argued that if the meaning of s. 15 was that there could be no sub-letting in law at all, even if purported to be effected between the tenant and the sub-tenant, s. 13(1)(e) could not have used the word "sub-let". According to Mr. Sakhardande, the object in enacting s. 15 was that the sub-letting by the tenant to the sub-tenant should not avail as against the landlord and should not afford the sub-tenant any protection under the Rent Act. Now, if the object in enacting s. 15 was only that the sub-tenancy should not avail as against the landlord, we do not see why it was necessary to enact s. 15, because that provision had been made by s. 13(1)(e) itself, which provided that, not only would a sub-tenancy not avail as against the landlord but it would provide him with a ground to evict the tenant himself. If the object in enacting s. 15 was only to deprive the sub-tenant of the protection of the Rent Act, we do not see why the language of that section should have been in these general words.

An argument similar to the one which is advanced before us by Mr. Sakhardande was advanced before this Court in an unreported decision in Narayanrao Krishna Ghate v. Purushottam Kalidas.³ It was contended there that s. 15 was merely complementary to s. 13(1)(e) and no penal provision had been enacted and, therefore, notwithstanding s. 15 a valid sub-tenancy could be treated as between tenant and sub-tenant. This argument was negatived and it was observed:

"... S. 13(1)(e) deprives a tenant of the protection of the Rent Act who sub-lets the premises let out to him. It is difficult to understand why it was at all necessary to enact sec. 15 if the only object of enacting that section was to make it complementary to what the Legislature had already enacted in sec. 13(1)(e). Sec. 13(1)(e) is self-contained and its object is, as I said, to deprive a tenant of the protection of the Rent Act who has sublet the premises let out to him. The object of sec. 15 is entirely different. It embodies the policy of the law that after the Act came into force no sub-tenancy should be created, and, therefore, the Legislature has advisedly used the language which one finds in sec. 15, viz. that it shall not be lawful, after the coming into operation of the Act, for any tenant to sublet the whole or any part of the premises let to him or to assign or transfer in any other manner his interest therein."

With great respect, we are in complete agreement with the view taken in this case with regard to the interpretation of s. 15 of the Bombay Rent Act. It seems to us that in view of the clear language of s. 15, what is provided by that section is that there can be no valid sub-tenancy after the coming into operation of the Rent Act notwithstanding anything contained in any other law. We cannot, therefore, accept Mr. Sakhardande's contention that the defendants are entitled to rely on the sub-tenancy as a valid sub-tenancy as against the plaintiffs.

Mr. Sakhardande has then urged that the plaintiffs having been a party to ³ (1952) Civil Revision Application December 2, 1952 (Unrep.).

No. 128 of 1952, decided by Chagla C.J., on this contract of sub-tenancy between them and the defendants, which is rendered unlawful by s. 15 of the Rent Act, and having put the defendants in possession in pursuance of this contract, cannot come to the Court and seek its assistance for obtaining back possession from the defendants. Now, it seems to us that if the plaintiffs had to rely on the unlawful contract for the purposes of obtaining the relief which they have claimed in the plaint, they would certainly not have been entitled to so rely and the Court would not have assisted them. But what the plaintiffs are relying upon in the present suit is not the contract which is unlawful or contrary to the policy of the law. What they are relying upon is their title, and they are seeking, on the basis of that title, to recover possession from persons who have no right to remain in possession. It is the defendants who have to set up the contract to resist the plaintiffs' claim for possession and in that sense it will be the defendants who seek to rely on it. Mr. Sakardande, however, argues that even though the plaintiffs have not sought to rely on the unlawful transaction or contract, the defendants have brought it to the notice of the Court and even in a case where the illegal contract has not been relied on by the plaintiffs in support of their claim or for the purposes of enforcing their claim, if the illegality is pointed out to the Court even by the other side, the Court will refuse to help the plaintiffs. In this connection, he has invited our attention to the observations in the case of Guddappa Chikkappa v. Balaji Ramji.⁴ It was held in that case that a Court will not allow itself to be used as an instrument of fraud, and by the application of rules of evidence or procedure it will not allow its eyes to be closed to the fact that it is being used as an instrument of fraud. Once the Court finds that the plaintiff is seeking its assistance to enable him to get the benefit of what is a fraud, it refuses to assist him. Beaumont C.J. observed (p. 691):—

"...I think the true rule is stated by Sir Grimwood Mears in Vilayat Husain v. Misran where he says (p. 396):—

"In all cases where a plaintiff is relying upon a deed, the defendant is entitled as of course to give evidence of the circumstances under which the document came into existence. When those circumstances embrace and include an allegation of a joint fraud by both plaintiff and defendant, the particulars of that fraud must be pleaded; and it is then the duty of the court to look into the matter, and if the court comes to the conclusion that the parties were acting together with a view to perpetrate a fraud, and did in fact perpetrate that fraud, and that there is no difference in the degree of guilt of the plaintiff (who is asking the Court to give him some help) and that of the defendant, the duty of the Court is not to assist either party; in other words, the duty of the Court is to dismiss the claim, because the court having then in its knowledge that it has before it two persons equally guilty of fraud will not assist either of them."

The case with which their Lordships were dealing was a case where the defendants had executed in favour of the plaintiff a sale-deed without consideration, and it was a part of a fraudulent attempt on the part of the defendants to defeat their creditors. The possession, however, still remained with the defendants and the plaintiff sued on the basis of the sale-deed in his favour to obtain possession from the defendants. The defendants resisted the suit, pointed out the circumstances under which the sale-deed came to be executed, and the circumstances as contended by the defendants having been found to be established, the Court held that the Court would not assist the plaintiff to recover possession of the property on the basis of his title because it would mean assisting him to obtain the benefit of what is fraud. Now, in the present case, the title on which plaintiffs seek to recover possession is not in any way connected with any illegality or fraud. The observations, therefore, in the case referred to by Mr. Sakhardande will not be applicable to the present case. A contention similar to this was also raised before this Court in Narayanrao Krishna Ghate v. Purushottam Kalidas, which has been already referred to, and it was observed:

• "If it is necessary for a party to prove a contract which is prohibited by law in order to obtain any relief from the Court, the Court will not permit such a contract to be proved."

It was observed that if in order to succeed, the tenant had to prove the contract of sub-tenancy, then he would not have been able to prove the same. It was also argued in that case that the defendant having brought the illegal contract to the notice of the Court, the Court had to go into the question. It was observed:

"It is true that if the attention of the Court is drawn to an illegal contract, the Court will not permit either party to prove it if it is necessary to go into that contract in order to enable the plaintiff to obtain any relief from the Court."

But where a plaintiff has not to rely on the illegal contract at all in order to succeed, the principle of pari delicto will have no application.

In another recent case reported in *Jivanjirao Scindia v. Muzammil*⁶ this argument has been again considered and negatived. After considering the position in law and the arguments advanced, Mr. Justice S. T. Desai observed (p. 1014):

"But no authority seems necessary for the proposition that the owner of any property can on general principle invoke the aid of the Court for the recovery of the same from another not in lawful possession of it so long as he is able to rest his cause of action on his own title and is not compelled to rely as part of his cause of action on any contract or transaction which is illegal or immoral or otherwise opposed to the doctrine of public policy. It is in cases of the latter categories that the Court acts on the principle underlying the maxim Ex turpi causa non oritur actio and refuses to lend its aid to support obligations or rights said to have arisen between the parties to such dealings. This is because no right of action can spring from them. But title and right to possession of property when relied upon in a case cannot be said to spring from any dealing with the property in permissible or impermissible exercise of that title or right; it is apart, and disturbance or denial of it gives rise to a cause of action independent of and unaffected by those dealings."

In that case, a plaintiff, who was a tenant of a flat, had created a sub-tenancy in favour of the defendant and put him in possession of the flat, and had thereafter filed a suit against the defendant alleging that the defendant was a trespasser. It was held that the suit was perfectly maintainable and the plaintiff was entitled to get back the possession of the flat from the defendant.

Mr. Sakhardande has urged that at any rate during the period of the sub-tenancy the plaintiffs should have been held disentitled to seek possession of the premises sub-let, and in support of this submission he has invited our attention to the following passage from Halsbury's Laws of England, third edn., Vol. 23, page 434, para. 1030.

"Where a lease has been granted but is unenforceable because it was made for an unlawful purpose, the tenant cannot be obliged to pay rent or perform his covenants but is entitled to remain in occupation until the expiry of the term granted by the lease unless the landlord can prove that the grant of the lease was induced by fraudulent misrepresentation on the part of the tenant. It seems, however, that the landlord might obtain an order for possession under the proviso for re-entry if the tenant committed a breach of covenant or if the tenant had successfully resisted an action for rent on the ground that the lease was void."

Mr. Sakhardande wants to rely on this passage for his submission that the landlord during the period of the lease will not be entitled to ask for eviction of a tenant. In the first place, the contention which Mr. Sakhardande wants to raise has not been raised in the Court below. What was urged in the Court below was that there was a lawful sub-tenancy and it was on the basis of the lawful sub-tenancy that the defendants were in possession. Secondly, whether the passage which Mr. Sakhardande has cited to us relates to a case like the one before us, where the cause of action of the suit of the plaintiff is based on his title unconnected with any contract, lawful or unlawful, is not clear. There is no doubt that even if for the purposes of obtaining the relief which the plaintiffs are claiming they have still to rely on the illegal contract, they would certainly not be entitled to so rely and obtain relief. But where the plaintiffs' cause of action and the plaintiffs' claim spring from their right unconnected with any illegality, we do not see why they should not be able to enforce the same.

Mr. Sakhardande has also invited our attention to the foot-note (d) at page 347 of Principles of the Law of Contracts by Salmond, 2nd ed., which states:

"As to whether one who has illegally leased or hired property for a term can recover it back before the end of the term see (and the cases are mentioned). These authorities all support a right of recovery in the owner of the property. Such a right, however, seems contrary to principle. The lessor, pledgor or lienor seeking to recover inconsistently with the terms of the lease, pledge or lien can do so only by setting up the illegality of the transaction. It is not solely upon his ownership that he relies, but upon his ownership coupled with the illegality of the contract which ex facie limits it. That is, an essential element in his claim arises ex turpi causa."

It seems to us that the view expressed by the learned author appears to support Mr. Sakhardande's contention. It appears, however, that it applies to a case where the plaintiff's right, which is sought to be enforced in the suit, is not based solely on his ownership but on his ownership coupled with the illegality of the contract. In the present case, as we have seen, there is no such combination and the plaintiffs' claim is solely based on their title unconnected with any illegality. We do not propose to examine the contention raised by Mr. Sakhardande in greater detail, because even if we were to accept as correct in law his contention that in the case of an illegal transaction, if possession is delivered as for a term, at least during the continuance of the term the owner will not be entitled to rely on his title and seek to obtain back possession of the property, it seems to us that in the present case, that duration had clearly expired. We have on record an intimation given by the plaintiffs to the defendants (exh. A-3) inviting their attention to the illegal nature of the transaction and further pointing out to them that in view of the illegal transaction they acquired no right, their right to remain in possession had come to an end and they were required to vacate by the end of the month next after the expiry of the month when the intimation was given. The intimation was given on January 30, 1956, and the time by which the defendants were asked to vacate expired by the end of February 1956. The suit was filed on March 28, 1956, and consequently at the time when the suit was filed the duration of the illegal tenancy had come to an end.

In view of the reasons which we have discussed above and in view of the two decisions of this Court to which we have referred, we cannot accept Mr. Sakhardande's contention that the plaintiffs are disentitled from obtaining the assistance of the Court to recover possession of the suit premises on the principle of pari delicto.

Mr. Sakhardande has then urged that the lower Court ought to have dealt with the question as to whether the defendants were licensees of the plaintiffs and whether they had committed any breach of the terms of the agreement of licence and whether the licence had been validly terminated. Now, it is true that the plaintiffs alleged in the alternative that the letter of December 1, 1955, which had not the effect of creating a sub-tenancy, could at best be treated as creating a licence in favour of the defendants, and that the licence had been revoked by the plaintiffs. Defendants, however, contended that they were not licensees but were lawful sub-tenants and that the alleged licence by the plaintiffs was not revoked or terminated. It seems to us that there could not be a relationship of licensor and licensee in the present case. The document in terms purported to create a sub-tenancy, and if the sub-tenancy could not be validly created in law, then it would not have the effect of granting a licence to the defendant. It is true that possession was taken by the defendants in pursuance of the agreement of December 1, 1955, and, therefore, the possession could not be said to have been taken against the will or in spite of the plaintiffs. However, the possession which the defendants obtained was referable to an interest in property which the parties purported to create by the transaction of December 1, 1955. If the transaction failed, the possession which the defendants took was not in pursuance of any legal transaction and would, therefore, be possession which would be wrongful or that of a trespasser. In a licence, as defined in s. 52 of the Easements Act, what is granted is only a right to do, or continue to do, in or upon the immoveable property of the grantor, something which would, in the absence of such right, be unlawful and such right does not amount to an easement or an interest in the property. In granting a licence, therefore, no interest in property is contemplated to be created in favour of the grantee and the right to use which is given is with a consciousness that all interest in the property remains in the grantor and the grantee has only a personal right to use the property. If possession is given in pursuance of a transaction which is intended to convey interest in the property as, for example, by creating sub-tenancy, such possession cannot be said to have been given by way of licence. It is referable to the interest in property sought to be created, and if no interest is created because the transaction is illegal, the possession is without any right and, therefore, wrongful and that of a trespasser. In this view of the matter, the question as to whether the defendants were licensees need not be considered and consequently also the further question as to whether the licence was revoked.

The result, therefore, is that all the contentions which Mr. Sakhardande has urged before us in this appeal fail and the appeal is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

THE MUNICIPAL CORPORATION OF GRATER BOMBAY

v.

Indian Railways Act (IX of 1890), Sec. 135(1) & (2)—Railways (Local Authorities' Taxation) Act (XXV of 1941), Sec. 3(1) & (2)—Officer appointed to determine quantum of liability of Railway Administration to pay tax levied by local authority—Whether officer has jurisdiction to determine question as to existence of such liability—Plaint—Averment in plaint that Court has jurisdiction over subject-matter of claim made therein—Absence of such averment, effect of.

Section 135(2) of the Indian Railways Act, 1890, empowers the Central Government to appoint an officer only for the limited purpose of determining the quantum of the liability of the Railway Administration to pay the tax leviable by the local authority and not for determining the question of the liability of such Administration to pay a tax at all. It is, therefore, not competent to such an officer to consider, in a proceeding before him under s. 135(2) of the Act, the very factum of the liability of the Railway Administration to pay the tax of which the amount, if any, is required to be determined by it. The officer may, however, construe the notification issued under s. 135(1) of the Act or enquire into the existence of the notification. If he hold that there is no notification, he must straightaway proceed to dismiss the application made under s. 135(2) of the Act.

In every plaint the plaintiff has to aver that the Court in which it is filed has jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the claim made therein. In the absence of such an averment, the Court must reject it, unless the Court is satisfied from the other averments in the plaint that it has, prima facie, jurisdiction to entertain the plaint and that the plaintiff's omission to make the averment as to jurisdiction is a mere clerical or accidental error. But where a plaintiff lodges his claim and denies the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain it, the Court must throw it out forthwith. The position is not different where an initial averment as to the Court's jurisdiction is withdrawn by the plaintiff, either expressly or by necessary implication, later on.

The facts appear in the judgment.

S. Baptista, with N. B. Vakil, for respondent No. 3.

MUDHOLKAR J. This is a petition under art. 226 of the Constitution. The petitioner, the Municipal Corporation of Greater Bombay, have approached this Court for quashing an order of Mr. A. S. Sarela, District Judge, Thana, passed in an application made to him by respondent No. 2 under s. 135(2) of the Indian Railways Act, 1890, and s. 3(2) of the Railways (Local Authorities Taxation) Act, 1941. In that application the Western Railway Administration (hereafter referred to as Railway Administration) wanted the determination, if any, of a lump sum payable to the petitioner by way of taxes.

Certain facts must be stated. The Railway Administration owns some buildings situate at Malad, which is now within the limits of Greater Bombay. In the year 1908 the local area of Malad was made a notified area under the provisions of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, and a committee known as Malad Notified Area Committee was constituted in respect of it. This committee, inter alia, possessed a power of assessment and recovery of taxes within the area. In the year 1950 the Government of Bombay made ss. 4 and 7 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, applicable to the local area of Malad, and directed that from April 1, 1951, a permanent municipal district shall be formed for the local area of Malad. By the Bombay Municipal [Further Extension of Limits and Schedule BBA (Amendment)] Act, 1956, (Bombay Act LVIII of 1956), the Malad Municipality was abolished and the local area which, prior to the coming into force of the said Act, was under the jurisdiction of the Malad Municipality, became subject to the authority of the Municipal Corporation of Greater Bombay. As a result of this notification, the buildings owned by the Railway Administration and situate at Malad are now within the limits of the Municipal Corporation of Greater Bombay.

We may mention here that a portion of the Railways which are now under the management of the Western Railway Administration were formerly owned by the B. B. & C. I. Railway. The assets of this company were taken over by the Government of India before the year 1951 and thereafter they vested in the B. B. & C. I. Railway Administration. These assets along with those of some other railway systems were amalgamated on November 6, 1951, and constituted into a single unit called the Western Railway Administration.

Under s. 135(1) of the Indian Railways Act, a railway administration shall not be liable to pay any tax in aid of the funds of any local authority, unless the Central Government declares by a notification the railway administration to be liable to pay the tax. In exercise of the powers conferred by this subsection, the Government of India issued a notification on August 23, 1911, of which the relevant part is as follows:—

"In pursuance of section 135 of the Indian Railways Act, 1890 (IX of 1890) and in supersession of all previous notifications on the subject the Governor General in Council is pleased to declare that the administration of Bombay Baroda & Central India (including Rajputana and Malwa) Railway shall be liable to pay in aid of the funds of the local authorities set out in the schedule hereto annexed, the taxes specified against each in the second column thereof."

Thereafter follows the schedule. In pursuance of this notification, the Malad Notified Area Committee, and thereafter the Malad Municipal Committee, recovered house and property tax from the B. B. & C. I. Railway Company, B. B. & C. I. Railway Administration and the Western Railway Administration till the year 1952-53 in respect of the buildings owned by it in Malad. For the year 1953-54 the Malad Municipality increased the rateable value of the buildings belonging to the Railway Administration and called upon it to pay the house and property tax on the footing of the revised rateable value. It may be mentioned that till the year 1952-53 the Malad Municipality, and before it, the Notified Area Committee, recovered taxes from the Railway Administration only with respect to buildings constructed prior to April 1, 1937. The Railway Administration was not willing to pay these taxes.

It may be mentioned here that in the year 1941 a new law was passed by the Central Legislature dealing with the question of liability of railways to taxation by the local authorities. That law is the Railways (Local Authorities Taxation) Act, 1941. The provisions of s. 3(2) thereof are as follows:—

“While a notification under sub-section (1) is in force, the railway administration shall be liable to pay to the local authority either the tax mentioned in the notification or in lieu thereof such sum, if any, as a person appointed in this behalf by the Central Government may, having regard to the services rendered to the railway and all the relevant circumstances of the case, from time to time determine to be fair and reasonable. The person so appointed shall be a person who is or has been a Judge of a High Court or a District Judge.”

By its application dated March 23, 1956, the Western Railway Administration invoked the jurisdiction of the District Judge, Thana, as the authority constituted under s. 3(2) of the said Act, for determining “such sum, if any” payable by it as tax to the Bombay Municipal Corporation. This application was inquired into by the District Judge, Thana, as the particular area from which this dispute arises is within the limits of the District of Thana. The learned District Judge, after considering the statements filed both by the Railway Administration and the Corporation, came to the conclusion that the properties of the Railway Administration in Malad are not liable to pay any tax whatsoever to the Corporation, because no notification had been issued by the Central Government under sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Railways (Local Authorities Taxation) Act, 1941. Certain other questions which were raised on behalf of the Railway Administration were also answered by him; but we need not refer to them, because as we will show presently the application of the Railway Administration to the District Judge, Thana, was not at all maintainable.

In the first place, we would like to point out that an application under sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Act, Railways (Local Authorities Taxation) Act, 1941, can only be made by a Railway Administration with respect to which a notification has been made by the Government under sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Act. It is common ground that no notification whatsoever has been made by the Central Government under the aforesaid provision, whether in respect to the Western Railway Administration, or with respect to its predecessors, the B. B. & C. I. Railway Co. and the B. B. & C. I. Railway Administration. Indeed, that is the finding of the Authority itself.

There is, however, another provision, under which an application for determination of the tax could be made by a Railway Administration. That provision is s. 135(2) of the Indian Railways Act. The provisions of that sub-section are as follows:—

“While a notification of the Central Government under clause (1) of this section is in force, the railway administration shall be liable to pay to the local authority either the tax mentioned in the notification or, in lieu thereof, such sum, if any, as an officer appointed in this behalf by the Central Government may, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, from time to time determine to be fair and reasonable.”

These provisions are substantially the same as those of sub-s. (2) of s. 3. No doubt, the Railway Administration has stated in its application to the District Judge that it was invoking its jurisdiction under sub-s. (2) of s. 3; but in para. 9 of its application it has made a reference to the provisions of s. 135(2) of the Indian Railways Act. We are, therefore, prepared to treat the application of the Railway Administration as one under both the provisions, that is, of s. 3(2) of the Railways (Local Authorities Taxation) Act, 1941, and s. 135(2) of the Indian Railways Act, 1890.

Now, in order to attract the provisions of sub-s. (2) of s. 135, not only must there be a notification of the Central Government under sub-s. (1) of s. 135, but there must be a liability upon the Railway Administration to pay a tax by virtue of the notification. In other words, it is only where the Railway Administration is made prima facie liable to pay a tax to a local authority that it can approach the appropriate authority for determining the quantum of such liability. We may mention that though in the original application made by the Railway Administration its liability to pay the tax by virtue of the notification issued under s. 135(1) was not disputed, in the written statement filed on its behalf subsequently that liability was questioned. It was for this reason that the learned District Judge thought it necessary to decide the question as to whether there was any liability on the Railway Administration to pay the tax at all.

There is, however, a material aspect of this matter which has been overlooked by the learned District Judge. That is the effect of the stand taken by the Railway Administration in para. 1 of its written statement on the submissions made by it in para. 10 of its application. In the latter paragraph it seems to proceed on the assumption that the notification of the year 1911 entitles the District Judge to determine 'such sum, if any,' as may be found payable by it and has elected to do so, if the District Judge finds that it would be fair and reasonable to order it to pay a particular sum. But in para. 1, this is what it says:

"The applicant respectfully submits that in view of the fact that there does not exist any notification of the Government of India either under the provisions of sec. 135(1) Indian Railways Act, 1890, or under sec. 3(1) of the Railways (Local Authorities Taxation) Act, 1941, declaring the liability of THE WESTERN RAILWAY ADMINISTRATION to the payment of any tax to the Malad District Municipality, the applicant administration is not liable in law to pay any tax whatever to the opponent municipality in the absence of any such notification. The applicant says that the only notification which was issued by the Government of India under sec. 135(1) of the Indian Railways Act, 1890, was dated August 24, 1941, and related to the former B.B. & C.I. Railway Administration. The liability which was declared by the said notification of the said B.B. & C.I. Railway Administration to the Malad (Notified Area) Committee was in respect of house and property tax. The said B.B. & C.I. Railway Administration as such ceased to exist with effect from November 6, 1951, on which date the said B.B. & C.I. Railway Administration along with the Administrations of the Saurashtra Railway, Jaipur State Railway, Rajasthan Railway and the Section Marwar Junction to Phulad forming part of the ex-Jodhpur Railway Administration, were integrated into one Unit known as the Western Railway Administration. The applicant, therefore, submits that the Western Railway is not just a change of name for the former B.B. & C.I. Railway Administration but is altogether a distinct, separate and independent unit formed out of the merger of the five different Railway Administrations. In the circumstances and as there does not exist any notification of the Government of India declaring the liability of the Western Railway Administration to pay any tax in aid of the funds of the opponent municipality, the applicant is not liable to pay any tax to the opponent municipality in respect of any of its properties situated within the limits of the opponent municipality."

No doubt, it has raised certain contentions on the merits also, but they being "without prejudice" to the main contention, cannot survive if the District Judge has no jurisdiction to entertain the application. By raising the contention as to the absence of notification the Railway Administration must be deemed to have amended its original application.

Now, where a person seeks from a tribunal an adjudication of a dispute, he must allege and, where disputed, prove that the tribunal has jurisdiction to entertain the proceeding in which the dispute is raised. Thus, in every plaint the plaintiff has to aver that the Court in which it is filed has jurisdiction over the subject matter of the claim made therein. In the absence of such an averment, the Court must reject it, unless the Court is satisfied from the other averments in the plaint that it has, prima facie, jurisdiction to entertain the plaint and that the plaintiff's omission to make the averment as to jurisdiction is a mere clerical or accidental error. But where a plaintiff lodges his claim and denies the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain it, the Court must throw it out forthwith. The position is not different where an initial averment as to the Court's jurisdiction is withdrawn by the plaintiff, either expressly or by necessary implication, later on.

In our opinion, the quotation from para. 1 of the Railway Administration's written statement displaces the contrary submissions in its application, with the result that the Railway Administration must be held to deny the very jurisdiction of the learned District Judge to deal with the claims. In the face of this denial, there is nothing that the learned District Judge could have done but to dismiss the Railway Administration's application.

It is clear that sub-s. (2) of s. 135 empowers the Central Government to appoint an officer only for the limited purpose of determining the quantum of the liability of the Railway Administration to pay the tax leviable by the local authority and not for determining the question of the liability of such Administration to pay a tax at all. If we look to the language of sub-s. (2) of s. 135, it is clear that the existence of liability on the Railway Administration to pay a tax to the local authority is a condition precedent to the exercise of the jurisdiction to determine the quantum of liability under s. 135(2) of the Act. In other words, only a Railway Administration which accepts the position that it is liable to pay a tax that is entitled to approach the appropriate authority under sub-s. (2) of s. 135. It is, therefore, not competent to such authority to consider, in a proceeding before him under this provision, the very factum of the liability of the Railway Administration to pay the tax of which the amount, if any, is required to be determined by it.

Mr. Baptista, who appears for the Railway Administration, has strenuously urged that the words 'such sum, if any' which occur in sub-s. (2) of s. 135 clearly indicate that the authority appointed thereunder has jurisdiction to consider the question of the liability of the Railway Administration to pay tax. The opening words of sub-s. (2) of s. 135 are "while a notification of the Central Government under clause (1) of this section is in force". Now, once a notification is issued under the aforesaid provision, it would follow that the exemption of a Railway Administration from liability to pay a tax conferred by the opening words of sub-s. (1) of s. 135 is taken away or modified by that notification. That is a settled and indisputable fact and cannot be questioned before or by the authority approached under s. 135(2). The authority can construe the notification or enquire into the existence of the notification. If it holds that there is no notification, it must straightaway proceed to dismiss the application. It has no power to go into the question of the liability of the Railway Administration to pay a tax at all. Where it chooses to entertain the application, it must function only with respect to a matter which is covered by the notification. In other words, the position is that the District Judge can exercise his functions only in respect to a Railway Administration which is not wholly exempted from paying a tax. The function entrusted to him is a limited one, viz. the determination of the sum, if any, which is payable by a Railway Administration to a local authority by way of taxes. No other function is entrusted to him. The question as to the existence of liability is wholly beyond his jurisdiction to determine. There are also other words in sub-s. (2) of s. 135 which lead to the same effect. The concluding portion of the subsection to the effect that the officer indicated therein has to determine such sum as appears to him, 'fair and reasonable' are pertinent. Now, it may be that he may think that in the circumstances of a particular case it would not be fair and reasonable to order that anything should be paid to a local authority. For covering such a case it was necessary to insert the words 'if any' in these provisions. We, therefore, do not think that the use of these words in this provision entitles the District Judge to determine the question as to the liability of the Railway Administration to pay a tax to a local authority by virtue of the notification of the Government under sub-s. (1) of s. 135.

Since that is our view, it would follow that the application of the Railway Administration to the authority was wholly misconceived. It was not obligatory upon the Railway Administration to approach the authority at all in this matter. Indeed, if they dispute the very fact of the liability, then the proper course for it is to go to the ordinary civil Court for redress and not to the authority appointed under the Railways Act. Since in our opinion the learned District Judge had no jurisdiction to entertain the application, it follows that his findings on the various questions raised by the Railway Administration are inefficacious.

Accordingly, we make the rule absolute in terms of the prayer and dismiss the application of the Railway Administration made to the District Judge, Thana. As the point concerning his jurisdiction was not taken by the petitioner before the District Judge, we make no order as to costs.

Rule made absolute.

STATE OF BOMBAY v. MATHURADAS BULAKIDAS MOHOTA.*

Diverted Lands Revision of Assessment Rules, 1952, Rule 1(2)—Central Provinces Land Revenue Act (II of 1917), Secs. 104-A, 106,† Chap. VI—Central Provinces Settlement Act (VI of 1929), Sec. 2—Central Provinces Tenancy Act (I of 1920), Sec. 36-A—Petitioner declared Malik-makbuza in respect of his holding not assessed at settlement under Chap. VI of C. P. Land Revenue Act and land-revenue fixed under s. 36-A of C. P. Tenancy Act—Proceedings under s. 104-A of C. P. Land Revenue Act started against petitioner for revision of assessment under Assessment Rules of 1952—Applicability of Rules to Malik-makbuza holding of petitioner.

The words "settlement" and "at settlement" occurring in r. 1(2) of the Diverted Lands Revision of Assessment Rules, 1952, mean the settlement under Chapter VI of the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act, 1917.

The petitioner who was the holder of a land as an occupancy tenant, on which no assessment was levied at the settlement under Chapter VI of the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act, 1917, was declared to be a Malik-makbuza in regard to his holding, and under s. 36A of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act a certain amount was fixed as land-revenue payable for the holding. Thereafter, proceedings under s. 104A of the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act were started against the petitioner for revision of the assessment levied on the land, on the ground that he had *Decided, February 26, 1959. Letters Patent Appeal No. 93 of 1958, against the order passed by Mudholkar J., in Miscellaneous Petition No. 235 of 1955.

†The relevant sections are as under:—

S. 104-A. If in the opinion of the Deputy Commissioner the value of any land in any mahal is altered in consequence of its diversion from an agricultural purpose to a non-agricultural purpose or from a non-agricultural purpose to an agricultural purpose since it was last assessed, the assessment shall be liable to be revised and the land-revenue assessed by the Deputy Commissioner with reference to the altered value of such land in accordance with rules made under section 108.

S. 108 (1) The Deputy Commissioner may, during the currency of a settlement,

(a) assess land-revenue on or in respect of lands which are liable to assessment, but have not been assessed, including plots of land the owners of which have been declared malik-makbuza.

(2) The State Government may, in supercession or modification of the provisions of Chapter VI, make rules for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this section.

diverted his holding to non-agricultural purposes. The assessment was accordingly revised under the Diverted Lands Revision of Assessment Rules, 1952. On the question whether the Rules applied to the Malik-makbuza holding:—

Held, that although land-revenue came to be fixed by the revenue officer during the currency of the settlement under Chapter VI of the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act, the Malik-makbuza holding could not be regarded as having been assessed at settlement within r. 1(2) of the Assessment Rules, and that, therefore, the Rules did not apply to such holding and the revision of assessment in accordance with the Rules was illegal.

On August 16, 1941, one Mathuradas (petitioner) purchased 10.50 acres of land out of occupancy field No. 73/2 of mouza Chahalangadi, tahsil Hinganghat, and about two years later acquired malik makbuza rights therein. The land revenue assessed thereon was Rs. 14-8-0. After the purchase of the field, the petitioner planted fruit and ornamental trees therein and also a grove of flower garden in a portion of the field. He constructed a house, servant quarters, a reservoir, a tank and an engine room. 6.09 acres of land was covered by fruit trees and manure pits, 0.12 acres by the flower garden, 0.97 acres by houses for agricultural servants, a guest house, a tank and an engine room and 3.25 acres by fruit trees. On November 25, 1951, the patwari reported to the revenue authorities that the land was diverted to non-agricultural purposes. Acting on the report of the patwari, the assessment on the field was revised under the Diverted Lands Revision of Assessment Rules, 1952, and raised to Rs. 105 per annum. The petitioner appealed to the Deputy Commissioner against the revised assessment, but his appeal was dismissed. He preferred a second appeal before the Board of Revenue which was also dismissed. He then applied to the Nagpur High Court under art. 226 of the Constitution. The application was heard by Mudholkar J. who held that the order of assessment as revised was without jurisdiction and set aside the order, observing in his judgment as follows:

MUDHOLKAR J. Four points were urged on behalf of the petitioner before me. The first point was that the land has not been diverted by him to non-agricultural purposes, and in support of this contention he placed reliance upon the definitions of "agriculture" and "improvements" contained in the C. P. Tenancy Act, 1920. According to him, though this Act was passed subsequent to the Land Revenue Act, the definitions given therein should guide the Court in interpreting the provisions of the Land Revenue Act. The second point taken was that the rules under which the provision has been made do not apply to the field in question inasmuch as it was not Malik Makbuza land at the time of the last settlement. The third point was that r. 3 of the rules framed under s. 106(2) of the C.P. Land Revenue Act with s. 104-A is ultra vires to the extent to which it conflicts with the provisions of s. 104-A. Finally it was said that there was no legal basis for assessing the land at 2 annas per square foot.

It is not necessary for me to deal with all these contentions except the second. Sub-rule (2) of r. 1 is in the following terms:

"They shall apply in respect of the revision of assessment undertaken during the currency of settlement in respect of Malik-makbuza lands assessed at settlement as agricultural lands and diverted to a non-agricultural purpose during its currency."

It seems to me clear that the intention was to apply those rules for assessment of lands which were held in Malik Makbuza rights at the previous settlement, and were assessed as agricultural lands. The contention of Shri Adhikari is that these rules applied to all lands which are at this date Malik Makbuza lands provided they were assessed at the last settlement as agricultural lands. To my mind, that construction is not warranted by the language used. In the circumstances, I hold that the assessment made was without jurisdiction and quash it.

In passing I may add that the first contention of the petitioner derives support from the decision of the Division Bench in Gopalrao v. Anandi,¹ where the learned Judges have accepted the definition of "agricultural" contained in the C.P. Tenancy Act for the purpose of interpreting the same word in the Berar Land Revenue Code.

THE State of Bombay appealed under the Letters Patent.

N. L. Abhyankar, Special Government Pleader, for the appellant-State.

M. N. Phadke, for respondent No. 1.

DATAR J. This is an appeal under the Letters Patent preferred on behalf of the State of Bombay against the petitioner who had filed an application under art. 226 of the Constitution in this Court. The learned Judge before whom the application came up for hearing allowed the application and held that the order of assessment as revised by the revenue authorities was without jurisdiction and, therefore, could not be sustained.

The facts that led to this appeal are these. One Rama Kunbi and his son were the occupancy tenants of field No. 73 which originally admeasured 36.84 acres. On August 16, 1941, the present petitioner purchased from them an area of 10.50 acres out of field No. 73, and the area purchased by him came to be numbered as 73/2. There was then no assessment levied either upon the entire field No. 73 or upon the strip No. 73/2 purchased by the petitioner.

On March 5, 1943, the petitioner who was thus the holder of the occupancy tenancy land, made an application praying that he may be declared to be a malik-makbuza in respect of his holding. The Deputy Commissioner, before whom the application came up for hearing, declared the petitioner to be a malik-makbuza in regard to his holding, and under the provisions of s. 36-A of the C.P. Tenancy Act and the rules made thereunder fixed the land-revenue at Rs. 14-8-0 payable for the petitioner's holding.

In December 1951, proceedings were started for the revision of the assessment levied on the land on the ground that the petitioner had diverted his holding to non-agricultural purposes. These proceedings appear to have been started under the provisions of s. 104-A of the C.P. Land Revenue Act, 1917. The assessment was revised and the land-revenue was assessed at Rs. 105 under the Diverted Lands Revision of Assessment Rules, 1952 (hereinafter referred to as the Assessment Rules). The petitioner thereafter appealed to the Deputy Commissioner and then to the Board of Revenue, but his appeals failed. Finally, as stated above, he approached this Court with an application under art. 226 of the Constitution for setting aside the order of revised assessment as passed by the revenue authorities.

The application came before Mr. Justice Mudholkar who held that the order of assessment as revised by the revenue authorities was without jurisdiction and accordingly he set aside the order passed in that behalf. The State has now come before us in appeal under the Letters Patent.

Under s. 104-A of the C. P. Land Revenue Act, if any land is appropriated to a non-agricultural purpose since it was last assessed, the assessment is liable to be revised and the land-revenue assessed by the Deputy Commissioner with reference to the altered value of such land in accordance with the rules made under s. 106 of the Act. It is the case of the State that in the present case the assessment came to be revised and the land-revenue assessed in accordance with the Assessment Rules. The question, therefore, is whether these rules apply to the malik-makbuza holding in respect of which the land-revenue was fixed by the revenue officers under the provisions of s. 36-A of the C. P. Tenancy Act. It may be noted that the argument that was advanced before Mr. Justice Mudholkar was different from what has been submitted before us by the Special Government Pleader. Before Mr. Justice Mudholkar, it does not seem to have been disputed that the settlement referred to in the rules meant only the general settlement which was in the present case made some time in the year 1910 or 1911 under Chapter VI of the C. P. Land Revenue Act and it was not argued that it would also refer to any settlement which may have been arrived at, in respect of any individual holding as in the present case. The argument is that if after the general settlement of the year 1910 there has been an occasion—and indeed there had been an occasion in the present case—for fixing the land-revenue in respect of a land which is liable to be assessed to land-revenue, the fixation of such land-revenue must mean, under the circumstances, settlement for the purpose of the rules under which a revision of assessment will have to be made. Now, the Special Government Pleader referred us to cl. (a) of sub-s. (1) of s. 106 of the C. P. Land Revenue Act. That section says that the Deputy Commissioner may, during the currency of a settlement, assess land-revenue on or in respect of lands which are liable to assessment, but have not been assessed, including plots of land the owners of which have been declared malik-makbuzas. It is true that s. 106 gives power to the Deputy Commissioner to assess land-revenue in respect of lands which are liable to assessment and which have not been assessed so far; and if we regard a malik-makbuza holding as a plot of land liable to assessment and as a land which has not been assessed till 1943, then what was done by the revenue officer in the year 1943 may be regarded as having been done in the exercise of the power under cl. (a) of sub-s. (1) of s. 106. But can such fixation of land-revenue be termed as an assessment of the malik-makbuza holding at settlement? It is true that such assessment was levied during the currency of the settlement under Chapter VI of the C. P. Land Revenue Act. Although the assessment came to be levied, or to use the words of s. 36-A of the C. P. Tenancy Act the land-revenue came to be fixed by the revenue officer, during the currency of the settlement, still the malik-makbuza holding could not be regarded as having been assessed at settlement. Sub-rule (2) of r. 1 of the Assessment Rules says:

"They (rules) shall apply in respect of the revision of assessment undertaken during the currency of settlement in respect of Malik-makbuza lands assessed at settlement as agricultural lands and diverted to a non-agricultural purpose during its currency." The Special Government Pleader says that the word "settlement" in sub-r. (2) cannot be given any special meaning so as to refer only to the settlement under Chapter VI of the C. P. Land Revenue Act at which malik-makbuza lands were assessed as agricultural lands in 1910 or 1911. According to his submission, the word "settlement" is used in its ordinary, literal sense and whenever there is a fixation of land-revenue that fixation of land-revenue must be taken to mean settlement. If there was no definition of the term "settlement" probably there was some force in the contention made on behalf of the State. There is a definition of the term "settlement", which appears to be an exhaustive definition, in the C. P. Settlement Act, 1929. Section 2 of the said Act defines the term "settlement" as follows:

"A 'settlement' means the results of the series of operations in a local area regulated by this Act and Chapter VI of the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act, 1917; and the period during which such results are to be in force is called the 'term of the settlement'."

If this definition refers to the settlement as is made under Chapter VI of the C. P. Land Revenue Act, then we are of the view that the same meaning should be given to the words "settlement" and "at settlement" which are mentioned in the rule which we are now considering. The Special Government Pleader contended that sub-r. (3) of r. 1 stated that nothing contained in Chapter VI of the C. P. Land Revenue Act shall apply in respect of the revision of assessment on lands to which these rules apply. He also referred us to sub-s. (2) of s. 106 of the C. P. Land Revenue Act which says that the State Government may, in supersession or modification of the provisions of Chapter VI, make rules for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this section. Even though Chapter VI of the Land Revenue Act is not to apply in respect of revision of assessment on lands to which the Assessment Rules apply, still it does not mean that the term "settlement" as used in that Chapter and as defined in the C. P. Settlement Act cannot be considered in construing sub-r. (2) of r. 1 of the Assessment Rules. It is true that the Government has been given the power under sub-s. (2) of s. 106 to frame such rules either in supersession or in modification of the provisions of Chapter VI, but in the absence of any definition of the term "settlement" either in the C. P. Land Revenue Act or in the Assessment Rules, we think recourse must be had to the definition of "settlement" as given in the C. P. Settlement Act, and the words "settlement" or "at settlement" occurring in sub-r. (2) of r. 1 of the Assessment Rules must be construed accordingly.

Further, the opening words of s. 106 of the C. P. Land Revenue Act mention the words "during the currency of settlement". The word "settlement" occurring in s. 106 under sub-s. (2) of which the Assessment Rules are framed, must also be understood as meaning settlement under Chapter VI of the C. P. Land Revenue Act, apart from the definition of "settlement" in the C. P. Settlement Act.

We, therefore, hold that the words "settlement" and "at settlement" occurring in sub-r. (2) of r. 1 of the Assessment Rules must mean the settlement under Chapter VI of the C. P. Land Revenue Act. It is not disputed that the malik-makbuza holding in the present case had not been assessed at such settlement. If so, the Assessment Rules will not apply to such holding and the revision of assessment in accordance with such rules would be illegal. We, accordingly, confirm the judgment of Mr. Justice Mudholkar though for reasons which are slightly different from those which induced him to allow the application.

Accordingly, the letters patent appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

V. M. DORLIKAR v. CHIEF EXECUTIVE OFFICER, NAGPUR CORPORATION.*

Master and Servant—Suspension from service—Authority empowered to inflict penalty of suspension whether can pass order of suspension making it operative for period when servant has actually rendered service.

The authority empowered to inflict the penalty of suspension cannot make the penalty operative for a period during which the person upon whom the penalty is imposed was either in service or in law must be deemed to have been in service. Therefore, the authority cannot pass an order of suspension as a penalty so as to make it retrospective and operate for a period in the past when the servant on whom the penalty is proposed to be imposed has already either actually rendered the service or in law must be deemed to have been in service.

*Hemanta Kumar v. S. N. Mukherjee,*¹ *Abid Mohammad v. The State*² and *U. P. Government v. Tabarakh,*³ referred to.

ONE V. M. Dorlikar (petitioner) was working as a Sanitary Inspector under the Municipal Committee of Nagpur, which was constituted as a Corporation, with effect from February 2, 1951. A departmental enquiry was held against him on certain charges and a report was submitted by the enquiring officer on December 12, 1949, holding him guilty but recommending only a warning as punishment in view of extenuating factors. However, the Officer-in-charge of the Municipal Committee took a serious view of the matter and passed an order, dated February 22, 1950, terminating his services. As the petitioner held a specified post under the C. P. and Berar Municipalities Act, the approval of the State Government was necessary to impose the penalty. The Board of Revenue, acting in exercise of the powers conferred on it by the State Government, was accordingly approached and granted the necessary approval. The order was thereafter communicated to the petitioner on April 27, 1951.

The petitioner went up to the High Court under art. 226 of the Constitution against the order and it was quashed by the High Court on the ground that under the City of Nagpur Corporation Act (II of 1950), which had come into effect on the date of the communication of the order, it was the Chief Executive Officer who alone could terminate his services. The Chief Executive Officer accordingly took up the matter and called upon the petitioner to appear in person in connection with the departmental enquiry. He also ordered that he would be treated as under suspension from the date of his relief, namely May 1, 1951. In the end he passed an order, dated November 27, 1952, dispensing with his services.

The petitioner thereon preferred two appeals to the Board of Revenue (1) against the order of suspension and (2) against the order dispensing with his services. The Board of Revenue held that in the circumstances of the case the punishment imposed on the petitioner was too severe. In this view, the learned Member of the Board passed the following order:—

"In view of these considerations, I feel that the order of the Chief Executive Officer dispensing with the services of the appellant is too drastic. I set aside the order and direct that he shall be reinstated in his post as Sanitary Inspector forthwith. The period from 1-5-1951 till the date of his reinstatement shall be treated as a period of suspension. That will be an adequate punishment for the acts of omission and commission that are proved against him in the departmental enquiry."

The petitioner applied to the Nagpur High Court under art. 226 of the Constitution for quashing the order of the Board of Revenue which had directed that the period of the petitioner's service from May 1, 1951, until the date of his reinstatement should be treated as a period of suspension. The application was heard by G. P. Bhutt J., who in the course of his judgment delivered on October 6, 1954, observed as follows:

BHUTT J. It will appear from the above that the suspension ordered by the Board of Revenue was by way of punishment which is prescribed under cl. (v), sub-s. (2), s. 53 of the City of Nagpur Corporation Act, as one of the punishments liable to be inflicted on the servants of the Corporation under the Act. Suspension is also ordered for the purpose of holding a departmental enquiry under the rules framed under s. 420 of the Act, which does not constitute punishment contemplated by s. 53. It was contended by the learned counsel for the petitioner that since he was suspended for the purpose of holding a departmental enquiry by the Chief Executive Officer, suspension could not be ordered by way of a substantive punishment by the Board of Revenue. It was also urged that the Board of Revenue could not inflict that punishment unless a show cause notice was served on the petitioner and fresh opportunity was given to him to defend himself as prescribed under the rules. It was further contended that as there was no departmental enquiry during the period May 1, 1951, until November 24, 1952, when it was taken up by the Chief Executive Officer, he could not be suspended during that period under the rules.

As regards the first contention, there is nothing in the City of Nagpur Corporation Act or the rules framed thereunder to show that the authorities entitled to punish a servant are not competent to treat the suspension ordered for the purpose of a departmental enquiry as a punishment. In fact, that would be a measure in the servant's own interest of which it would be incongruous to make a complaint. The Board of Revenue, as the appellate authority, has all the powers of punishment which the punishing officers possess under law. There is, therefore, no force in this contention.

Regarding the second contention, it does not appear that it is necessary to issue a fresh show cause notice for a lesser punishment when the servant was already given a reasonable opportunity to defend himself as against a higher punishment. No authority was cited in support of the contention that is urged, which, in my opinion, is not well founded.

Coming to the last contention, what the rules prescribe is suspension "for the purpose of holding a departmental enquiry". It cannot, therefore, be urged that the suspension must be limited only to the period during which the departmental enquiry is actually under progress. Nor is there any provision prohibiting the period of suspension to commence from a back date. There is, therefore, no force in this contention as well.

The petition accordingly fails and is dismissed with costs.

The petitioner appealed under the Letters Patent.

DATAR J. The appellant before us was originally a Sanitary Inspector under the Municipal Committee of Nagpur. A departmental enquiry was started against him, and on December 12, 1949, the Enquiry Officer submitted his report. The Enquiry Officer held that the appellant was guilty of the charges for which the enquiry had been started, but recommended that as there were extenuating circumstances, only a warning be given to the appellant by way of punishment. The Officer-in-Charge of the Municipal Committee, however, took a different view on the question of punishment to be awarded to the appellant and accordingly passed an order on February 22, 1950, terminating his services. It was necessary under the rules that this order of the Officer-in-Charge had to be approved of by the Board of Revenue. It appears that the Board of Revenue also approved of this order and the same was communicated to the appellant on April 27, 1951.

The appellant thereafter approached this Court by a special application under the provisions of art. 226 of the Constitution. On November 20, 1952, the High Court in its jurisdiction under art. 226 of the Constitution set aside the order of dismissal as it had not been passed by a proper authority under the provisions of the City of Nagpur Corporation Act, 1948.

After the High Court's order was communicated to the Chief Executive Officer, the Chief Executive Officer on or about November 24, 1952, called upon the appellant to appear before him on November 26, 1952, in connection with the departmental enquiry held against him. The Chief Executive Officer also informed him that pending final orders, he was "treated under suspension" from the date of his relief (May 1, 1951). On November 27, 1952, the Chief Executive Officer passed a final order to the effect that "the services of Shri V. N. Dorlikar (appellant), Sanitary Inspector (under suspension), City of Nagpur Corporation, are dispensed with, with effect from fore-noon of 27th of November 1952".

Two appeals were thereafter filed by the present appellant to the Board of Revenue. Appeal No. 39/XXIV-2-A of 1952 was filed against the order of suspension which, as stated above, had been passed by the Chief Executive Officer on or about November 24, 1952. Appeal No. 40/XXIV-2-A of 1952 was preferred against the final order dispensing with the services of the appellant passed by the Chief Executive Officer on November 27, 1952. These appeals were disposed of by the Board of Revenue, Madhya Pradesh, on May 11, 1954. The learned Member of the Board dismissed the first appeal on the ground that no objection could be taken in equity to the order of the Chief Executive Officer placing Dorlikar (appellant) pending inquiry, under suspension with effect from May 1, 1951. In the second appeal, however, the learned Member held that the order of the Chief Executive Officer dispensing with the services of the appellant was too drastic, and he accordingly passed the following Order:

"I set aside the order and direct that he (appellant) shall be reinstated in his post as Sanitary Inspector forthwith. The period from 1-5-51 till the date of his re-instatement shall be treated as a period of suspension. That will be an adequate punishment for the acts of omission and commission that are proved against him in the departmental enquiry. With this modification, the second appeal is also dismissed."

Although the two appeals were disposed of by two different orders though contained in the same judgment, surprisingly enough the appellant came to this Court by a special application under art. 226 of the Constitution only against the order rejecting his appeal No. 39/XXIV-2-A of 1952. In the application he stated that he was aggrieved by the order rejecting his appeal No. 39/XXIV-2-A of 1952 and that he was moving for quashing the order of suspension passed by the Chief Executive Officer and confirmed by the Board of Revenue. In the prayer clause it was mentioned that the order of suspension passed by the Chief Executive Officer, Nagpur Corporation, and the Board of Revenue be quashed by issue of a writ of certiorari or such direction as will meet the ends of justice. This application came on for hearing before Mr. Justice G. P. Bhutt on October 6, 1954. On behalf of the applicant (appellant) three contentions were raised before him. It was stated that suspension could not be regarded as a punishment when the order of suspension had been directed to take effect from May 1, 1951. Secondly, it was urged that the order of suspension as passed by the Board of Revenue could not be passed without a proper notice being given to the petitioner before such order could be passed. Finally, it was urged that the order of suspension as passed by the Chief Executive Officer on or about November 24, 1952, making it retrospective from May 1, 1951, could not be sustained. The learned Judge rejected these contentions and dismissed the application. It is against the judgment of the learned Judge dismissing the special civil application that the petitioner (appellant) has come to this Court in appeal under the Letters Patent.

Mr. Chandurkar, who appears on behalf of the appellant, has, in the first place, contended that the order of suspension passed by the Chief Executive Officer was bad inasmuch as he directed that that order should take effect from an earlier date, namely from May 1, 1951. He drew our attention to the fact that on November 20, 1952, the High Court had declared that the order of dismissal as passed by the Officer-in-Charge of the Municipal Committee was illegal. Mr. Chandurkar contended that the effect of the High Court's judgment setting aside the order of dismissal was that the appellant was in service, and when he was lawfully in service the Chief Executive Officer could not pass an order of suspension so as to affect the period during which, in view of the High Court's judgment, the appellant must be deemed to have been legally in service. It may be noted that the order of suspension was passed by the Chief Executive Officer at the stage of enquiry, which, in view of the subsequent judgment of the High Court, could not have been regarded as finally disposed of. All what the High Court did was to declare the order of dismissal as being illegal. The result of it was that the matter could still be regarded as being at the stage of enquiry, and if at that stage the Chief Executive Officer, particularly having regard to the fact that the appellant had given up his charge on May 1, 1951, purported to pass the order of suspension operating from May 1, 1951, it could be held that it was an order passed during the stage of enquiry and the rules do not prohibit the passing of such order of suspension in the course of the enquiry. Whether the order could be retrospective if it was directed to take effect from a date previous to the date on which the enquiry started does not fall for consideration in the present case because before May 1, 1951, the enquiry had already started so far back as the year 1949. However, it is not necessary for our purpose to consider the propriety or the legality of this order. The final order came to be passed by the Chief Executive Officer himself. With the passing of the final order by the Chief Executive Officer, it must be held that the order of suspension came to an end. Further, it is not this order against which the appellant could have any real grievance. It is the order which has been passed by the Board of Revenue in appeal against which the appellant could have any grievance at all. The order that was passed by the Board of Revenue by way of punishment was passed in appeal No. 40. But, as I have already stated, the appellant did not make any grievance against or challenge this order in his application filed in this Court under art. 226 of the Constitution. We do not think that Mr. Chandurkar is right when he says that it was not necessary for the appellant to challenge this order when the earlier order of suspension pending inquiry as passed by the Chief Executive Officer and confirmed by the Board of Revenue in appeal No. 39 had been duly challenged in his application. We may, however, assume that it is open to the appellant to impugn this order in the appeal and proceed to consider its propriety and legality.

Mr. Chandurkar contends that the Board of Revenue could not pass an order of suspension by way of punishment so as to make it retrospective in effect and operate from May 1, 1951. In support of his contention, Mr. Chandurkar has relied upon certain decisions of other High Courts. In *Hemanta Kumar v. S. N. Mukherjee*¹, there was an order of suspension passed during the enquiry and the question considered by their Lordships was whether the order so far as it covered the period between January 16, 1951, and April 28, 1952, was valid. The order came to be passed on April 29, 1952, and was made retrospective from January 16, 1951. In the course of the judgment, their Lordships held (p. 343):

"The antecedent period which an order of suspension with retrospective effect might be intended to cover, would ordinarily be a period during which the person concerned had already performed the duties of his office or held the relevant position. There can be no meaning in suspending a man from working during a period when the period is past and he has already worked or suspending a man from occupying a position or holding a privilege in the past when he has already occupied or held it." The same view was taken in a case reported in Abid Mohammad v. The State.² There also their Lordships were concerned with an order of suspension passed during the enquiry. Their Lordships referred to the dictionary meaning of the word 'suspension' and stated (p. 45):

"'Suspension' thus connotes temporary cessation of something as right, work or labour. This very concept of the word 'suspension' rules out a Government servant who is in service and who has in law performed the duties of his office during a certain period being placed subsequently under suspension for that period. When in law he has performed the duties then there can be no question of forbidding him from exercising the functions of his office in that period which is already past."

The same view has been expressed in U. P. Government v. Tabarakh.³ The reason underlying these decisions appears to us to be that you cannot suspend a person for a period during which he was actually in service or in law must be deemed to have been in service. If he was in service during a particular period of time, it is inconceivable and indeed impossible how he should be treated as being under suspension for that period which is already a matter of irrevocable past. It is true that in these decisions the question arose regarding the order of suspension passed during the enquiry against a servant, but we do not think how any distinction in principle can be made between an order of suspension passed during the enquiry and an order of suspension passed as a penalty, as in the present case. If the authority empowered to impose a penalty is inclined to impose the penalty of suspension, it is inconceivable how that authority can impose a penalty of suspension so as to make it retrospective in effect. We do not think that the authority empowered to inflict the penalty could make the penalty operative for a period during which the person upon whom the penalty is imposed was either in service or in law must be deemed to have been in service. In the present case, there was already an order of the High Court in 1952 which stated that the order of dismissal passed by the Officer-in-Charge of the Municipal Committee was bad and was, therefore, inoperative. Again, the Board of Revenue in appeal held that the order of the Chief Executive Officer could not be sustained because it was too drastic and, therefore, it set aside that order. Therefore, at the time when the Board of Revenue considered the propriety of inflicting the penalty of suspension the position was that till the date on which the order imposing the penalty was passed, the appellant was legally in service, and if so, we do not think how that position could be undone by any retrospective order of suspension as passed in the present case. Mr. Bobde, learned counsel for respondent No. 1, urged that the decided cases were concerned with an order of suspension passed during the enquiry. It is true that those cases related only to such an order, but considering the matter on principle, it is difficult to conceive of an order of suspension passed as a penalty so as to make it retrospective and operate for a period in the past when the servant on whom the penalty is proposed to be imposed has already either actually rendered the service or in law must be deemed to have been in service. We, therefore, are inclined to accept the submission of Mr. Chandurkar and hold that the order of suspension passed as a penalty by the Board of Revenue was not strictly legal and could not be made operative as intended by the Board. However, since the matter has come to this Court under the provisions of art. 226 of the Constitution and now before us in appeal under the Letters Patent, we have to consider whether the passing of this order has caused any prejudice or injustice to the appellant. The Board of Revenue was inclined to hold that the petitioner (appellant) was guilty of negligence though it readily found that he was not guilty of preparing false muster rolls. It was on this account that the Board of Revenue thought it proper to award a lesser punishment; and if the Board of Revenue had passed a proper order of suspension, we do not think that any objection could have been taken to such an order. Further, the Board of Revenue considered the fact that from May 1, 1951, when the petitioner gave up the charge of his duties, he was not at all in service and had not rendered any service to the Corporation. The Board of Revenue probably in consideration of the future prospects which the petitioner might have in service as the Sanitary Inspector thought it desirable to make the order of suspension retrospective so that there should not be any break in his service, once he was reinstated in his post. If we accept the contention of Mr. Chandurkar it only means that the matter will have to be sent back to the Board of Revenue to pass an appropriate order in place of the order which it has passed, and we do not see that there would be any impediment in the way of the Board of Revenue in passing an order of suspension so as to make it effective from a future date. In this case, the Board of Revenue was anxious to see that the petitioner was reinstated in his post forthwith and that after such reinstatement there should not be any break in service and that was probably one of the reasons which induced it to make the order of suspension retrospective though, as we have already stated, the order was not strictly legal. Further, the petitioner did not in his application under art. 226 make any grievance against the order of suspension which had been passed against him by way of punishment by the Board of Revenue in appeal No. 40. Under these circumstances, we do not think any prejudice or injustice whatever has been caused to the petitioner (appellant) by the order which is now sought to be impugned before us.

For the reasons stated above, we dismiss the appeal. No order as to costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act (Bom. LXVII of 1948), Secs. 88(1)(c),† 89(2)(b), 43C—Greater Bombay Laws and the Bombay High Court (Declaration of Limits) (Amendment) Act (Bom. 8 of 1950), Sec. 6—Bombay General Clauses Act (I of 1904), Secs. 3(21), 7(b) & (c)—Greater Bombay Laws and the Bombay High Court (Declaration of Limits) Act (17 of 1945), Sec. 2(2)—Tenant acquiring protected tenancy rights by virtue of s. 3A of Tenancy Act of 1939 since November 8, 1947—Act 8 of 1950 making village where lands situated part of Greater Bombay on April 15, 1950—Section 88(1)(c) applicable to lands in village—Suit by landlord for possession of lands—Whether provisions of s. 88 such express provision as could affect the tenant's rights as contemplated in s. 89(2)(b).

The defendant, who was in occupation as tenant of certain lands since 1948, became a protected tenant by virtue of s. 3A of the Tenancy Act of 1939, under the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948. On April 15, 1950, by virtue of Bombay Act 8 of 1950 the village in which these lands were situated became a part of Greater Bombay and, therefore, s. 88(1)(c) of the Act became applicable to the village and none of the provisions of ss. 1 to 87 of that Act applied to the lands. In a suit filed on May 28, 1953, by the plaintiffs—landlords for possession of the lands, the defendant contended that he was a protected tenant of the lands by virtue of s. 89 of the Act and his rights as such protected tenant remained unaffected, he having become a protected tenant since November 8, 1947:—

Held, that the provisions of s. 88(1)(c) of the Act are an express provision in the Act as contemplated under s. 89(2)(b) of the Act, and, that, therefore, after the village became a part of Greater Bombay on April 15, 1950, the protected tenancy right of the defendant ceased to have the protection of the provisions of ss. 1 to 87 of the Act.

GOKHALE J. This is an appeal by the original defendant against whom a decree has been passed by the Bombay City Civil Court in Summary Suit No. 1086 of 1953. The plaintiffs, who are members of a joint Hindu family, owned two pieces of unsurveyed Khoti land in the village of Paspoli situated in the suburbs of Bombay. In January 1946, the said lands were leased out to the present appellant for a period of three years ending on December 31, 1948, on a yearly rent of Rs. 260 and there is no dispute that the defendant took these lands for cultivating the same. The terms and conditions of the lease were recorded in an agreement dated January 15, 1946. Even after the expiry of the three years' period, defendant continued to hold the land on the same terms and conditions and it would appear that, in every December, plaintiff No. 1 agreed to extend the lease for one more year. In December 1952, it appears that the plaintiffs' family did not want to extend the lease and, therefore, by a letter dated December 11, 1952, defendant was called upon to vacate the lands and deliver quiet possession thereof to the plaintiffs. The defendant, however, replied by a letter dated December 22, 1952, alleging that he was a protected tenant and, therefore, not liable to be evicted. This claim of the defendant was denied by the plaintiffs by a letter dated December 29, 1952, and as the defendant did not deliver possession of the lands, the plaintiffs filed the present suit in the Bombay City Civil Court on May 26, 1953.

The suit was resisted by the defendant on several grounds, but for the purpose of this appeal it may be mentioned that the principal contention raised by the defendant was that he was a protected tenant of the lands and by virtue of s. 89 of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948 (67 of 1948), which will hereafter be referred to as the Tenancy Act of 1948, his rights as such protected tenant remained unaffected, he having become a protected tenant since November 8, 1947.

The trial Court came to the conclusion, and that does not appear to have been disputed even on behalf of the plaintiffs, that the defendant was a protected tenant between the coming into force of the Tenancy Act of 1948 on December 28, 1948, and April 15, 1950, on which day the village of Paspoli became a part of Greater Bombay. We may observe that neither in the trial Court nor in the appeal before us, which has been argued at a fairly considerable length, was a point raised as to the jurisdiction of the City Civil Court to decide the question as to whether the defendant being a protected tenant could be evicted by the City Civil Court in the suit as framed by the plaintiffs. It appears that issue No. 3 which was raised, viz. whether the Court had jurisdiction to entertain the suit, was argued by Mr. Joseph, learned advocate appearing on behalf of the appellant who also appeared even in the trial Court, on the basis whether such a suit would be cognisable by the Presidency Small Cause Court and not by the City Civil Court, which contention was negatived by the trial Court and no arguments have been addressed to us on that point in this appeal. The trial Court held that the suit lands having become a part of Greater Bombay, the relevant provisions of the Tenancy Act did not apply to the defendant and after April 15, 1950, it was not open to the defendant to exercise any of the rights as a protected tenant because the provisions of ss. 1 to 87 of the Tenancy Act could not apply to any area within Greater Bombay including the village of Paspoli. In accordance with these findings, a decree was passed in favour of the plaintiffs ordering the defendant to quit and vacate the land in suit and restraining him by a perpetual injunction from entering upon the said land. It has to be mentioned that, as observed by the learned trial Judge, the suit had a very chequered career. On December 10, 1956, an ex parte decree had been passed against the defendant, though that ex parte decree was set aside on certain conditions on January 15, 1957. Execution, however, had been levied on the basis of the ex parte decree, so that on June 7, 1957, possession was in fact handed over to the plaintiffs in execution of the said ex parte decree. It is against the decree passed by the trial Court on July 10, 1957, that the present appeal has been filed by the original defendant.

The decision of the trial Court has been challenged by Mr. Joseph on behalf of the appellant on the ground that defendant's rights as a protected tenant under the Tenancy Act were not affected by any of the provisions of that Act as amended from time to time and, therefore, the decree for eviction passed against his client was erroneous. It is urged that defendant was let into possession as a tenant in January 1946 and continued in possession as a tenant till and after November 8, 1947, and by virtue of the Tenancy Act, he acquired the rights of a protected tenant. Paspoli, where the lands are situated, was not included in Greater Bombay when the Tenancy Act of 1948 came into force. It was by virtue of Act 8 of 1950 that the said village came to be included in Greater Bombay, but the defendant's rights as a protected tenant were not thereby affected or rendered illusory on account of s. 88(1)(c) of the Tenancy Act of 1948. That, in short, is the first branch of Mr. Joseph's argument on behalf of the defendant.

In order to examine the soundness of this argument, it is necessary to notice the relevant provisions of the Bombay Tenancy Acts with the amendments introduced therein from time to time. The first Tenancy Act is Bombay Act 29 of 1939 which came into force on April 2, 1940. Barring the amendments introduced in this Act, especially by Bombay Act 26 of 1946, this Act (29 of 1939) continued in force till December 28, 1948. We are not concerned with the provisions of this Act except with regard to one branch of Mr. Joseph's argument which will be referred to later. The Act of 1939 was repealed by what is known as the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948 (67 of 1948) which came into force on December 28, 1948. Section 2(14) of this Act defined a 'protected tenant' as meaning a person recognised to be a protected tenant under s. 31. Section 89(1) dealt with the repeal of the Bombay Tenancy Act, 1939, and provided that the said Act was repealed to the extent specified in the fourth column of the Schedule. It would be apparent from the Schedule that the whole of the Bombay Tenancy Act, 1939, came to be repealed except ss. 3, 3A and 4 as modified, these modified sections being set out in the fourth column. Under s. 31 of the Tenancy Act, it was provided that a person shall be recognised to be a protected tenant if such person has been deemed to be a protected tenant under s. 3, 3A or 4 of the Bombay Tenancy Act, 1939. Section 3A, as mentioned in the Schedule, provided that every tenant shall from the eighth day of November 1947 be deemed to be a protected tenant for the purposes of this Act and his rights as such protected tenant shall be recorded in the Record of Rights, unless his landlord had prior to the aforesaid date made an application to the Mamlatdar for a declaration that the tenant is not a protected tenant. The Explanation to this section provided that a person shall not be deemed to be a protected tenant if such person had been, on an application made by the owner of the land as provided in s. 3A of the Bombay Tenancy Act, 1939, declared by a competent authority not to be a protected tenant. Now, in the present case there is no dispute that the defendant continued in possession of the suit land as a tenant till and after November 8, 1947. The plaintiffs had not applied for a declaration that the defendant was not a protected tenant. It would be obvious, therefore, that since November 8, 1947, the defendant became a protected tenant under the Tenancy Act of 1948. Section 88 of this Act provided for certain exemptions in respect of certain lands and areas. By virtue of s. 88(1)(c), nothing in the foregoing provisions of the Act would apply to any area within the limits of Greater Bombay and within the limits of the municipal boroughs of Poona City and Suburban, Ahmedabad, Sholapur, Surat and Hubli and within a distance of two miles of the limits of such boroughs. The result of this provision would be that the provisions of ss. 1 to 87 of the Act would not apply to any area within the limits of Greater Bombay. This sub-section was substituted by s. 16 of the Amending Act 33 of 1952, which came into force on January 12, 1953. The original sub-s. (1)(c) of s. 88 was substituted by the following sub-clause:—

“(c) to any area within the limits of Greater Bombay, within the limits of the municipal corporations constituted under the Bombay Provincial Municipal Corporations Act, 1949, within the limits of the municipal boroughs constituted under the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, and within the limits of any cantonment.”

It would be clear, therefore, that the original exemption as regards the limits of Greater Bombay was confirmed by this substituted clause, and instead of certain municipal boroughs being mentioned, the new clause mentioned the limits of the municipal corporations constituted either under the Bombay Provincial Municipal Corporations Act, 1949, or the limits of municipal boroughs constituted under the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, and the limits of any cantonment also came to be included as an exempted area. It may be also mentioned that sub-s. (2) of s. 88, as it originally stood in the Tenancy Act of 1948 as well as after its amendment in 1952, empowered Government to direct that any particular land or class of lands in any area shall not be exempt from all or any of the provisions of that Act.

The suit lands, as already stated, are situate in the village of Paspoli. The term 'Greater Bombay' has not been defined by the Tenancy Act of 1948. Section 3 of the Bombay General Clauses Act, I of 1904, gives certain definitions which are to be applicable to all Bombay Acts made after the commencement of that Act, and s. 3(21) of that Act provides that "Greater Bombay" shall mean the areas specified in Schedule A to the Greater Bombay Laws and the Bombay High Court (Declaration of Limits) Act, 1945 (17 of 1945). Section 2(2) of Act 17 of 1945 defines 'Greater Bombay' as meaning the areas for the time being specified in Schedule A, and this Act, came into force on August 15, 1945. The village of Paspoli is not mentioned in Schedule A to this Act. It is by virtue of s. 9 of this Act 17 of 1945 that the definition of 'Greater Bombay' to be found in s. 3(21) of the Bombay General Clauses Act was inserted in that Act. It is obvious, therefore, that when the Tenancy Act of 1948 came into force on December 28, 1948, the exemption under s. 88 did not apply to the suit lands situated in the village of Paspoli. The Greater Bombay Laws and the Bombay High Court (Declaration of Limits) Act, 1945, was itself amended by Bombay Act 8 of 1950 and, by virtue of s. 6 of this amending Act, 14 villages of the Bombay Suburban District including the village of Paspoli came to be inserted as Part III of the Schedule of Act 17 of 1945. This amending Act appears to have come into force on April 15, 1950, with the result that so far as the suit lands are concerned, as Paspoli became a part of Greater Bombay, s. 88(1)(c) of the Tenancy Act of 1948 became applicable to that village and none of the provisions of ss. 1 to 87 of that Act could apply to the said area. It was on this basis that the learned trial Judge came to the conclusion that the defendant was a protected tenant between the coming into force of the Tenancy Act of 1948 and April 15, 1950.

Mr. Joseph challenges the correctness of this finding in the first instance on the ground that if the defendant was a protected tenant after the coming into operation of the Tenancy Act of 1948, his right as a protected tenant could not be adversely affected by anything in s. 88 of the Act which admittedly, so far as his client is concerned, could apply, if at all, after Paspoli came within the limits of Greater Bombay on April 15, 1950. In support of his argument he has relied on the provisions of sub-s. (2)(b) of s. 89, which provides, so far as is material, that nothing in the Tenancy Act of 1948 or any repeal effected thereby shall, save as expressly provided in the Act, affect or be deemed to affect, any right, title, interest, obligation or liability acquired, accrued or incurred before the commencement of the Act. Mr. Joseph contends that his client had acquired the rights of a protected tenant and those rights could not be adversely affected by the provisions of s. 88. In short, Mr. Joseph's argument is that in the first instance s. 88 cannot be given retrospective operation so as to nullify the right of a protected tenant which has vested in his client since November 8, 1947, and secondly, the provisions of s. 88 are not such express provisions as could affect his rights as contemplated in s. 89(2)(b) of the Act. Now, as regards the nature of the right alleged to have been acquired by the defendant, Mr. Padhye, learned advocate appearing on behalf of the respondents, points out that the right cannot be regarded as a vested right because, it is the Tenancy Act of 1948 which conferred on the defendant the right of being a protected tenant and that by itself, says Mr. Padhye, would not be sufficient to make it a vested right. In support of his argument, Mr. Padhye has relied on a Full Bench decision of this Court in Maganbhai Jethabhai Patel v. Somabhai,¹ which was inclined to take the view that "when one speaks of vested rights, those are rights which are not the creature of law or of an enactment, but those are rights which are acquired by a person claiming them by some action taken by him under the law."

In this connection the learned Chief Justice, who delivered the judgment of the Full Bench, further observed (p. 1387):—

“...The Tenancy Act, as it were, put a cloak of protection round the tenant and prevented the landlord from exercising his contractual rights. Can it be said that when that cloak was removed and the parties were left to their contractual rights and obligations, there were some vested rights which the tenant still possessed? The tenant had done nothing under the Tenancy Act which led to his acquiring any right. He had not changed his position; he had not entered into any contract or into any lease pursuant to the provisions of the Act. All that he acquired was the rights given by the Tenancy Act itself. The Legislature gave him certain rights and the Legislature took away those rights. Was it open to the tenant to contend that the protection given by the law was a vested right to which he was entitled and which could not be taken away from him by the Legislature unless the Legislature so expressly provided?”

Mr. Padhye says that these observations of the learned Chief Justice would indicate that the right that the defendant got under the Tenancy Acts of 1939 and 1948 was not a vested right, and if that was so, the provisions of s. 88 could apply retrospectively. It is true that the judgment of the learned Chief Justice shows that the Full Bench was inclined to accept the contention that the rights which a tenant gets under the Tenancy Act are not vested rights. But as the judgment itself shows, the Full Bench did not think it necessary expressly to decide that point, in view of the interpretation that the Full Bench put on the proviso to s. 43(c) of the Tenancy Act as amended in 1956. In our opinion, that question also need not be decided in the present case because, in our judgment, s. 88 of the Tenancy Act which in terms exempts lands falling within the limits of Greater Bombay from the provisions of ss. 1 to 87 of the Act, constitutes an express provision as contemplated under s. 89(2)(b) of the Act. In *Sakharam Narayan v. Manikchand Motichand*² a Division Bench of this Court held that a suit by a landlord to recover possession of agricultural lands situated within the limits of a Municipal Corporation, which lands are excluded from the operation of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, can lie in a Civil Court, even though the defendant sets up the plea that he is a protected tenant under the Bombay Tenancy Act, 1939. The facts of that case may be briefly stated. The plaintiffs there had filed a suit in the Court of the Joint Civil Judge, Junior Division, Poona, against four defendants, for a decree for possession of certain agricultural lands which were within the limits of the Poona Municipal Corporation. The defendants contended inter alia that the Civil Court had no jurisdiction to try the suit, as it was governed by the provisions of the Bombay Tenancy Act. That contention was negatived by the trial Court as well as by the appellate Court, and this Court upheld their decision on the ground that the effect of s. 88, sub-s. (1), cl. (c), of the Tenancy Act of 1948 was to exclude from the operation of ss. 1 to 87 of the Act those areas which are specified in that sub-section, and therefore, to land situate in the area specified in the sub-section, even if it be used for agricultural purposes, the provisions of the Act do not apply, and the rights of the parties to a dispute relating to that land are governed by the ordinary law of the land and are unaffected by the provisions of the Tenancy Act of 1948. It is true that this case was concerned with the question of jurisdiction of the ordinary Civil Court to try the suit. But that necessarily led to the consideration of the question raised by the defendants in that case, viz., whether they were entitled to set up their rights as protected tenants in respect of the lands so as to defeat the plaintiff's claim for possession of the lands which are excluded by s. 88 from the operation of the Act, in other words, whether the defendants were entitled to set up rights and privileges of the protected tenant acquired under the Act of 1939 in respect of lands which were no longer governed by the provisions of the Tenancy Act of 1948. On this point, Mr. Justice Shah, who delivered the judgment in that case, observed as follows (p. 225):

"...But the Legislature has excluded from the operation of the Act of 1948 certain classes of leases, and also lands which are situate in specified areas. Once that exclusion is made, whatever rights may be deemed otherwise to have been conferred by s. 31 upon protected tenants must be regarded as ineffective, if the land is of the description mentioned in s. 88 or that the land is within the area specified in that section. It is true that the Legislature by sub-s. (2) of s. 89 has purported to protect the right, title and interest of persons who were governed by the Tenancy Act of 1939, notwithstanding the repeal of that Act; but it is provided that those rights and privileges will not be exercisable if there is an express provision to the contrary made in the Act. The Legislature has provided by s. 88 that the lands situate in certain areas will not be governed by the provisions of the Act of 1948, and that must be regarded as 'an express provision to the contrary', and the rights acquired under the Act of 1939 cannot be exercised if the lands in respect of which they are claimed are situate within the area specified in s. 88, sub-s. (1), cl. (c) of the Act of 1948."

In his judgment Mr. Justice Shah also referred to an unreported decision of a Division Bench of this Court, Shivram Narayan Bhide v. Shridhar Keshav Patwardhan,³ where it was held that the effect of s. 88 of the Tenancy Act is that in the case of lands which are governed by that section the provisions of the Act would not apply and the protection to the vested rights of the tenants would be rendered illusory because the suit in which that right had to be asserted has been instituted subsequent to the commencement of the Act and the bar to the jurisdiction of the Civil Court to entertain and decide the suit was removed by s. 88 which excluded certain lands from the operation of the Tenancy Act. In the present case, in case Mr. Joseph's argument is right that s. 88 cannot be operative so as to affect the protected tenancy rights of his client, the Bombay City Civil Court would not have jurisdiction to decide the present suit which is filed by the plaintiffs for possession of the suit lands, a contention which was not raised in the trial Court and not urged before us also. In our judgment, therefore, the ratio of the decision in Sakharam Narayan v. Manikchand Motichand would apply to the facts of the present case and it will have to be held that the provisions of s. 88(1)(c) of the Tenancy Act of 1948 are an express provision in the Act as contemplated under s. 89(2)(b) of the Act, with the result that after Paspoli became a part of Greater Bombay on April 15, 1950, the protected tenancy right of the defendant ceased to have the protection of the provisions of ss. 1 to 87 of the Tenancy Act.

Our attention has been invited to two other unreported decisions of this Court which are also referred to in the recent Full Bench case of Maganbhai Jethabai Patel v. Somabhai. The first of these decisions is the case of Morashwar Parasharam Phatak v. Vishal Krishna Joshi.⁴ In that case, the plot in dispute was situated within the municipal limits of Ratnagiri and s. 88 (1)(c) of the Tenancy Act of 1948 became applicable to the area by virtue of cl. (c) substituted by Bombay Act XXXIII of 1952 for the original cl. (c) of sub-s. (1) of s. 88. The contention raised in that case that this amendment should be held to be retrospective so as to affect the tenancy rights accrued in favour of one of the defendants was negatived and it was held that the amendment introduced by Act XXXIII of 1952 was not retrospective and did not apply to the case of tenants who were protected by the Act of 1948. As pointed out in the Full Bench case, the view taken by this Court in this unreported decision must be assumed to be on the basis that the rights of the tenants were vested rights. In that case, it does not also appear to have been argued that the provisions of s. 88 constituted an express provision to the contrary contemplated under s. 89(2)(b). In the present case, we are not concerned with the amendment introduced by Act XXXIII of 1952 and, as we have already pointed out, in the original Tenancy Act of 1948 itself s. 88 provided for exemption of lands falling within the limits of Greater Bombay by virtue of s. 88(1)(c). The other unreported decision, to which our attention was drawn and which is also referred to in the Full Bench decision, is Nanchand Amirchand Gandhi v. Rama Malhari Pise.⁵ In that case, the area with which the Court was concerned was the Municipal Borough limits of Pandharpur Municipality and it was by virtue of Act XXXIII of 1952 which came into force on January 12, 1953 that that area came to be exempted under s. 88(1)(c) from the operation of the Act. There again, the learned Judges held that the provisions of Act XXXIII of 1952 could not affect the rights which the tenant had acquired under the Tenancy Act of 1948. But it appears that this view was taken by that Bench on account of the provisions of s. 43(c) of the Tenancy Act of 1956. As the judgment in the Full Bench case of Maganbhai Jethabai Patel v. Somabhai has pointed out, in Sakharam Narayan v. Manikchand Motichand, the Court was not concerned with the Amending Act of 1952 but the question arose under the Tenancy Acts of 1939 and 1948. In the present case also, the exemption of the lands in suit is the result of s. 88(1)(c) as it stood even before the Amending Act XXXIII of 1952, and, in our view, the decision in Sakharam Narayan v. Manikchand Motichand will have to be followed so far as the point under consideration is concerned.

But then Mr. Joseph contends that when the Tenancy Act of 1948 came into force on December 28, 1948, the village of Paspoli was not included in the limits of Greater Bombay. It came only to be included within Greater Bombay on April 15, 1950, by virtue of the provisions of Bombay Act VIII of 1950, and Mr. Joseph argues that since the protected tenancy rights of the defendant continued unaffected till April 1950, s. 88(1)(c) cannot affect the land in suit which must continue to be governed by the Tenancy Act. We are not prepared to accept this argument either. Section 88(1)(c) provided for exemption of lands from the operation of the Tenancy Act within the limits of Greater Bombay. Sub-section (2) of s. 2 of Bombay Act XVII of 1945 defines 'Greater Bombay' as meaning the areas for the time being specified in Schedule A. When this Act was passed, the village of Paspoli was not included in that Schedule; but the definition of 'Greater Bombay' itself shows that the Legislature had contemplated that the limits of Greater Bombay would be fluctuating and expanding limits. Bombay Act VIII of 1950 which amended Bombay Act XVII of 1945 included the village of Paspoli in Schedule A and that village, therefore, came within the limits of Greater Bombay. But Mr. Joseph contends that when the Tenancy Act of 1948 was enacted the Legislature had in mind certain limits of Greater Bombay, and he argues that even assuming that s. 88(1)(c) was intended to affect rights already acquired, the Legislature could not have intended to give to cl. (c) an operation so as to affect rights in lands which came to be subsequently included within the limits of Greater Bombay. We do not think that that argument is sound. As already pointed out, when the Tenancy Act of 1948 was placed on the statute book in 1948, under s. 88(1)(c), the area within the limits of Greater Bombay was exempted from the operation of ss. 1 to 87 of the Act and by virtue of Act XVII of 1945 Greater Bombay was meant to include areas which would for the time being be specified in Schedule A of that Act. The limits of Greater Bombay were obviously intended, however, to be flexible and capable of extension. It cannot, therefore, be said that the Legislature had in mind only the limits of Greater Bombay as they existed on December 28, 1948, for the purpose of the exemption from the operation of the Act and could not have intended the widening of the scope of the exemption so as to affect rights within the enlarged limits also. Besides, if s. 88(1)(c) constitutes an express provision in the Act as contemplated by s. 89(2)(b) of the Tenancy Act of 1948, that clause would necessarily continue to have that effect even though the village of Paspoli and other villages are subsequently included in the limits of Greater Bombay.

Then Mr. Joseph contended that even assuming that ss. 1 to 87 of the Tenancy Act of 1948 do not apply to the lands in suit by reason of s. 88(1)(c), defendant's protected tenancy rights which arose under the Tenancy Act of 1939 cannot be affected because of the provisions of s. 89 of the Tenancy Act of 1948. It is contended that s. 89 of the Act retains three sections of the Tenancy Act of 1939, though the other provisions of that Act are repealed. If that be so, Mr. Joseph contends, his client, by virtue of the provisions of s. 3A of the Tenancy Act of 1939 and the Explanation to that section, would be deemed to be a protected tenant and that right cannot be adversely affected by anything in the provisions of s. 88. We are not persuaded to uphold this argument also. It is not disputed that if ss. 1 to 87 do not apply to the lands in suit, s. 2(14), which defines a protected tenant, as well as s. 31 would not have any operation so far as the suit lands are concerned. Though under s. 3A of the Tenancy Act of 1939 a tenant is to be deemed to be a protected tenant from November 8, 1947, he can only be recognised to be a protected tenant by virtue of s. 31 of the Tenancy Act of 1948. If s. 31 cannot apply, we fail to see how the rights of the defendant can be regarded as anything but illusory, even assuming that s. 3A of the Tenancy Act of 1939 stands independently of the provisions of the Tenancy Act of 1948. But, as already pointed out, s. 89(1) of the Tenancy Act of 1948 while repealing the Tenancy Act of 1939 has preserved three sections of the old Act, but the rights arising under those three sections can only be rendered effective by virtue of the other provisions of the Tenancy Act of 1948. We are not, therefore, prepared to accept the argument of Mr. Joseph that his client is entitled to defeat the plaintiffs' suit by virtue of his right as a protected tenant under the Tenancy Act of 1939 even though ss. 1 to 87 of the Tenancy Act of 1948 cease to have any operation by virtue of s. 88(1)(c) of the Act.

Then Mr. Joseph has raised a further contention on the basis of the amending Tenancy Act 13 of 1956. Now, Act 13 of 1956 came into force on August 1, 1956. Under that Act, the original s. 88 was considerably modified and the relevant section for our present purpose in the amending Act is s. 88(b). By virtue of the present s. 88(b), ss. 1 to 87 of even the amending Act would not apply to any area which the State Government may from time to time by notification in the Official Gazette specify as reserved for non-agricultural or industrial development. This Act came into force on August 1, 1956, and on that very day, in exercise of the powers conferred by cl. (b) of s. 88 the State Government issued a notification No. TNC 5156/101965-F specifying areas within the limits of Greater Bombay as being reserved for non-agricultural and industrial development. There is no dispute that on August 1, 1956, the village of Paspoli was within the limits of Greater Bombay. If that be so, by virtue of this notification the provisions of ss. 1 to 87 would continue to cease to have any operation with regard to the lands in suit. Mr. Joseph's argument is that a notification issued by the State Government could not destroy the protected tenancy rights of his client, because such a notification cannot be given retrospective effect. In support of his argument, Mr. Joseph has relied on the case of *Tamboli Boghalal v. Mohanlal Chumilal*⁶ where Mr. Justice Vyass took the view that the tenancy rights created in favour of a tenant before the coming into force of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, and enjoyed by a tenant after the Act came into force, are not affected as the result of a notification issued by the State Government under s. 88(1)(d) of the Tenancy Act of 1948, specifying the lands as reserved for urban, non-agricultural or industrial development. According to this decision, although competence is given to the State Government under s. 88(1)(d) of the Tenancy Act of 1948 to issue a notification reserving certain lands for urban, non-agricultural or industrial development, the said competence is prospective and not retrospective and it does not extend to the taking away of the already vested valuable rights of the tenants. Now, it must be observed in the first instance that this decision is based on the view that the rights acquired by the tenant under the Tenancy Act are vested rights. That view cannot now be regarded as above question in view of the observations of the learned Chief Justice in the Full Bench case of Maganbhai Jethabhai Patel v. Somabhai, to which we have already made a reference, though the Full Bench has refrained from giving its final opinion on that point. In the case with which Mr. Justice Vyas was dealing, the lands were situated in the former State of Baroda which merged in the Bombay State on August 1, 1949. On the same day the Tenancy Act came into force in that area and the tenants became protected tenants from August 1, 1950, which was the date mentioned in the provisions of the Tenancy Act, as were made applicable to Baroda State, instead of November 8, 1947. Sixteen months thereafter, on April 24, 1951, the State Government issued a notification under s. 88(1)(d) reserving an area within the limits of the Municipal Borough of Baroda City and within a distance of two miles of the limits of the said Borough for urban, non-agricultural or industrial development. Mr. Justice Vyas held that as this area came to be within the exemption by virtue of the notification issued by Government, the notification could not be given any retrospective effect. In the present case, according to our view, from April 15, 1950, the defendant ceased to have any effective tenancy rights because as the village in which the suit land is situate came within the limits of Greater Bombay, the provisions of ss. 1 to 87 ceased to apply to the suit land. Till August 1, 1956, the original s. 88(1)(c) continued and that section came to be replaced by s. 88(b) of the Tenancy Act of 1948 as amended by Act 13 of 1956 and on the very day that the new Act came into operation on August 1, 1956, the Government issued a notification continuing the exemption in respect of the lands in Greater Bombay from the operation of ss. 1 to 87 of the Tenancy Act of 1948, as amended in 1956. It cannot, therefore, be said that the notification issued by the State Government on August 1, 1956, introduced any new exemption. All that it did was that it continued the exemption which was already in force under s. 88(1)(c) since April 15, 1950, so far as the suit land is concerned. We are not, therefore, prepared to accept the argument that the notification issued by the State Government on August 1, 1956, cannot affect the defendant's rights.

Then Mr. Joseph relied on the provisions of s. 7 of the Bombay General Clauses Act, 1904. He contended that s. 7(b) and (c) of that Act would prevent the protected tenancy rights of his client from being affected. Under s. 7 of that Act, where that Act or any Bombay Act made after the commencement of the Act repeals any enactment hitherto made or hereafter to be made, then, unless a different intention appears, the repeal shall not, under cl. (b) of s. 7, affect any right, privilege, obligation or liability acquired, accrued or incurred under any enactment so repealed, or, under cl. (c) of the same section, affect any right, privilege, obligation or liability acquired, accrued or incurred under any enactment so repealed. It is difficult to appreciate the argument that the defendant's rights continue to be protected by reason of these provisions as the Tenancy Act of 1948 is impliedly repealed regarding lands in Paspoli. For the purpose of this argument, Mr. Joseph has not relied on the repeal of the Tenancy Act of 1939. He contends that under s. 88 of the Tenancy Act of 1948 certain areas are exempted from the operation of ss. 1 to 87. When this Act came into operation on December 28, 1948, the limits of Greater Bombay did not include the village of Paspoli. It was only by reason of Act 8 of 1950 that the said village came within the limits of Greater Bombay, and, therefore, contends Mr. Joseph, Act 8 of 1950 must be taken to have impliedly repealed the Tenancy Act of 1948 so far as the lands situated in that village are concerned. We are not prepared to accept this argument as sound. Section 88 of the Act excludes certain areas from the operation of the Tenancy Act. That does not mean that s. 88 itself impliedly repeals a part of the Tenancy Act. Section 88(1)(c) referred to the exemption in respect of the area within the limits of Greater Bombay. The limits of that area were fluctuating and capable of extension and by virtue of Act 8 of 1950 the limits of Greater Bombay were extended and certain more villages including the village of Paspoli came to be included within the limits of Greater Bombay. But that cannot, in our opinion, constitute any implied repeal of the Tenancy Act itself by Act 8 of 1950. In our view, therefore, the essential condition for the application of s. 7 of the Bombay General Clauses Act, 1904, is not present in this case. It is also not possible to accept the submission, as already stated, that the Legislature, when it extended the limits of Greater Bombay by including the village of Paspoli and other villages in the limits of Greater Bombay, could never have intended that this inclusion should affect the operation of the Tenancy Act with regard to the lands in these villages. This contention of Mr. Joseph, therefore, must also fail.

Finally, Mr. Joseph contended that his client's right as a protected tenant was acquired by virtue of the provisions of the Tenancy Act of 1948 and that would be unaffected by anything in s. 88 because of the proviso to s. 43C enacted by Act 13 of 1956. The proviso to s. 43C states that "...if any person has acquired any right as a tenant under this Act on or after the 28th December 1948, the said right shall not be deemed to have been affected by the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands (Amendment) Act, 1952, or (save as expressly provided in s. 43D), by the Amending Act, 1955, notwithstanding the fact that either of the said Act has been made applicable to the area in which such land is situate."

The short argument of Mr. Joseph is that the defendant had acquired his right as a protected tenant and continued to be such a tenant till at any rate April 15, 1950, and that right would be saved by reason of the proviso to s. 43C. In support of this argument Mr. Joseph relied on the Full Bench case, already referred to, Maganbhai Jethabhai Patel v. Somabhai. Now, the Full Bench in that case was concerned with certain lands situated in the Borough Municipality of Baroda and by virtue of the amending Act of 1952 the lands in that case came to be excluded from the operation of the Tenancy Act of 1948 from January 1953. The landlord after giving notice to the tenant filed a suit for possession before the Mamlatdar and his suit was decreed. A revision was filed by the tenant before the Prant Officer. Pending the revision application, the Tenancy Act of 1948 was amended by the Amending Act, 1955 (Act 13 of 1956), and the Prant Officer set aside the order of the Mamlatdar relying on the proviso to s. 43C. On the question whether the effect of the proviso to s. 43C was such that notwithstanding the decree passed by the Mamlatdar, the tenant could claim protection under the Act of 1948 and resist the landlord's suit for eviction, it was held by the Full Bench that the right of the tenant under the Tenancy Act of 1948 was, by a legal fiction introduced by the proviso to s. 43C, continued and was not affected by the Amending Act of 1952 and that the proviso to s. 43C was applicable to the case as there was no final judgment against the opponent in the sense that the judgment given by the Mamlatdar was subject to revision, and the revisional Court was bound to take notice of the change in law effected by the proviso. On facts, the present case is distinguishable from the case which the Full Bench was considering. But before I deal with that distinction, it is necessary to note that even the legal fiction introduced by the proviso to s. 43C does not appear to be an absolute fiction which would save the rights of a tenant in every case. That seems to be clear from the subsequent decision of another Full Bench of this Court in Dhondiraj Jayaram v. Dhonduraj Anaji,⁷ where it was held that the legal fiction introduced by the proviso to s. 43C did not permit the tenant to claim rights which he did not have at the date when a litigation had finally ended by a decree for possession passed by a competent Court against him. In that case, the landlord of certain lands situated in a Municipal Borough had filed a suit in a Civil Court for ejectment against his tenant who was a protected tenant under the Tenancy Act of 1948. Previous to the coming into operation of the amending Act of 1956, a decree was passed in favour of the landlord on April 22, 1955, and in execution of that decree the landlord obtained possession on April 24, 1955. Thereafter, the amending Tenancy Act came into force and the tenant applied under s. 84 of the Act claiming possession from the landlord by virtue of the proviso to s. 43C. On these facts it was held by the Full Bench that a decree having been passed by a competent Court, the tenant could not claim any rights by virtue of the proviso to s. 43C. In the present case, the protected tenancy rights of the defendant have not been acquired under the Tenancy Act of 1948, but by virtue of s. 3A of the Tenancy Act of 1939. Further these rights are not affected by the amending Act of 1952 but were affected by virtue of the provisions of s. 88(1)(c) of the Tenancy Act of 1948 on April 15, 1950, when the village of Paspoli came within the limits of Greater Bombay. The proviso to s. 43C will not consequently be applicable. What is contemplated under the proviso to s. 43C is, in our opinion, the right which a tenant has acquired on or after December 28, 1948, and which continued to be intact and effective till the coming into force of the amending Act of 1952 or the amending Act of 1955 (Act 13 of 1956). In the present case, the tenancy rights were already affected in April 1950 and were not for the first time affected either by the amending Act of 1952 or by the notification issued by the State Government under s. 88(b) on August 1, 1956. In our judgment, therefore, Mr. Joseph's argument that the defendant's rights as a protected tenant cannot be deemed to have been affected because of the proviso to s. 43C of the amending Tenancy Act cannot also be accepted.

The difficulties experienced in putting a rational interpretation on the several provisions of the Bombay Tenancy Acts which have been amended and replaced from time to time have been the subject of frequent comments in this Court and the present case has proved no exception. In arriving at our conclusion we have not lost sight of the object which the Legislature has had in mind in enacting the agricultural tenancy legislation which is intended to ameliorate and better the economic conditions of the actual tillers of the soil. At the same time, it appears that the Legislature has also kept in mind other economic and social aspects, such as the development and expansion of large cities and towns, and non-agricultural and industrial development. That seems to be the basis of the original s. 88 of the Tenancy Act of 1948 which was first amended in 1952 and underwent radical alteration and substitution in 1956, and under s. 88(b) Government was given power to exempt from the operation of the Act any area which they would specify as being reserved for non-agricultural or industrial development by issue of a notification. Sub-section (2) of s. 88 of the Tenancy Act of 1948, as it originally stood, provided that notwithstanding anything contained in sub-s. (1), the Provincial Government may, by notification published in the Official Gazette, direct that any particular land or class of lands in any area shall not be exempt from all or any of the provisions of the Act. This sub-section has not been retained when the amending Act 13 of 1956 was enacted. To hold, therefore, that the notification issued by the State Government regarding Greater Bombay on August 1, 1956, should have only prospective operation is not, in our judgment, calculated to further the object which the Legislature had in view. On this ground also, we cannot accept the contention of Mr. Joseph that the notification dated August 1, 1956, can be given prospective effect only, though, as already stated, the only effect that that notification had in the present case was to continue the exemption which was already in operation regarding land situated within the limits of Greater Bombay.

The result is that all the contentions raised by Mr. Joseph fail and the appeal will have to be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

MUDHOLKAR J. The petitioners in both these petitions under art. 227 of the Constitution are landlords of certain lands and had sought possession of those lands from the respective respondents in the two petitions on the ground that these respondents had forfeited the tenancies in their favour because they had sub-let all the lands or some of the lands, which were leased out to them.

It may be pointed out that in both the petitions before us a number of fields were leased out to the respective respondents in the two petitions by their landlords under a single lease one of which reserved a single rent with respect to the demised lands. In Spl. C. A. No. 8384 of 1958 the contention of the petitioner-landlord was that his tenants had sub-let all the lands leased out to them. The Tribunals below have, however, held that only a portion of the demised lands was sub-let by the tenants. In Spl. C. A. No. 1328 of 1958 the contention of the petitioner-landlord was that most of the lands were sub-let by the tenants and the Tribunals have upheld a part of this contention. We, therefore, proceed on the basis that only a portion of the demised lands was sub-let by the respondents-tenants, and the question which we have to consider is whether as a result of this the leases in favour of the respondents are liable to be terminated at the instance of the petitioners.

Section 27 of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, when the sub-leases were effected by the respondents stood thus:

"27. (1) No sub-division or sub-letting of the land or assignment of any interest held by a tenant shall be valid. Such sub-division, sub-letting or assignment shall make the tenancy liable to termination.

Provided that nothing in this sub-section shall prejudicially affect the rights of a permanent tenant or any tenant the duration of whose tenancy is presumed to be co-extensive with the duration of the tenure of the landlord under section 83 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879."

Then follows sub-s. (2) with which we are not concerned. The petitioners' contention is that the lease being one and indivisible, no sooner a tenant sub-let any portion of the demised property, the landlord became entitled to terminate the entire lease in favour of the tenant. On the other hand, it is contended on behalf of the respondents-tenants that the right of the landlord to terminate the tenancy of a tenant accrues under s. 27 only when the tenant makes a sub-division of the demised lands or sub-lets or assigns the entire demised lands. In support of the contention that the leases are liable to be terminated in their entirety Mr. Paranjape for the petitioner relies upon a decision of a Division Bench of this Court in Chimnabai Rama Naik v. Ganpat Jagannath Naik.¹ There the learned Judges observed:

"...If sub-letting of a part of the land involves termination of the tenancy, it is not open, in the absence of any express provision made by the Legislature, to impose upon the landlord a new contract in respect of the remaining land which is not sub-let. A contract of tenancy is one and indivisible and must stand or fall as a whole and when it is provided by the Legislature that a contract is to be terminated on account of some act on the part of the tenant it cannot be said that the termination is in respect of a part of the contract and not of the whole contract. If sub-letting involves the consequences of termination of the tenancy, having regard to the terms of sections 14 and 27 of the Act, we are of the view that it must amount to termination of the entire tenancy and not of the tenancy in so far as it relates to the land which has been sub-let."

We agree with the learned Judges that a contract of tenancy is one and indivisible and must stand or fall as a whole, unless, of course, the Legislature provides for termination of a part of a lease as it has done while enacting the provisions of ss. 13(1)(e) and 14 of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947. That, however, is not a point which falls for decision in the case before us. What we have to decide is whether the effect of sub-letting by tenants of portions of lands held by them under a lease brings about a forfeiture of their tenancies. This, of course, must depend upon the language used by the Legislature in s. 27 of the Act which is the only provision under which a landlord gets the right to terminate the tenancy of a tenant on the ground of sub-letting. The opening words of s. 27(1) show that what is prohibited and what is rendered invalid is the sub-division or sub-letting of the land leased out by the landlord to his tenant. This must necessarily mean the entire land which was leased out by the landlord to the tenant and not a portion of it. It must be borne in mind that under s. 108(j) of the Transfer of Property Act a lessee has, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, a right to transfer absolutely or by way of mortgage or sub-lease the whole or any part of his interest in the demised property. The provisions of this section are applicable to tenancies governed by the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, because of the provisions of s. 3 thereof. The question is what is the extent to which a tenant's right under s. 108(j) of the Transfer of Property Act is limited or taken away by s. 27(1) of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948. It has been held in a number of English cases that an undertaking not to sub-let or to assign the premises is not broken by a sub-lease or assignment of a part of those premises.

The earliest case on the point is *Church v. Brown*² which is referred to at page 411 of Cheshire's Modern Real Property. In that case it was held that a covenant placing a restriction on the tenant's right to sub-let the premises must be construed very strictly. This view was followed in *Grove v. Portal*³ and also in certain Indian decisions to which we will advert presently. These decisions and several others were considered by the Court of Appeal in *Cook v. Shoesmith*⁴ and it was held that on its true construction, the undertaking in the agreement "not to sub-let" was not broken by sub-letting part of the premises, for the verb "to sublet" must have an object and its only possible object was the house which was the subject-matter of the agreement. In Esdale v. Lewis,⁵ the majority of Judges following the decision in Cook v. Shoesmith and the earlier cases construed the words "no sub-letting allowed without the written consent of the landlord" as prohibiting the sub-letting of the entire premises demised, and not of part of them.

The two earlier English decisions were followed by the Calcutta High Court in Swarnamayee Debee v. Afaraddi.⁶ In that case a lease provided (p. 48):

"We shall not be able to transfer the said karsha right in any way by gift or sale, or to grant any karsha settlement in respect thereof, or to encumber the same in any way. If we do so, your right of khas possession will accrue."

It was held that the forfeiture of the lease was to be incurred by the lessee and the right of re-entry was to accrue to the lessor in the event of the lessee's transferring or encumbering the entire leasehold and that a usufructuary mortgage of a part of the holding would not, therefore, cause forfeiture of the tenancy. This decision was followed by the same High Court in Keshab Chandra v. Gopal Chandra,⁷ where it was held that a restrictive covenant or a covenant entailing forfeiture of a tenancy in a case of alienation contained in a lease must be strictly construed against the lessor and that a covenant against alienation by a lessee must relate to transfer of the entire leasehold. In Venkataramana Bhatta v. Krishna Bhatta,⁸ following Grove v. Portal it was held that a clause in the lease prohibiting alienation by the lessee operated only with respect to the alienation of the whole of the demised premises and not with respect to partial alienation.

The question is whether the principle deducible from these cases should be applied to the present case, because here what we are considering are the provisions of an Act of the Legislature and not of a covenant in a contract between the parties. It seems to us that the fact that what we have to consider now is a statute does not make any difference. After all, we have to interpret the meaning of certain words used by the Legislature. It would, therefore, be relevant for us to bear in mind the interpretation placed on similar words by different Courts even though those Courts were considering not statutory provisions but covenants in contracts between the parties. Mr. Paranjape referred us to Craies on Statutory Law, page 6, and said that we were precluded from doing so. The passage on which he relies is as follows:

"Contracts. In the construction of a contract there cannot be said to be any rules of law applicable, but 'the governing principle is to ascertain the intention of the parties to the contract through the words they have used', which words 'are to be taken in the sense which the common usage of mankind has applied to them in reference to the context in which they are found'. Lord Wright has recently said: 'I deprecate in general the attempt to enunciate decisions on the construction of agreements as if they embodied rules of law...the decision as to each must depend on the consideration of the parties' contract read in the light of the material circumstances of the parties in view of which the contract is made'. It is seldom, in construing 'mercantile contracts, that any technical or artificial rule of law can be brought to bear on their construction; the question really is the meaning of the language', and 'the grammatical meaning is, as in other cases, the meaning to be adopted, unless there be reason to the contrary'...

In Reid v. Reid the Court rejected as useless for the construction of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, decisions as to the meaning of covenants in marriage settlements, on the ground that such cases must be approached with a presumption that they were intended to exclude the husband from acquiring the property of his wife if it should fall into possession during coverture; whereas, in dealing with the Act, no such presumption arose. And in Midland Ry. v. Robinson,⁹ in construing the word 'mines' in the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, Lord Herschell said: 'In dealing with this case, it must be remembered that all your lordships have to do is to interpret the words of the enactment, and not lay down, even if it were possible, any general rule as to the interpretation of the word 'mines'. I doubt whether much assistance is to be obtained from cases in which a construction has been put upon that word in instruments embodying merely agreements between the parties to them, unaffected by any statutory enactment. In such agreements, in the absence of a distinct indication of the contrary intention, it is always to be assumed that the reserved mines are only to be worked in such a manner as is consistent with the surface remaining undisturbed.'

It is no doubt true that decisions based upon the construction of covenants in contracts ought not to be referred to for the purpose of construing the provisions of an Act, but it does not follow that the construction placed by the Courts upon certain words used in a document is not to be considered when it is necessary for a Court to construe the same words occurring in a statute. Indeed, that is not what is laid down in any of the decisions referred to by Craies. We cannot, therefore, accept the contention of Mr. Paranjpe.

The decisions on which reliance was placed by Mr. Gokhale were not cited at the Bar before Shah and Vyas JJ. in Chimnabai Rama Naik v. Ganpat Jagannata Naik. It cannot, therefore, be said that the learned Judges had occasion to examine the law on the point fully. That being the position, we think that it would not be improper for us to come to a different conclusion on the particular question which was also before the learned Judges. On the basis of the decisions of the Courts in India and in England, we, therefore, come to the conclusion that the mere fact that some of the lands covered by the lease were sub-let by the lessees does not entail a forfeiture of the lease.

If in fact there was a single lease by the landlords in both the cases as is contended for by the petitioners, then upon the view we have taken it would follow that the tenants would not incur forfeiture of their leases in so far as they concern those lands which were actually sub-let by them. We need not say anything more on that point, because the petitioners have secured relief with regard to these lands before the Revenue Tribunal and the tenants' petitions to this Court challenging the correctness of the decision of the Revenue Tribunal have been dismissed summarily by this Court.

An elaborate argument was advanced before us on behalf of the petitioners by Mr. Paranjape and on behalf of the respondents by M/s. Gokhale and Vaidya on the question as to whether the Mamlatdar has power to grant relief against forfeiture where the tenant has sub-let any portion of the leased land without the permission of his landlord. It is, however, not necessary for us to deal with this matter upon the view which we have taken on the other point.

Another point taken by Mr. Paranjape was that the order of remand passed in his case by the Revenue Tribunal was erroneous. In our opinion, it is not necessary to deal with this point either, because, assuming that the order of remand is erroneous, the point which has now been raised before us, viz., the effect of sub-letting only a portion of the demised lands, could have been raised before us even if the Revenue Tribunal had not thought it fit to remand the case.

Upon this view, therefore, we discharge the rules and dismiss these petitions. Costs of these petitions will be borne as incurred.

Petitions dismissed.

HAJI SHEIKH HASANOO v. S. NATESA MUDLIAR ETC. & CO.*

Negotiable Instruments Act (XXVI of 1881), Sec. 84(1)—Draft drawn by one branch of bank on another branch thereof—Whether such draft a negotiable instrument—Applicability of s. 84(1).

Section 84(1) of the Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, is limited in its application to cheques and it does not apply to every negotiable instrument.

A draft drawn by one branch of a bank on another branch thereof is not a negotiable instrument.

M. J. Rice and Atta Mills v. Firm Ramlal, dissented from.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

V. M. Kulkarni, for the appellant.

B. B. Banade, for the respondent.

MUDHOLKAR J. This is a plaintiff's second appeal from the dismissal of his claim for the recovery of Rs. 1,367-8-0 alleged to be due to him from the respondent.

It is common ground that the appellant is a fruit seller carrying on business at Narkhed. The respondent carried on business of a broker in Madras. The appellant sent 485 baskets of oranges to Madras sometime in the year 1949 for being sold through the respondent. The latter submitted an account to the appellant on March 22, 1949, showing that the oranges had been disposed of for a sum of Rs. 1,585, and that after deducting the usual charges, a sum of Rs. 1,417-8-6 was found due to the appellant. A draft dated March 31, 1949, drawn by the Exchange Bank of India and Africa, Madras Branch, on its branch at Nagpur for the aforesaid amount was sent by the respondent to the appellant. The appellant tried to cash the draft, three weeks or so after he received the draft; the Bank having gone in liquidation in the meanwhile, he could not cash it. He, therefore, proceeded to Madras and handed over the draft to the respondent. According to the appellant, the respondent accepted that draft, paid a sum of Rs. 50 and promised to send him the balance shortly thereafter. While the respondent admits that the appellant handed over the draft to him, he says that his only object in taking the draft was to see what could be realised from the Bank and send to the appellant whatever was realised by him from the Bank. He also says that he gave Rs. 50 to the appellant when he visited Madras, because the appellant said that he was short of fund and had no money even to pay his railway fare for the return journey.

The trial Court decreed the suit. The lower appellate Court dismissed it on the ground that the appellant was guilty of delay in the presentation of the draft, that this delay on his part caused injury to the respondent and that, therefore, the latter was protected by s. 84 of the Negotiable Instruments Act. Upon this ground it dismissed the suit.

Section 84(1) of the Act reads thus:

"Where a cheque is not presented for payment within a reasonable time of its issue, and the drawer or person on whose account it is drawn had the right, at the time when presentment ought to have been made, as between himself and the banker, to have the cheques paid and suffers actual damage through the delay, he is discharged to the extent of such damage, that is to say, to the extent to which such drawer or

*Decided, March 23, 1959. Second Appeal No. 613 of 1954, against the decision of K.L. Pandey, First Additional District Judge at Nagpur, in Appeal No. 19-B of 1953, from the decision of S. R. Tiwari, Civil Judge, Class II, at Katol, in Civil Suit No. 6-B of 1952.

1 [1957] A. I. R. Assam. 133.

person is a creditor of the banker to a larger amount than he would have been if such cheque had been paid."

This provision is limited in its application to the cheques. If it was the intention of the Legislature to make it applicable to every negotiable instrument or to drafts drawn by one branch of a bank on another branch thereof, there was nothing easier for the Legislature than to use appropriate expressions. Indeed, when the provisions of s. 84 were enacted, the difference between the position of the drawer of a cheque and of the drawer of a negotiable instrument was present in the mind of the Legislature. It has been pointed out in Aggarwal's Law of Hundies and Negotiable Instruments, (1954 edn.) (p. 287):

"The position of the drawer of a cheque is different from that of the drawer of a bill on demand in one respect. The drawer of a bill on demand has given consideration to the drawee against which he is entitled to draw the bill and if it is not paid on presentation he has a right to sue the drawee on the original contract. He has also a right against the holder to be informed of the dishonour by a notice of dishonour within reasonable time. The drawer of a cheque on the other hand knows that the banker will not pay unless he has money of his (i.e. drawer) to pay with. He has no recourse to the drawee if the cheque is not paid when the funds are not sufficient. He remains liable on the cheque as principal debtor and yet has no remedy against any one. He is therefore bound to keep money at his bankers to meet the cheque whenever presented and it would be unfair if by reason of delay in presentation of the cheque on the part of the holder he should suffer loss of the money he was keeping at the bankers to meet it. That is the underlying principle of sections 72 and 84." Then again, the same author has pointed out

"Cheques are generally intended for immediate presentation and not for general circulation. Cheques are drawn against funds of the drawer in his bank. If the holder delays presentation and bank fails in the meanwhile the drawer might be seriously prejudiced thereby. Nor can the drawer be expected to retain his money in the bank at his risk for an indefinite time."

Dealing with the question of delay in presentment, Byles on Bills of Exchange, 21st edn., at page 21, has observed:

"A cheque, nevertheless, is virtually an appropriation of a sum of money in the banker's hands to lie till called for; but by delay the holder takes the risk of the bank's failure, the revocation of bank's authority to pay owing to the drawer's death, countermand of payment by the drawer or the exhaustion of the balance of further drawings."

Thus, the main reason for drawing a distinction between a cheque and an instrument of other kind is that if a cheque is drawn by a drawer on a bank he is forced to keep sufficient funds in that bank for enabling the person in whose favour he has drawn the cheque to cash it. As he has to keep his money tied up in that manner, he cannot properly withdraw it even if he knew that the condition of the bank was not satisfactory. It is for this reason necessary that cheques should be presented for payment without undue delay. That, however, is not the case with respect to demand drafts. Where, as here, the draft is one drawn by one branch of a bank on another branch thereof it cannot, by any stretch of imagination, even be suggested that the draft is a negotiable instrument. Nor again, can it be said that it is an instrument under which there is a remedy against the 'drawer' because in fact the drawer and the drawee are the same person.

Shri Ranade, who appears for the respondent, has referred to a decision of a Division Bench of the Assam High Court in M. J. Rice and Atta Mills v. Firm Ramlal.¹ In that case, the principles of s. 84 were applied to drafts and it was stated that a demand draft, which is very nearly allied to a cheque, should be presented for payment as early as possible, because delay in presentation in commercial practice might lead to complications and cause some loss or damage to the parties concerned. With respect to the learned Judges, I am unable to see how the provisions of s. 84 of the Negotiable Instruments Act could be extended to negotiable instruments other than cheques. Indeed, if the Court were to apply the provisions of s. 84 to negotiable instruments of other kinds, it would be legislating which, of course, it has no power to do. Again, as already stated, even if the principles underlying s. 84 could be applied to negotiable instruments generally, they certainly cannot be applied to a draft of the kind which we have in this case. As already pointed out, a draft drawn by one branch of a bank on another branch thereof is not a negotiable instrument at all. For all these reasons, disagreeing with the lower appellate Court, I hold that the delay in the presentation of the draft to the Nagpur branch of the Exchange Bank is not fatal to the appellant's suit.

It was next contended by Shri Ranade that the appellant having accepted the draft in payment of the amount due to him has no right of action for the price of oranges which he had sold through the respondent. Now, where money is due to a person from another, then the liability to pay that money can be discharged only by repaying it in cash unless the parties expressly agree to some other mode of discharging that liability. If the respondent's case was that the parties had agreed that the respondent's liability to pay the price would be deemed to have been satisfied by sending the draft to the appellant, the matter would have been different. There are no express pleadings of the respondent on the point. But even assuming that it can be deduced from the pleadings of the respondent that the appellant had agreed to accept, or had accepted, the draft in satisfaction of the amount due to him, no proof of this has been adduced by the respondent. In the circumstances, therefore, this contention fails.

Upon this view, I allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the lower appellate Court and restore that of the trial Court. Costs throughout shall be borne by the respondent.

Appeal allowed.

APPEAL FROM ORIGINAL CIVIL.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. H. K. Chinnani, Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice S. T. Desai.

THE BOMBAY MUNICIPAL CORPORATION v. RAMCHANDRA LAXMAN BELOSAY.*

Bombay Municipal Corporation Act (Bom. III of 1888), Secs. 63(b) & (k), 36(k)—Resolution moved in Corporation to express regret and horror at execution of foreign dignitary and his associates in foreign country—Resolution inter alia describing such persons as fighters for freedom of their country—Whether Corporation competent to discuss and pass such resolution—"Likely to promote public instruction", ambit of expression in s. 63(k)—Expression "business" in s. 36(k), meaning of—Court's power to hold municipal action invalid and ultra vires when to be exercised.

A resolution was moved at a meeting of the Bombay Municipal Corporation by a councillor of the Corporation under which it was sought to express deep regret and horror at the execution of one Imre Nagy a former Prime Minister of Hungary and his three associates. The resolution drew attention to the fact that these persons were "fighters for freedom of their motherland, who by displaying great courage and steadfastness even at the cost of their lives in the cause of their country's freedom have upheld the dignity of man and rendered great service to the highest value of life, viz. 'Freedom'." The resolution stressed that the executions were contrary to the doctrine of 'Panchshila' enunciated by the Prime Minister of India and practised by India and accepted by other countries of the world. Finally, by the resolution the Union Government was requested to communicate the same to the families of the late Imre Nagy and his associates with an expression of the Corporation's sympathy in their sad bereavement. On the question whether the action of the Corporation in discussing and passing this resolution would be ultra vires the Corporation:—

Held, that the ultimate decision whether a resolution proposed to be moved before a meeting of the Corporation is likely to promote instruction is, under the Act, entrusted to the Corporation and as no appeal is provided against its decision, the Court will not interfere if the question is arguable or if two views are possible, and that as in the instant case it was arguable that the resolution and the debate on it were likely to educate or instruct the public to love their country and to be ready to fight for its freedom, the resolution could not be said to be beyond the scope and ambit of the Act, and one which the Corporation could not discuss.

Daily Gazette v. Karachi Municipality,¹ referred to.

The expression "business" in s. 36(k) of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act, 1888, includes only that business which can be said to relate to municipal administration or Municipal Government of Greater Bombay.

The Court will not hold a municipal action invalid and ultra vires the powers of the municipality if it entertains a reasonable doubt on the point and deems the question as fairly and reasonably arguable on the ground that there is room for holding different opinions on the point. It will decline to issue its mandate unless it is satisfied that it is plain and palpable that the act complained of clearly and manifestly transcends the powers conferred on the municipality by statute.

Per S. T. Desai J. The resolution in question and discussion relating to it fall within the ambit of the expression "likely to promote public instruction" in s. 63(k) of the Act, and, therefore, the Bombay Municipal Corporation was competent to discuss and, if the majority of its councillors so decided, to pass the resolution.

The general rule is that the Court will not inquire into the policy, expediency or propriety of a municipal act, and while it has undoubted jurisdiction to determine whether a municipal act is ultra vires or not, it will not, in reviewing the vires of the act complained of, probe into the motive or purpose of those initiating or voting on the same.

Desai,† by which he directed the issue of a writ to appellant No. 1, the Bombay Municipal Corporation, hereinafter referred to as "the Corporation", requiring the Corporation to forbear from discussing a resolution, in regard to Mr. Imre Nagy and his associates, of which a notice had been given by a Councillor of the Corporation, Dr. R. N. Kulkarni. The resolution was in the following terms:

"That the Municipal Corporation of Greater Bombay have learnt with deep regret about the execution of Mr. Imre Nagy, a former Prime Minister of Hungary and his three associates contrary to the doctrine of 'Panchshila' enunciated by our beloved Prime Minister and practised by our country and accepted by other countries of the world. The Corporation hereby express their horror at the execution under peculiar conditions of those fighters for freedom of their motherland who, by displaying great courage and steadfastness even at the cost of their lives in the cause of their country's freedom have upheld the dignity of man and rendered great service to the highest value of life, viz. 'Freedom'. That the Mayor be requested to forward the Resolution through the State Government to the Union Government with a request to communicate the same to the Government of Hungary through the proper channels for being communicated to the families of the late Mr. Imre Nagy and his associates, with an expression of the Corporation's sympathy in their sad bereavement."

It was moved at a meeting of the Corporation held on July 10, 1958. A point of order was then raised that the Corporation had no power to discuss the resolution, as it was of a political nature and related to international affairs and as it had nothing to do with civic duties, which, it was said, must necessarily relate to the life and welfare of the citizens of Bombay. Appellant No. 2, who was the Mayor of the Corporation at that time and who was the Chairman of the meeting, then gave a considered and well reasoned ruling, by which he held that the resolution was in order. Thereafter the meeting of the Corporation was adjourned. On July 18, 1958, the respondent, who is also a Councillor of the Corporation, filed a petition, in which he contended that the action of the Corporation in discussing and passing the above resolution would be ultra vires the Corporation. He, therefore, prayed for the issue of a writ of mandamus or prohibition or any other appropriate writ, direction or order, under art. 226 of the Constitution, against the appellants, restraining the Corporation from discussing or endorsing the said resolution. The petition was opposed by the appellants. They contended that the Corporation had the right and the power to discuss and pass the said resolution under cl. (k) of s. 36 and cl. (k) of s. 63 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act, hereinafter referred to as "the Act". The appellants' contentions were not accepted by Mr. Justice K. T. Desai. He came to the conclusion that the resolution proposed was beyond the ambit and powers of the Corporation. He, therefore, issued a writ restraining the Corporation from discussing the said resolution or passing the same. This order is being challenged in the present appeal.

The Bombay Municipal Corporation is constituted by the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act (Bombay Act No. III of 1888). Being a creature of statute, its powers are limited by the provisions of the Act, by which it is created. It can, therefore, exercise only such powers as are specifically conferred upon it by or under the Act, or as are consequential to or incidental to the exercise of such powers. This position was not disputed during the course of arguments. It is, therefore, not necessary to cite any authority. I may, however, refer to the following passage from Halsbury's Laws of England, para. 129 in Vol. IX, Third edn.:

"Statutory Corporations. The powers of a corporation created by statute are limited and circumscribed by the statutes which regulate it, and extend no further than is expressly stated therein, or is necessarily and properly required for carrying into effect the purposes of its incorporation, or may be fairly regarded as incidental to, or consequential upon, those things which the legislature has authorised. What the statute does not expressly or impliedly authorise is to be taken to be prohibited."

It is, therefore, necessary to consider the relevant provisions of the Act. The preamble to the Act states that it was enacted "to consolidate and amend the law relating to the municipal government of Greater Bombay." Section 4 of the Act specifies seven municipal authorities, which are charged with carrying out the provisions of the Act. Clause (a) mentions the Corporation as being one of these authorities. The powers and functions of each of these authorities are specified in different provisions of the Act. Sub-section (1) of s. 5 states that the Corporation shall consist of one hundred and thirty-one councillors. Sub-section (2) of this section provides:

"The corporation shall by the name of 'The Municipal Corporation of Greater Bombay', be a body corporate and have perpetual succession and a common seal and by such name may sue and be sued."

Section 36 states:

"The Corporation shall meet for the despatch of business and shall from time to time make such regulations with respect to the summoning, notice, place, management and adjournment of such meetings, and generally with respect to the mode of transacting and managing the business of the corporation including the submission, asking and answering of questions under section 66A as they think fit, subject to the following conditions:—...

(k) any councillor who desires at any meeting to bring forward any business, other than any questions under section 66A or to make any substantive proposition, which is not already specified in the notice of such meeting, shall give written notice of the same to the municipal secretary at least three clear days before the day fixed for the meeting; and a supplementary announcement of the business or propositions, of which notice has been so given, shall be given by the said secretary in not less than one local daily newspaper not later than the day previous to the meeting;"

The appellants rely on this provision in support of their contention that the Corporation is entitled to discuss the said resolution. Chapter III of the Act contains provisions relating to the duties and powers of the municipal authorities. Section 61 gives a list of obligatory duties of the Corporation for which, it is, as stated in the section, incumbent on the Corporation to make adequate provision by any means or measures, which it is lawfully competent to them to use or to take. One of these duties, referred to in cl. (g) of the section, is to maintain, aid and suitably accommodate schools for primary education. Section 63 specifies what are called discretionary duties of the Corporation, in regard to which the Corporation have discretion. The section states:

"The corporation may, in their discretion, provide from time to time, either wholly or partly, for all or any of the following matters, namely:—...

(b) the furtherance of educational objects other than those mentioned in clause (g) of section 61;...

(k) any measure, not hereinbefore specifically named, likely to promote public safety, health, convenience or instruction.

And, with the previous sanction of the State Government, the corporation may make—

(l) such contribution as they think fit towards any public ceremony or entertainment in Greater Bombay."

The provision contained in cl. (k) is strongly relied upon by the appellants in the present appeal. Sub-section (1) of s. 64 provides that the respective functions of the several municipal authorities shall be such as are specifically prescribed in or under the Act. Sub-section (2) of s. 64 states that "except as in this Act otherwise expressly provided, the municipal government of Greater Bombay vests in the corporation." Sub-section (1) of s. 66A provides:

"Subject to any regulations made in this behalf under section 38, a councillor may question the Commissioner who shall answer any question concerning or connected with the administration of this Act or the municipal government of Greater Bombay."

This provision draws a distinction between the administration of the Act and municipal government.

The learned Solicitor General, who has argued this appeal on behalf of the appellants, has urged that the words "municipal government", for the carrying on of which the Corporation has been created, are very wide and that the Corporation is, therefore, concerned not only with providing physical comforts, such as sanitation, lights and water, but with all matters affecting the life and well-being of the persons residing in Greater Bombay. He has also contended that by the resolution it was intended to place before the people an example of a great fighter for freedom and that that by itself would be education or instruction to the people, within the meaning of cls. (b) and (k) of s. 63 of the Act. The words "educational objects" used in cl. (b) and "instruction" used in cl. (k) are words of very wide import. Webster's Dictionary defines "education" as totality of information and qualities acquired through instruction and training which further the development of an individual physically, mentally and bodily. In Murray's Dictionary, the word "instruction" is defined as meaning imparting knowledge or skill, education, information. The word "instruct" is defined as meaning to furnish knowledge or information, to train in knowledge or learning, to teach, to educate. Our notions, as to what constitutes education, have also changed. Formerly, a person was regarded as educated, if he knew the three Rs—Reading, Writing and 'Rithmetic. Today, education embraces a much wider field. Any teaching or training, which furthers or brings about the physical, mental, moral or spiritual development of an individual, is regarded as education. Education may also be imparted in civic rights and responsibilities, or in order that people might cherish certain ideals or imbibe certain qualities. In a democratic country, it may well be regarded as part of education to teach people to love their country, to cherish freedom, to hate oppression and rule by foreigners and to be ready and willing to undergo hardship and suffering for maintaining the freedom of the country.

One of the recognised ways of educating people is to place before them examples of persons, who have achieved fame and distinction in life. School text books frequently contain stories or articles about lives of great men. These are taught, so that they may inspire the readers to acquire the same qualities and to try and reach the same heights. It is also not necessary that education or instruction should be imparted only in schools and colleges or other institutions. It may also be given through newspapers, cinema shows, public lectures, seminars and public debates. The meetings of the Corporation are open to the public under cl. (e) of s. 36. A debate on a matter of public importance in a Corporation may, therefore, also have an educative value.

The resolution, the validity of which has been challenged, describes the late Mr. Imre Nagy and his three associates as fighters for freedom for their motherland, as persons who even at the cost of their lives displayed great courage and steadfastness in the cause of their country's freedom, and as persons who upheld the dignity of man and rendered great service to the highest value of life, viz., freedom. By eulogising them and by expressing the Corporation's regret at their executions, the resolution places before the public examples and ideals which they may emulate. It is, therefore, urged that the resolution and the debate on it would educate the public and instruct them to cherish the ideals of freedom, to love their country and to be ever ready to sacrifice even their lives for the freedom of the country. I cannot say that this argument is without force.

The words in cl. (k) of s. 63 are "likely to promote instruction". The authorities competent to decide whether a resolution, proposed to be moved at a meeting of the Corporation, is likely to promote public instruction, are firstly the Mayor or the Chairman of the meeting, who has to determine whether the resolution is in order and thereafter the Corporation, which may pass or reject the resolution. The ultimate decision in the matter is entrusted by the Legislature to the Corporation. The Corporation is, therefore, the best judge of what is likely to promote public instruction. No appeal is provided against its decision. The Court will, therefore, not interfere merely because it takes a view different from that taken by the Corporation. If the question is arguable or if two views are possible, the Court will decline to exercise its powers, for it cannot then be definitely stated that the Corporation is transgressing the limits of its powers. The Court will intervene only when it is shown that the resolution, which the Corporation proposes to discuss or pass, cannot reasonably be said to be within the scope and ambit of the Act.

In this case it is at least arguable that the resolution and the debate on it are likely to educate or instruct the public to love their country and to be ready to fight for its freedom. The learned Judge has also observed in his judgment that the debate on the resolution may be educative. He however took the view that the resolution was outside the ambit of the Corporation's powers, as its object was political and not educational. With respect, it seems to me that the object or motive, which led the author of the resolution to propose it, is entirely immaterial. The Corporation consists of 131 councillors and different councillors may support the resolution for different reasons. What one is really concerned with is the effect of the resolution, whether it is or is not likely to promote public instruction. If it cannot even reasonably be said that the resolution might promote public instruction, it would be outside the scope of the Act. But, as I have already stated, I do not think I can say that the argument that the resolution is likely to promote public instruction, is without substance. Consequently, the resolution cannot be said to be beyond the scope and ambit of the Act, or one which the Corporation cannot discuss. The order passed by Mr. Justice Desai cannot, therefore, be upheld.

The only reported case, in which a somewhat similar question came up for consideration, is Daily Gazette v. Karachi Municipality.¹ This case does not decide the question which we have to determine. There are observations in it on which either party might rely. In his judgment Rupchand Bellaram A. J. C. has observed as follows (p. 295)

"There is no doubt in my mind that the main object for which powers of Local Self-Government are transferred to Municipal Corporations under this Act is that the city fathers should look after the health of the city and the comfort and well-being of its residents. But I am not prepared to hold that for the attainment of public objects it may not in certain instances be necessary or in any case be not proper for them to discuss political subjects or that the discussion on such subjects is ultra vires."

With respect, I agree with these observations.

Mr. Rajni Patel pointed out to us that the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act and the Bombay District Municipal Act contain provisions similar to those contained in cl. (k) of s. 63. I realise that the view, which I am taking, might result in the Municipalities spending their limited time and money on matters, with which they are not really concerned. If this, unfortunately, happens, it will be for the Legislature to consider whether some limitations should not be imposed on the powers of the Municipalities to discuss matters, which have no direct bearing on municipal administration.

In the view which I am taking, it is not necessary to deal with other questions, which have been raised before us. But as they have been argued, I will refer to them briefly. It was urged that under cl. (k) of s. 36 the Corporation is entitled to discuss a resolution on any subject, whether it relates or does not relate to municipal administration or municipal government. The heading of s. 36 is "Proceedings of the Corporation". It is a procedural section, which provides for the mode and the manner in which business may be brought before the Corporation and in which it is to be transacted. I agree with the view taken by Mr. Justice Desai that this is not a section to which reference can be made for the purpose of determining what is the business of the Corporation, or what are its powers and functions. The expression "business" will include only that business which can be said to relate to municipal administration or municipal government of Greater Bombay. A corporator cannot also ask the Corporation to discuss any resolution which he likes. The proposition, which he is entitled to make before any meeting of the Corporation, must also be such as relates to the business of the Corporation. It must, therefore, be on a subject, which has a bearing directly or indirectly on the municipal administration or municipal government of Greater Bombay.

Reference was made in the course of arguments to art. 12 of the Constitution. This is the first article in Part III, which contains provisions relating to fundamental rights, and it states that in this Part the "State" includes all local authorities. This definition is for the purpose of ensuring that even the local authorities, which perform certain functions of government, do not contravene the fundamental rights of citizens and for enabling citizens to obtain relief against the violation of these rights. This article has, therefore, no bearing on the question which we have to determine in this appeal. Article 51, to which also a reference was made, is also not of any assistance in this case.

The Solicitor General referred us to the compilation exh. No. 1, containing numerous resolutions passed by the Corporation on matters not connected with municipal government. He urged that the practice followed by the Corporation over a number of years, in regard to the categories of matters which would fall under cl. (k) of s. 63, must be considered by us for the purpose of construing the general words used in this clause. We are unable to accept this argument. The Corporation cannot, by following a wrong practice, confer upon itself powers which it does not possess.

It was also urged that the Court can only interfere with an act of the Corporation and that until the resolution had been discussed and passed, it cannot be said that the Corporation had done any act, which it was not competent to do and which was ultra vires. This Court can, however, grant relief not only after damage has been done, but even when there is reasonable likelihood of damage being done. If, therefore, I had come to the conclusion that the said resolution was beyond the powers of the Corporation, I would have upheld the order passed by Mr. Justice Desai.

Mr. Rajni Patel urged that the resolution might embarrass Government in its relations with certain foreign States. He pointed out to us that the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act was passed in 1882 under the provisions of the Indian Councils Act, 1861, cl. (8) in s. 43† of which debarred the Governor-in-Council from making any law affecting relations with foreign States. There is, however, no provision in the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act, which debars the Corporation from discussing a matter, on the ground that it relates to an occurrence in a foreign State or on the ground that it might affect relations with foreign States. But every resolution must be within the scope and ambit of the Act. If, therefore, it can reasonably be said to relate to municipal government or municipal administration of Greater Bombay, its discussion cannot be prevented, merely because it may not be to the liking of some persons in some foreign States.

I would, therefore, set aside the order passed by Mr. Justice K. T. Desai and dismiss the petition filed by the respondent. As the case has been fought more or less as a test case and in order to obtain a decision in regard to the powers of the Corporation in certain matters, I would make no order as to costs of this appeal.

S. T. DESAI J. I agree that this appeal must succeed but prefer to found myself primarily on the ground that the resolution in question and discussion relating to the same fall within the ambit of the expression "likely to promote public instruction" in s. 63(k) of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act. The facts in this rather extraordinary case are plain and it is unnecessary to recapitulate them. Nor is it necessary for me to restate the sections the relevant parts of which have been set out in the judgment just delivered by my Lord the Chief Justice. The question that arises for our determination lies in a narrow compass and we have to ascertain whether it was within or without the ambit and scope of the powers of the Bombay Municipal Corporation to discuss and if the majority of its councillors so decided to pass a resolution expressing deep regret and horror at the execution of Mr. Imre Nagy, a former Prime Minister of Hungary, and his three associates. The resolution draws attention to the fact that these persons were "fighters for freedom of their motherland, who by displaying great courage and steadfastness even at the cost of their lives in the cause of their country's freedom have upheld the dignity of man and rendered great service to the highest value of life, viz. 'Freedom'." The resolution stresses that the executions were contrary to the doctrine of 'Panchshila' enunciated by the Prime Minister of India and practised by our country and accepted by other countries of the world. Finally,

† "43. It shall not be lawful for the Governor in Council of either of the aforesaid Provinces, except with the sanction of the Governor General, previously communicated to him, to make regulations or to take into consideration any Law or Regulation for any of the purposes next hereinafter mentioned; that is to say,...

8. Affecting the relations of the Government with Foreign Princes or States;"

by the resolution the Union Government is requested to communicate the same to the families of the late Mr. Imre Nagy and his associates with an expression of the Corporation's sympathy in their sad bereavement. The petitioner, who is one of the councillors of the Corporation, applied to the Court and sought relief by way of a writ of mandamus restraining the corporation from discussing and endorsing the resolution and his grievance was that his personal and other rights were threatened and would be seriously affected if the resolution were to be discussed and passed. His contention was that the Corporation had no right or power to discuss the resolution. The learned Judge has expressed the opinion that the debate on the resolution might be educative but that was not its object and purpose. In his view the main object of the resolution was to condemn the action of certain authorities outside India and was political and not educational and he has observed:

"What has to be seen in each case is the object of the resolution. If the object of the resolution falls outside the ambit of municipal government, then it cannot be brought within its ambit merely because there would be incidental instruction resulting therefrom."

The learned Judge reached the conclusion that this was a fit case for intervention of the Court and directed the issuance of a writ of mandamus requiring the Corporation to forbear from discussing the resolution at a meeting of the Corporation or passing the same and the Corporation and its Mayor have come before us in this appeal.

It has been contended for the appellants by the learned Solicitor General that the trial Court was in error in approaching the case by examining the motive and object of the resolution and he referred to the following observations of Lord Sumner in *Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Fisher's Executors*¹ (p. 411):

"...In any case desires and intentions are things of which a company is incapable. These are the mental operations of its shareholders and officers. The only intention, that the company has, is such as is expressed in or necessarily follows from its proceedings. It is hardly a paradox to say that the form of a company's resolutions and instruments is their substance."

As a general rule, the motive or object of the governing body of a Corporation or the Corporation itself in passing a resolution does not affect its validity. There is no question here of there having been any fraud or mala fides. The general rule is that the Court will not inquire into the policy, expediency or propriety of a municipal act, and while it has undoubted jurisdiction to determine whether a municipal act is ultra vires or not, it will not, in reviewing the vires of the act complained of, probe into the motive or purpose of those initiating or voting on the same. But I need not dwell on the point at any length since Mr. Rajani Patel, learned counsel for the respondents, has not supported before us this line of approach and has confined his arguments to the meaning and effect of the resolution and construction of the relevant provisions and particularly s. 63(k) of the Act.

On the principal question relating to the power of the Corporation to discuss and adopt the resolution the arguments before us on either side have proceeded on the footing that the following statement in Halsbury's Laws of England correctly analyses the decisions of Courts in England on the subject and accurately summarises the legal position:—

"The powers of a Corporation created by statute are limited and circumscribed by the statutes which regulate it, and extend no further than is expressly stated therein, or is necessarily and properly required for carrying into effect the purposes of its incorporation, or may be fairly regarded as incidental to, or consequential upon, those things which the Legislature has authorised. What the statute does not expressly or impliedly authorise is to be taken to be prohibited." (Halsbury, 3rd edn., Vol. IX, p. 62).

The principal argument pressed before us on behalf of the appellants has been that the act of discussion and adoption of the resolution could be fairly regarded as incidental to the right and power to give instruction which is a matter within the competence of the Corporation under s. 63(k) of the Act. It has been urged by the learned Solicitor General that the question posed before the Court has to be approached from a wider angle. The municipal government with which the Corporation is charged is not to be confined to provision of physical comforts of the citizen and that civic rights and responsibilities and public instruction in a broad sense are as much of concern to the municipality. The argument proceeded that wide meaning should be given to the term "public instruction", and if this were done, there was no reason why the resolution should not be read as relating to an exemplar or parallel instance afforded by the conduct of persons who had displayed great courage and steadfastness and sacrificed their lives in the cause of their country's freedom and upheld the dignity of man. This, it was said, was the substance of the resolution, and if there was any verbiage in it, that could have been altered or amended by the Councillors in the course of the discussion on the same. The greatest stress was laid on the ambit of the words "any measure...likely to promote public instruction", and the argument proceeded that this was a matter to be provided for by the Corporation at its discretion and the Court should not take upon itself the burden of deciding the way in which that decision should be exercised by the Corporation. It was also urged that the writ of mandamus should not issue if it appeared to the Court that it was doubtful and reasonably arguable as to whether the discussion and passing of the resolution should be regarded as a measure likely to promote public instruction. In such a case the Corporation would be the right person to decide the point and it must be left to the Mayor or Chairman and ultimately to the Corporation to do so.

The contention pressed before us by learned counsel for the respondent was that powers of a statutory Corporation cannot be merely a matter of inference and must be gathered from the provisions of the statute creating it and that the powers must bear a fair relation to municipal government. Then it was said that even in matters of discretion there must be a reasonable exercise of the same; it must not be arbitrary or capricious. I agree that such is the undoubted legal position. The argument of counsel was that if the resolution had to come within the ambit of the powers of the Corporation in regard to public instruction, the effect of the resolution and the discussion on the same must have some relationship to public instruction. So far I am in agreement with learned counsel. Then he contended that the passing of the resolution did not at all lead to any public instruction. The argument was stressed in the form of an interrogation—Where is education? It was urged that the expressions 'education' and 'instruction' meant that there should be something systematic about the same and not anything casual. The argument proceeded that there was not even casual instruction and that the element of instruction was wholly lacking. It was something extraneous to public instruction and was characterised as public embarrassment.

With regard to the effect of the statute which gives powers to carry out some object or objects such for instance as municipal government which it is assumed will benefit the public at large, one of the most important rules indubitably is that the municipality or corporation must not exercise that power otherwise than for the purposes of the Act. It is its bounden duty to keep within those powers and not to be guided by any fanciful or capricious views of its own. The principle is sound and it is firmly established as emerges from the decisions cited under the statement of the law in Halsbury's Laws of England to which I have already made reference. It also emerges from those decisions that the doctrine of ultra vires ought to be reasonably understood and applied, and that whatever may be fairly regarded as incidental to or germane to those things which the Legislature has authorised, ought not (unless expressly prohibited) to be held, by judicial construction to be ultra vires. In the present context the doctrine of ultra vires, which looms large in modern disputes must, in my judgment, turn upon the proper mode of applying this principle to the ramification of the public body.

In a democratic State there must of necessity be considerable regulation of human affairs by independent bodies such as municipal corporations on whom powers are conferred by statute and the Court would show liberality in upholding the exercise of such powers and would confine its interference to cases where the act complained of clearly and manifestly transcends those powers. The same principle which empowers the Court to issue a writ of mandamus and command a public body to whom it is addressed to perform some public or quasi public legal duty which it has refused to perform or to forbear from doing some specific act also requires that the mandamus must issue having regard to its purpose which is to supply defects of justice and to the end that justice may be done. The powers of the Court, as has so often been laid down, are indubitably very wide. The Court holds a strict hand in exercising those powers. But somewhat paradoxical though it may perhaps seem that is the very reason for staying its hand in exercising those powers except in cases where it is plainly and clearly incumbent on the public body to do or forbear from doing any specific act. There is more reason for the exercise of the restraint when the act of the public body in respect of which forbearance on its part is sought relates to a matter of discretionary powers. And there is, to my mind, all the more reason for the exercise of this restraint when in addition to forbearance from doing any specific act, aid of the Court is sought for the purpose of a command to such public body to refrain from any discussion whatever leading upto the act, to the legality of which objection is taken. If a public body is to function on democratic principles it must necessarily have the right of discussion to a relatively high degree. Of course, there are corresponding obligations to the exercise of this right of discussion which require respect for law and constitutional procedure. It is in the light of these few observations that I turn to examine the very short but important question which we have to determine in this appeal.

The main point of this appeal turns on the construction of a very few words in s. 63 of the Act. The relevant part of the section so strongly relied on by the learned Solicitor General is:

"The Corporation may, in their discretion, provide from time to time, either wholly or partly, for... any measure... likely to promote public... instruction."

Section 63(k) of the Act, as I read it, confers on the Corporation inter alia wide discretionary power to adopt any means or measure wholly or partly in respect of any matter which is likely to promote public instruction. The language used is of amplitude and wide import. The modern conception of public instruction or public education is not limited to the provision of schools or other educational institutions for traditional scholastic attainments nor is it confined to subjects on which knowledge was imparted in such institutions in the past. It comprises subjects and matters as varied as the needs of the individuals that make up a State and permits of freedom in methods and content.

At one time reference to dictionaries was deprecated by Courts for the reason that they were somewhat delusive guides in the construction of any term or expression in a statute. The more recent trend, however, is that in case of words which are to be interpreted in their ordinary sense, the Court can turn to well-known and standard dictionaries to gather their ordinary signification though it will not refer to them as authoritative exponents of the meaning of statutory expressions. 'Instruction' according to Webster means knowledge or discipline acquired by way of education. One of the meanings of 'Education' in that dictionary is the totality of the information and qualities acquired through instruction and training which further the development of an individual physically, mentally and morally.

The range of public instruction or education to-day is as wide as interests of mankind. In a modern democratic country anything which provides civilizing exposure through which the potential capacities of individuals are developed intellectually, culturally, morally or spiritually are within its range; and freedom and liberty are recognized under it as fundamental and inalienable rights. Our knowledge like our culture is a synthesis or at least an aggregation of all these and diverse other elements which throng the educational mould. It seems difficult, therefore, to give, even in the context of municipal law, a definition exclusive or inclusive which will aptly meet every particular act of public instruction that can be done by a public body and not fail in some circumstances; and it seems still more difficult to list measures which can or cannot be regarded as likely to promote public instruction. The method and content of these must necessarily vary and each case would turn on its own facts and other circumstances relevant to the inquiry and current standards of conformity. In deciding whether a particular act of a public body is likely to promote public instruction, within the meaning of that expression in s. 63(k) of the Act, the Court would take care to see that it does not extend to ground foreign to the purposes of the enactment. The Court would also have regard to the elasticity inherent in the language of that section and see that nothing is excluded from the operation of the enactment which on a fair reading of it is within the expansive range of that provision.

I do not, therefore, linger longer with the wide connotation which must be given to the sub-section under consideration in the context of municipal government. Imparting of knowledge or information pertaining to the cause of freedom or liberty (liberty of thought, expression, belief, faith and worship are enshrined in our Constitution) by any appropriate method would, in my judgment, be an act likely to promote public instruction. The resolution, to the substance of which I have made reference at the beginning of my judgment, shows sympathy with and eulogizes fighters for freedom who are said to have sacrificed their lives in the cause of freedom of their motherland. I may observe that the correctness of any of the facts mentioned in the resolution was not challenged by the petitioner in the petition and his sole grievance was that it was beyond the authority and jurisdiction of the Corporation to discuss the resolution. In the petition it has been alleged that the resolution related to international affairs. It was urged before us on behalf of the respondents on this aspect of the matter that foreign policy was within the exclusive purview of the Union Government. I agree that such is the sound constitutional position. It is well established that every statute should be so interpreted and applied, as far as its language admits, as not to be inconsistent with the comity of nations or with the established principles of international law. A rule of international law may serve as an aid to construction of any ambiguous provision in a statute though, of course, it cannot control the plain meaning of an enactment. The Court, it has been said, may recoil, in case of ambiguity from a construction which would involve a breach of the ascertained and accepted rules of international law. No argument, however, has been advanced before us to show how the resolution, intermeddles with the foreign policy of our country or goes counter to any rule of international law. I need hardly observe that it would not be within the competence of a public body like the Municipal Corporation to discuss, under the guise of public instruction, the foreign policy of our country.

In the course of the arguments at the Bar in answer to a question put by me, learned counsel for the respondents agreed that it would be within the competence of the Corporation to establish an institution such as a school of international relations. One of the arguments urged on behalf of the appellants was that it was within the powers of the Corporation to hold an educational symposium in which international questions could be discussed by dignitaries from various foreign countries. To this illustration no objection could be taken by counsel on behalf of the respondents. The argument based on this illustration was stressed in the form of an interrogation. If a foreign dignitary who had taken part in such educational discussions at the symposium were to sacrifice his life in the cause of liberty of his country, would it be beyond the competence of the Corporation to pass a resolution of condolence extolling his conduct? The argument was that a resolution of condolence expressing regret at the death of a foreign dignitary in the cause of freedom of his country and in praise of him would in any such or even otherwise (without there having been any such symposium) be within the powers of the Corporation and should be regarded by the Court as an act aimed at imparting knowledge and information and as one which would serve as an exemplar of sacrifice in the cause of liberty. There is to my mind substance in this argument. And the considerations postulated apart, I am of the opinion that the resolution under consideration is an exemplar or parallel instance of sacrifices in the cause of liberty and freedom of one's country made in other parts of the world. The method and content of a measure which is likely to promote public instruction must, as I have already pointed out, necessarily vary in different cases and the Court will have regard to the facts and circumstances of each particular case in deciding whether the resolution in question and discussions on the same can on a fair reading of the resolution be said to be beyond the range or domain of public instruction in the context of municipal law. Moreover, it is a vital consideration that in interpreting s. 63(k) we have to attach due and adequate importance to the word 'likely' in it. Having regard to all these considerations and for reasons I have already discussed I have reached the conclusion that the resolution under consideration and discussion on the same relate to a matter within the ambit of the expression "any measure likely to promote public instruction" and the ambit of the powers of the Corporation.

In the course of his arguments the learned Solicitor General stated that it was also one of the appellant's contentions that the Corporation had the power to discuss anything and everything under the sun and that he did not abandon that contention. He also stated that in the present case it was not necessary for him to go as far as that. I do not, therefore, feel called upon to repel that contention since no argument has been urged before us in support of the claim for such unlimited and unbridled powers. On the other hand it was said on behalf of the respondents that to give a wide interpretation to s. 63(k), such as I am inclined to do, would permit the Corporation to discuss anything under the guise of public instruction and intermeddle in affairs of the State and matters of foreign relations of our country. I am unable to share this apprehension because the act said to be likely to promote public instruction can only be upheld if it is not outside the matrix of municipal government. I need not repeat what I have already said on this aspect of the matter. Of course, I do not intend to be understood to say that the Corporation can under the guise of public instruction discuss matters, such for instance, as affairs of the State or of the Union or the foreign policy of the Union Government. It cannot encroach upon matters of this nature nor matters affecting the political foundations of the country. True, the ambit of s. 63(k) permits of discussion about many matters under the head "likely to promote public instruction". Nemo constat there are many matters which would clearly lie outside the scope of that provision on the ground that they do not bear a fair and reasonable relation to municipal government and the purposes of the Act.

There remains for consideration one more argument urged before us on behalf of the appellants. I agree with my Lord the Chief Justice that no mandamus would issue in respect of an act on which two views are possible for it cannot then be definitely stated that the Corporation is transgressing the limits of its powers. But as I have already observed I prefer to found myself primarily on the ground that the resolution in question and discussion relating to the same fall within the ambit of the powers conferred on the Corporation by s. 63(k) of the Act. Had I taken a different view on this question of construction I would have yet held that this was not a fit case for issuance of a writ of mandamus. The Court will not hold a municipal action invalid and ultra vires the powers of the municipality if it entertains a reasonable doubt on the point and deems the question as fairly and reasonably arguable on the ground that there is room for holding different opinions on the point. It will decline to issue its mandate unless it is satisfied that it is plain and palpable that the act complained of clearly and manifestly transcends the powers conferred on the Municipality by statute.

It is not necessary for me to discuss some other arguments which were advanced before us and which have been indicated in the judgment delivered by my Lord the Chief Justice. I agree with the views expressed by him on those points. In the result I agree that the order passed by Mr. Justice K. T. Desai should be set aside. I also agree that there should be no order as to costs of this appeal.

Appeal allowed.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

[NAGPUR BENCH]

Before Mr. Justice Kotval.

BAKDE.*

Representation of the People (Second Amendment) Act (XXVII of 1956), Sec. 74(2) —Central Provinces and Berar Municipalities Act (II of 1922), Secs. 12(3) (d), 14(1), 15(3)—General Clauses Act (X of 1897), Sec. 6—Whether s. 74(2) of Act XXVII of 1956 retrospective in its operation—Section 12(3) (d) of Act II of 1922 whether refers only to disqualification imposed in respect of municipal elections or elections to local bodies.

Section 74(2) of the Representation of the People (Second Amendment) Act, 1956, was retrospective in operation and removed even the disqualifications incurred by a person prior to the coming into force of that Act on August 28, 1956.

The provisions of s. 12(3)(d) of the Central Provinces and Berar Municipalities Act, 1922, refer not only to a disqualification imposed in respect of municipal elections or elections to local bodies but also to a disqualification imposed in respect of elections to State Legislative bodies or to Parliament.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

V. M. Kulkarni, for the applicant.

B. B. Mandlikar, for the opponent.

KOTVAL J. This is an application for revision under s. 20A(5) of the Central Provinces and Berar Municipalities Act and it raises a somewhat interesting and important question as to the construction and effect of s. 74(2) of the Representation of the People Act (Act XXVII of 1956).

The question arises in the following circumstances. The applicant Sadasheo Jagannath Barapatre had at one time stood for election to the former Madhya Pradesh Legislative Assembly and had been disqualified under the then existing provisions of s. 143 read with s. 7, cl.(c), of the Representation of the People Act, 1950 (Act XLIII of 1951). The notification (No. 69-453), dated September 1, 1953, issued in this behalf by the Election Commission of India was published in the then Madhya Pradesh Gazette of September 10, 1953. The disqualification mentioned in the notification under the said sections read with r. 114, sub-r. (5), of the Representation of the People Rules, 1951, was from voting at any election for a period of five years from the date by which the return was required to be lodged. The date of the filing of the return as stated in the notification, was March 24, 1952, and, therefore, the applicant Sadasheo was, upon the notification, disqualified from voting till March 24, 1957.

After the incurring of this disqualification by the applicant, there were held municipal elections for filling up the membership of the Municipal Committee of Khapa in Saoner tahsil. The relevant dates of the election programme in connection with this election were as follows:—

The last date for nomination		28-9-55
The date for scrutiny of the nominations.		6-10-55
The last date for withdrawal		10-10-55

Before the date of withdrawal of nominations, the non-applicant Hemaji apparently withdrew his candidature, and, therefore, the applicant Sadasheo was declared elected. Shortly after the publication of the results, however, the non-applicant Hemaji filed an election petition under s. 20A(2) of the Central Provinces and Berar Municipalities Act, seeking to set aside the election of the applicant. Hemaji alleged that he had never withdrawn his candidature and that the so-called withdrawal application was a forged document. He, therefore, prayed that he had been wrongly declared to have withdrawn and the applicant could not have been declared elected. He also urged that the applicant had incurred a disqualification from voting by virtue of the notification of the Election Commission, referred to above, that, therefore, the applicant was not qualified to stand for election as a member at all and that his election should be declared void and the non-applicant Hemaji should be declared elected.

The election petition came up for hearing before the 1st Civil Judge, Nagpur, and the Civil Judge held that Hemaji's withdrawal application was a forged application and, therefore, his nomination was not validly withdrawn. The Civil Judge also held the other grounds urged in Hemaji's election petition in his favour, and held that the applicant Sadasheo had incurred a disqualification within the meaning of s. 12(3)(d) of the Central Provinces and Berar Municipalities Act, read with s. 15(j) thereof and that, therefore, his election was void and ought to be set aside. The Civil Judge declared Hemaji as having been duly elected as a member for Ward No. 8.

On behalf of Sadasheo, the applicant in revision, the finding as to the withdrawal of the nomination of Hemaji has not been challenged, but what has been challenged before me is the finding given that Sadasheo had incurred a disqualification for voting and so could not stand for election as a member and, therefore, his election was void.

In order to appreciate the contentions raised on behalf of the applicant it is necessary to state the relevant provisions of law. Section 12, sub-ss. (1) and (2), of the Municipalities Act prescribes the qualifications which entitle a person to vote at a municipal election. Sub-section (3) thereof prescribes the disqualifications and particularly sub-s. (3), cl. (d), is relevant in the instant case. Sub-section 3(d) runs as follows:—

"Notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (1) or sub-section (2), no person shall be entitled to vote at any election if— . . .

(d) he is subject to any disqualification which may be imposed in this behalf by any law for the time being in force."

Section 14(1) requires that a candidate for election in a ward shall be a resident within the limits of the municipality and shall be qualified as a voter on the electoral roll of the ward of such a municipal committee. Therefore, if a candidate standing for election in a ward is not qualified to be a voter, he cannot stand for election.

Section 15(j) runs as follows:—

"No person shall be eligible for election or nomination as a member of a committee, if such person— . . ."

(j) is, under the provisions of any law for the time being in force, ineligible to be a member of any local authority;"

The Civil Judge held that by virtue of the provisions of s. 12(3)(d) read with s. 14(1), and the notification issued under s. 143 of the Representation of the People Act, 1951, the applicant was disqualified because that notification showed that a disqualification had been imposed upon the applicant. The order refers to s. 143 of the Representation of the People Act and the notification issued thereunder and holds that this disqualification was a disqualification imposed by the law for the time being in force within the meaning of s. 12(3)(d) of the Municipalities Act. The applicant was, therefore, disqualified for standing for election.

Mr. V. M. Kulkarni on behalf of the applicant has substantially raised two contentions against the order of the Civil Judge. His first contention has been that s. 12(3)(d) refers to a disqualification imposed "in this behalf" by any law for the time being in force, and according to Mr. Kulkarni "in this behalf" means a disqualification imposed "in behalf of the municipal elections or elections to local bodies", but it cannot mean a disqualification which may be imposed under law relating to elections to State Legislature or Houses of Parliament. Mr. Kulkarni then invited attention to the provisions of s. 74 of the Representation of the People (Second Amendment) Act, 1956 (XXVII of 1956) and he urged that by virtue of s. 74(2) the alleged disqualification against the applicant had ceased consequent upon the repeal of s. 143 of the Representation of the People Act of 1951, and, therefore, the Civil Judge was in error in holding the applicant disqualified on that ground.

To the second contention raised by Mr. Kulkarni Mr. Mandlekar on behalf of the non-applicant has raised a preliminary objection which may now be disposed of. Mr. Mandlekar urges that this contention, founded upon the provisions of s. 74 of Act XXVII of 1956, was available to the applicant before the date of the order of the Civil Judge in the election petition, but it was not raised before the Civil Judge and, therefore, could not be raised in revision. Secondly, Mr. Mandlekar urges that even in revision there is no ground raised upon which such a contention could be founded.

The Act XXVII of 1956 was assented to by the President on June 6, 1956, and it was published in the Official Gazette on June 8, 1956. By virtue of Notification No. S. R. O. 19311A, dated August 25, 1956, and published in the Gazette Extraordinary of the Government of India, part II, section 3, dated August 28, 1956, the Representation of the People (Second Amendment) Act, 1956, came into force on August 28, 1956. The order of the Civil Judge upon the election petition before him was passed on September 22, 1956. Therefore, Mr. Mandlekar is correct when he urges that it was open to the applicant to have raised this question before the Civil Judge. So far as the second preliminary objection of Mr. Mandlekar is concerned, I am unable to accept it because grounds nos. 1-A, 1-B and 2-D raised in the revision petition before me, in my opinion, sufficiently cover the contention raised on behalf of the applicant. These grounds give sufficient notice of the contention to the opposite side that the applicant was contending that s. 143 could not be invoked in the present case.

As to the objection that the ground was not raised before the Civil Judge, it is to be pointed out that the Act came into force only on August 28, 1956, and the order impugned was passed on September 22, 1956, and it is possible that neither party nor even the Court was aware of its provisions or its effect. At any rate, the question raised is a question which affects the very jurisdiction of the Civil Judge to pass the order which he has passed, and in my opinion, is of such fundamental importance that it ought to be allowed to be raised in revision. I am unable to accept the preliminary objections against the second contention raised by Mr. Kulkarni.

The first contention of Mr. Kulkarni may now be disposed of. According to Mr. Kulkarni, the provisions of s. 12(3)(d) of the Municipalities Act refer only to a disqualification imposed in respect of municipal elections or elections to local bodies only and not elections to State legislative bodies or to Parliament. Mr. Kulkarni stressed the words "in this behalf" occurring in cl. (d), but if sub-s. (3) of s. 12 is read as a whole, it is clear that the words "in this behalf" in cl. (d) refer back to the opening words of sub-s. (3) "no person shall be entitled to vote at any election", and the words used in the opening clause are "any election" and not "any municipal election or election to a local body". Therefore, the subsequent words "in this behalf" can only refer to the words "any election". I am unable to read into the wording of sub-s. (3) the words "any election relating to municipal or local bodies" as Mr. Kulkarni would have it. This contention, therefore, fails.

There is, however, much substance in the second contention raised by Mr. Kulkarni. The provisions of s. 74 of Act XXVII of 1956 are as follows:—

"74. (1) Section 143 of the principal Act shall be omitted.

(2) It is hereby declared that any disqualification for voting incurred by any person under the said section for default in making a return of election expenses shall stand removed."

The effect of s. 74 was first of all to repeal s. 143 of the principal Act (The Representation of the People Act, 1951).

The rules of construction governing the effect to be given to a repealing statute are now well settled. The normal effect of repealing a statute is to obliterate it from the statute book as completely as if it had never been passed; it must be considered as a law that never existed. But to this rule an exception is engrafted by the provisions of s. 6 of the General Clauses Act. Clauses (a), (b) and (c) of s. 6 prescribe that notwithstanding the repeal, the repeal shall not (a) revive anything not in force at the time, or (b) affect the previous operation of any enactment so repealed or anything duly done or suffered thereunder, or (c) affect any right, privilege, obligation or liability acquired, accrued or incurred under any enactment so repealed. Mr. Mandlekar urged that having regard to the cls. (a) to (c) of s. 6 of the General Clauses Act, the disqualification incurred by the applicant by virtue of the notification of the Election Commission would still continue.

The several clauses of s. 6 of the General Clauses Act are preceded by the words "unless a different intention appears", and Mr. Kulkarni submitted that in s. 74(2) of Act XXVII of 1956 such a different intention has been expressed. The crucial question, therefore, that arises for decision in this revision is what is the exact effect of the provision of s. 74(2) of Act XXVII of 1956. Mr. Mandlekar urged that the words "shall stand removed" in s. 74(2) can only mean shall stand removed from the date the section comes into force i.e. from August 28, 1956, and that the intention of the sub-section was not to remove the disqualification which has been incurred in the past, retrospectively. Mr. Kulkarni, however, pointed to the words "any disqualification" and to the generality of the expression and urged that any disqualification would include disqualification incurred in the past or the future, and, therefore, the effect of sub-s. (2) of s. 74 was retrospective.

In my opinion, the effect of sub-s. (2) is clear that all disqualifications, howsoever incurred, whether in the past or the present, were to be removed by virtue of its provisions. In the first place, it is to be remembered that sub-s. (1) of s. 74 repeals s. 143 of the Representation of the People Act of 1951, and, therefore, if that section was once repealed and sub-s. (2) of s. 74 uses the words "disqualification... under the said section", it must necessarily follow that in order to give it proper effect it must be construed to include past disqualifications. Otherwise, sub-s. (2) and the intent of the Legislature behind it would be rendered nugatory in a large measure, because with s. 143 repealed, there would be very few cases to which sub-s. (2) of s. 74 could apply. No doubt, the disqualification under s. 143 is for a period of five years and there may be cases where that period of five years has only partially elapsed and the disqualification continued, but such cases were very few and it is difficult to believe that the Legislature when it enacted sub-s. (2) of s. 74, intended to apply it only to those cases. On the other hand, it seems to me that the Legislature advisedly used the very general words "any disqualification for voting incurred by any person under the said section" which necessarily includes any disqualification incurred in the past. Nothing turns upon the subsequent words "shall stand removed". They are equally capable of application to past disqualification as also to present or future disqualification.

The intention of the Legislature in removing s. 143 from the statute book was that s. 7(c) of the Representation of the People Act of 1951 was already on the statute book and it disqualified a person from standing for election to the membership of the Legislature of the State or of Parliament if he had not made a return of his election expenses. Therefore, it was unnecessary also to further disqualify such a person from voting, and with that object s. 143 was repealed. That being so, it seems to me that the same reason could as well apply to past disqualifications as also to present and future disqualifications. I hold that s. 74(2) of Act No. XXVII of 1956 was retrospective in operation and removed even the disqualifications incurred by a person prior to the coming into force of that Act on August 28, 1956. Therefore, in the instant case the only ground, upon which the applicant was disqualified and his election was declared void and set aside, was not a ground for disqualification and his election was not liable to be declared void or to be set aside.

The question then is what should be done in the instant case. Now, it is no doubt true that the non-applicant Hemaji was upon the findings of the Civil Judge, which have not been challenged before me, also held entitled to contest the election and could not do so because a forged withdrawal of nomination was filed before the Election Officer. In the result, therefore, both Hemaji and Sadasheo were entitled to contest another election. In view of these facts, I consider that it would be proper to declare under r. 18 of the Madhya Pradesh Election Petition Rules, 1957, that a casual vacancy has been created.

The application for revision is allowed. Mr. Mandlekar urges that he should not be saddled with costs. As the application for revision has been allowed on the ground which the applicant never raised in the trial Court, I think it fair to order that each party shall bear its own costs.

Application allowed.

AMIRCHAND NARAYAN v. THE DIVISIONAL OFFICER, BOMBAY DIVISION, BOMBAY.*

Motor Vehicles Act (IV of 1939), Chapters IV, IV-A; Sec. 68-C, 68-B—Chap. IV-A whether debar State transport undertaking from making application under Chap. IV—Whether such undertaking can make application for stage carriage permit only under Chap. IV-A—Section 68-C whether makes it compulsory for State transport undertaking to prepare scheme.

Chapter IV-A of the Motor Vehicles Act, 1939, does not debar a State transport undertaking from making an application under Chapter IV of the Act for a stage carriage permit.

Section 68-C of the Motor Vehicles Act, 1939, is merely an enabling section, and, therefore, it does not make it compulsory or mandatory for a State transport undertaking to prepare a scheme as envisaged in that section.

Miscellaneous Application No. 522 of 1958. 2 (1880) 5 App. Cas. 214.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

C. K. Jaisinghani, for the petitioner.

B. J. Joshi, for respondents Nos. 1 to 9 and 11.

M. J. Mistree, for respondent No. 10.

SHELAT J. This is a petition under art. 226 of the Constitution to set aside the two orders, copies of which have been annexed as exhs. B and C to the petition.

The petitioner carries on business of plying motor buses on a route known as Malad-Marve route. On May 11, 1955, the Regional Transport Authority granted to the petitioner a substantive permit for a period of three years to ply his buses on Malad-Marve route. The permit expired on May 11, 1958. Prior to its expiry, the petitioner applied in March 1958 for the renewal of the said permit. The application has not yet been disposed of. But the petitioner has been allowed to ply his buses on the said route under a temporary permit.

On May 11, 1955, the Bombay Electric Supply & Transport Undertaking was also granted a permit to ply its buses in Greater Bombay as it then existed. By Act LVIII of 1956 the limits of Greater Bombay were extended adding to its then area 34 villages which were till then situate in the District of Thana. These 34 villages included Malad and Marve. After the limits of Greater Bombay were thus extended, the B.E.S.T. Undertaking applied on April 9, 1957, for a permit to ply its buses in the area added to the limits of Greater Bombay by Act LVIII of 1956. In pursuance of the provisions of the Motor Vehicles Act IV of 1939 the application of the B.E.S.T. was duly published. The petitioner filed his objections. On November 29, 1957, the application of the B.E.S.T. dated April 9, 1957, came on for hearing before the Regional Transport Authority. Amongst other things, it was contended on behalf of the petitioner that the B.E.S.T. Undertaking being a State Transport undertaking within the meaning of s. 68A(b)(iv), the provisions of Chap. IV-A of the Motor Vehicles Act, which came in force in February 1957, were applicable to its said application. It was submitted that in the circumstances the B.E.S.T. Undertaking was not entitled to file any application under Chap. IV by reason of the over-riding effect given to the provisions of Chap. IV-A and the B.E.S.T. Undertaking not having made a scheme as provided for in s. 68-C contained in Chap. IV-A, its application was not maintainable. The Regional Transport Authority upheld this objection and rejected the application of the B.E.S.T. Undertaking.

Aggrieved by this decision the B.E.S.T. Undertaking filed an appeal before the State Transport Authority being Appeal No. 105 of 1958. By an order dated March 26, 1958, the State Transport Authority allowed the appeal holding that it was competent for the B.E.S.T. Undertaking to apply for a permit under Chap. IV. In that view the State Transport Authority set aside the order passed by the Regional Transport Authority. The petitioner lodged an appeal to the Government of Bombay against that order. By their order dated October 29, 1958, the State Government dismissed the appeal of the petitioner. It is against the orders passed by the State Transport Authority and the Government of Bombay that the petitioner has filed the present petition.

It may be observed that the petitioner was not at the material time a holder of a substantive permit. He was holding a temporary permit to ply his buses on the Malad-Marve route pending the decision of his application for the renewal of his permit. He, therefore, presented this petition not in his capacity as a permit-holder or having any vested rights in plying his buses on Malad-Marve route but only as an objector.

Mr. Jaisinghani for the petitioner contended that the application of the B.E.S.T. Undertaking dated April 9, 1957, was not maintainable and therefore should have been rejected. In support of his contention he has taken me through several provisions of the Motor Vehicles Act. He has, however, mainly relied upon Chap. IV-A which, as I have said, came into force in February 1957, about two months before the B.E.S.T. Undertaking filed its application. There can be no doubt that if the provisions of Chap. IV-A were to be applicable to the said application then that application must be in consonance with that Chapter. It is admitted that by virtue of the definition contained in s. 68A(b)(iv) the B.E.S.T. Undertaking is a State Transport Undertaking. The provisions of Chap. IV-A are called special provisions relating to State Transport Undertakings and, therefore, if the application were to be filed under Chap. IV-A, Mr. Jaisinghani would be right in his contention that unless the provisions of Chap. IV-A are complied with, the application in question would not be maintainable.

In support of his contention as to the non-maintainability of the application in question, Mr. Jaisinghani has laid considerable stress on the provisions of s. 68-C contained in the new Chap. IV-A. It was argued that the application by the B.E.S.T. Undertaking fell under s. 68-C and, therefore, it was incumbent upon the B.E.S.T. Undertaking to have framed a scheme as envisaged in that section. The failure on the part of the B.E.S.T. Undertaking to make such a scheme and to have it approved by the State Government rendered its application incompetent. Mr. Jaisinghani has sought to argue that under s. 68-C a State Transport Undertaking has mainly to perform two things: (1) it has to come to an opinion that for the purpose of providing an efficient, adequate, economical and properly co-ordinated road transport service it is necessary in the public interest that road transport services in general or in particular in relation to any area or route or portion thereof should be run and operated by the State Transport Undertaking; and (2) to prepare a scheme giving particulars of the nature of the services proposed to be rendered, the area or route proposed to be covered and such other particulars respecting thereto as may be prescribed and to have such scheme published in the Official Gazette and in such other manner as the State Government may direct. The submission made on behalf of the petitioner was that by reason of s. 68-C the petitioner acquired the right of challenging the scheme so framed by the State Transport Undertaking before the State Government and to persuade the State Government not to sanction such a scheme. The petitioner in that case would also have the right of objecting to the application made by the State Transport Undertaking before the Transport Authority. He contended that if the State Transport Undertaking were to be allowed to make an application without making such a scheme, the effect of that would be to deprive the petitioner of his aforesaid right. Mr. Jaisinghani also contended that Chap. IV-A contained special provisions relating to State Transport Undertaking, and that being so, those special provisions would have over-riding effect over the general provisions contained in Chap. IV. He, therefore, argued that it is only under Chap. IV-A that a State Transport Undertaking like the B.E.S.T. Undertaking can make an application and not under Chap. IV. In these circumstances he submitted that the application of the B.E.S.T. Undertaking was not maintainable and ought to have been rejected.

It would be expedient to dispose of the first contention raised by Mr. Jaisinghani before I turn to the several provisions of the Motor Vehicles Act to which reference was made in the course of the arguments. As aforesaid, Mr. Jaisinghani urged that the B.E.S.T. Undertaking before it made this application had fulfilled its first obligation under s. 68-C and, therefore, it cannot be heard to say that it would not perform its other obligation under s. 68-C, viz. to prepare a scheme as envisaged therein. In other words, the contention was that since the B.E.S.T. Undertaking had formed an opinion that for the purpose of providing an efficient, adequate, economical etc. transport service; it was necessary in the public interest that road transport service in Malad-Marve route should be run and operated by it, it was necessary that it should have fulfilled the other obligation set out in that section, viz. to frame a scheme.

That contention in my view has no substance. It was not the case of the petitioner either before the Regional Transport Authority or before the Appellate Tribunals that the B.E.S.T. Undertaking had come to the opinion as set out in s. 68-C and that, therefore, it must fulfil the other part of that section. That case has also not been in express terms set out in the present petition. The only case that was laid by the petitioner before the Transport Authorities was that because Chap. IV-A contained special provisions relating to a State Transport Undertaking, it was that Chapter which would be applicable to the B.E.S.T. Undertaking and not Chap. IV and that, therefore, the application should have been rejected.

The contention that after February 1957 when Chap. IV-A came into force, the Undertaking can apply only under Chap. IV-A and not under Chap. IV has also, in my view, no substance. Nothing has been pointed out to me either from Chap. IV-A or any other provision of the Motor Vehicles Act which would justify that contention.

In order to appreciate the contentions raised by Mr. Jaisinghani on the provisions of s. 68-C, it would be necessary to view in passing certain sections contained in Chap. IV. Section 42 provides for the necessity of permits and lays down that no owner of a transport vehicle shall use or permit the use of a vehicle in any public place save in accordance with the conditions of permit granted by a Regional or State Transport Authority. Section 43 lays down the power of the State Government to control road transport. Section 45 provides that every application for a permit should be made to the Regional Transport Authority of the region in which it is proposed to use the vehicle or vehicles. Section 46 deals with an application for stage carriage permit and lays down that an application for such a permit shall contain certain particulars laid down in that section. Section 57 then provides the procedure in applying for and in the grant of such permits. It provides that on receipt of an application for stage carriage permit, the Regional Transport Authority shall make the application available for inspection at the office of the Authority and shall publish the application or the substance thereof in the prescribed manner together with a notice of the date before which representations in connection therewith may be submitted and the date, time and place at which the application and any such representations would be considered. The provisions of Chap. IV thus deal with applications to be made for a stage carriage permit, the procedure by which such applications have to be dealt with including the consideration of objections that might be made in connection with such applications. It may be observed that so far as Chap. IV is concerned, there is no distinction between an individual and a State Transport Undertaking making such an application. Prima facie, therefore, it would appear that under Chap. IV both an individual and a State Transport Undertaking are entitled to apply for a permit. In order to succeed, Mr. Jaisinghani, therefore, has to establish that on Chap. IV-A being enacted, the State Transport Undertaking, such as the B.E.S.T. Undertaking, has been debarred from making an application under Chap. IV and, consequently, the only Chapter under which such an application can be made would be Chap. IV-A. Broadly speaking, there is nothing either in Chap. IV or Chap. IV-A which expressly provides such a bar.

But then it was urged by Mr. Jaisinghani that s. 68-B expressly provides that the provisions of Chap. IV-A and the rules and orders made thereunder "shall have effect notwithstanding anything inconsistent therewith contained in Chapter IV of this Act or in any other law for the time being in force" and that the fact of the provisions of Chap. IV-A having been thus given an overriding effect over the provisions of Chap. IV would mean that a State Transport Undertaking can make an application only under Chap. IV-A and its right to make an application under Chap. IV has, therefore, been taken away by the special provisions contained in this new Chapter. It is not possible to accept this contention. Reading Chaps. IV and IV-A together and considering the scheme set out in Chap. IVA, it is easy to see the object of the Legislature in enacting Chap. IV-A. As I have pointed out, an application under Chap. IV could be made either by an individual or by a State Transport Undertaking. Under that Chapter it would be the duty of the Regional Transport Authority to consider such applications together with the objections raised in respect thereof. Under Chap. IV it is in the discretion of the Authority to grant or refuse a permit applied for. Therefore it would be within the power of the Regional Transport Authority either to grant a permit or to refuse an application made by such an undertaking as the B.E.S.T. Undertaking. Chapter IV-A, on the other hand, takes away certain powers of the Regional Transport Authority where an application is made after complying with the provisions of that Chapter. Thus under s. 68-C, if a State Transport Undertaking, such as the B.E.S.T. Undertaking, were to come to the opinion that a road transport service in relation to any area or route or portion thereof should be run and operated by the State Transport Undertaking for the purpose of providing an efficient, adequate, economical and properly co-ordinated road transport service, it may prepare a scheme as set out therein. Such a scheme, when framed, has to be published in the Official Gazette or in such other manner as the State Government may prescribe. Under s. 68-D, a person affected by such a scheme may, within thirty days from the date of the publication of the scheme, file objections thereto before the State Government, and the State Government after considering such objections and after hearing the objector and the State Transport Undertaking may approve or modify the scheme. When such a scheme is approved or modified by the State Government, it is again to be published in the Official Gazette and thereupon the scheme becomes final and would be called "an approved scheme." The area or the route to which such a scheme relates to would be called "notified area" or "notified route." Under s. 68-F where, in pursuance of an approved scheme, any State Transport Undertaking applies for a stage carriage permit (and it is somewhat important to note that such an application has to be in the manner specified in Chap. IV) in respect of "a notified area" or "a notified route," the Regional Transport Authority "shall issue" such permit to the State Transport Undertaking, notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in Chap. IV. It is clear that the words "notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in Chapter IV" in s. 68-F mean that where a scheme is approved of and notified and an area or a route is likewise notified under s. 68-D, it does not lie in the discretion of the Regional Transport Authority to refuse a permit though it has to be applied under Chap. IV. In other words, the power of the Regional Transport Authority to refuse the permit in such an application though made under Chap. IV has been taken away where the provisions of ss. 68-C and 68-D are applicable. Sub-section (2) of s. 68-F provides that for the purpose of giving effect to the approved scheme in respect of a notified area or route, the Regional Transport Authority may by its order either refuse to entertain an application for the renewal of any other permit or cancel any existing permit or modify the terms of any existing permit so as to render such permit ineffective beyond a specified date, reduce the number of vehicles authorised to be used under such permit or curtail the area or route covered by such permit in so far as such permit relates to the notified area or notified route. Sub-section (3) of s. 68-F then declares that no appeal shall lie against any action taken, or order passed, by the Regional Transport Authority under sub-s. (1) or sub-s. (2) of s. 68-F. Section 68-G provides for the holder of an existing permit to be entitled to compensation as laid down in sub-s. (4) or sub-s. (5) of s. 68-G. It is clear that what Chap. IV-A does is to confer certain additional rights to a State Transport Undertaking which such an Undertaking did not have before the enactment of Chap. IV-A. In my view, the contention that by the enactment of Chap. IV-A the State Transport Undertaking lost its right to make an application under Chap. IV cannot be accepted.

Mr. Jaisinghani, however, contended that the words "State Transport Undertaking may prepare a scheme" in s. 68-C have a mandatory import and that I should construe the word "may" in the context as having the meaning of "shall". He contended that the power given to the State Transport Undertaking to prepare a scheme was coupled with its duty to come to an opinion that it must run a road transport service for the purpose of providing an efficient, adequate, economical and properly co-ordinated service and that that power being coupled with a duty cast upon the Undertaking, the provision as to the making of a scheme was mandatory and the word "may", therefore, has the effect of the word "shall". In that connection Mr. Jaisinghani relied upon the decision in Munna Lal v. H. R. Scott.¹ That decision, however, does not deal with the Motor Vehicles Act and, therefore, cannot be of assistance. The principles of construction where the word "may" can be construed as meaning "shall" are well-settled. "May" does not mean "must"; "may" always means "may". As stated at p. 212 in Craies on Statute Law, 5th edn., "May" is a permissive or enabling expression. There are, no doubt, cases in which for various reasons as soon as a person, who is within the statute entrusted with power, it becomes his duty to exercise such power. This rule is laid down in *Julius v. Lord Bishop of Oxford*² where Lord Cairns stated (p. 222):

"The question has been argued and has been spoken of by some learned Judges in the Courts below as if the words 'It shall be lawful' might have a different meaning, and might be differently interpreted in different statutes, or in different parts of the same statute. I cannot think that this is correct. The words 'It shall be lawful' are not equivocal. They are plain and unambiguous... They confer a faculty or power, and they do not of themselves do more than confer a faculty or power. But there may be something in the nature of the thing empowered to be done, something in the object for which it is to be done, something in the conditions under which it is to be done, something in the title of the person or persons for whose benefit the power is to be exercised, which may couple the power with a duty, and make it the duty of the person in whom the power is reposed to exercise that power when called upon to do so."

Lord Blackburn, who was also a party to that decision, thought that all the cases which held that a power of this kind must be used were to be supported on the principle that, although prima facie the donee of the power may either exercise it or leave it unused, yet

"...if the object for which the power is conferred is for the purpose of enforcing a right, there may be a duty cast on the donee of the power, to exercise it for the benefit of those who have that right, when required on their behalf. ...The enabling words are construed as compulsory whenever the object of the power is to effectuate a legal right." (pp. 241-244).

It is difficult to understand as to how the words "may prepare a scheme" used in s. 68-C can be said to be coupled with any duty such as is referred to in Julius v. Lord Bishop of Oxford and may, therefore, be construed as being of a compulsory or mandatory character. In my view, it is clear that s. 68-C is merely an enabling section. Where, therefore, a State Transport Undertaking wishes to take the benefit of the provisions of s. 68-F, it has the power to prepare a scheme, have that scheme approved by the State Government and have a route or an area notified as prescribed in s. 68-D. Where such a scheme is framed, certain benefits would seem to flow to a State Transport Undertaking such as (1) that the Regional Transport Authority cannot refuse the application so made as provided for under s. 8-F(1), (2) it might acquire in certain circumstances an exclusive right to ply buses in a notified area or route as provided for under s. 68-F(2), and (3) there would be no appeal against an order passed under s. 68-F(2) by the Regional Transport Authority either cancelling or modifying the terms of an existing permit held by a person other than the State Transport Undertaking.

In the view that I take, s. 68-C is merely an enabling section and there is nothing contained in that section which makes it compulsory or mandatory for a State Transport Undertaking to prepare a scheme. Therefore, the contention that the application made by the B.E.S.T. Undertaking dated April 9, 1957, was not maintainable or was bad in law must fail.

For the reasons aforesaid, the petition must fail. The rule is discharged with costs. The petitioner will pay the costs of respondents Nos. 1 to 9 and 11 in one set, and to respondent No. 10 in another set.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. H. K. Chainani, Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice S. T. Desai.

KESHAV GOVIND KULKARNI v. EXTRA ASSISTANT JUDGE, SOUTH SATARA.*

Bombay District Municipal Act (Bom. III of 1901), Secs. 22, 15(1)(2)(3)—Election petition filed under s. 22—Whether in such petition validity of nomination can be challenged on ground of disqualification under s. 15(1)(ea).

In an election petition filed under s. 22 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, the petitioner can challenge the validity of the nomination of the opponents on the ground that they were disqualified from standing for election under s. 15(1) of the Act.

*Narayan Maruti v. District Judge, Kolaba*¹ and V. A. Ransing v. Shankar Vithal,² referred to.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

K. B. Sukthankar, for the petitioner.

R. A. Jahagirdar, with B. E. Jahagirdar, for opponents Nos. 3 and 4.

CHAINANI C. J. The petitioner is a resident of Islampur. An election for two seats in the Islampur Municipality was held on November 5, 1957. The petitioner and opponents Nos. 3 to 6 stood for the election. The nomination papers were filed on October 10, 1957. The petitioner objected to the nomination paper of opponents Nos. 3 and 4, Ganpat Sambhaji and Baburao Yeshwant. He contended that they were disqualified from standing for election under cl. (ea) of s. 15(1) of the Bombay District Municipal Act, which applies to the Islampur Municipality. Under this clause, no person may be a councillor, who fails to pay any arrears of any kind due by him to the Municipality within three months after a special notice in this behalf has been served upon him. The objection raised by the petitioner was overruled by the Returning Officer. Opponents Nos. 5 and 6 withdrew their candidature. At the time of the election there were, therefore, only three candidates. Opponents Nos. 3 and 4 received more votes than the petitioner. They were, therefore, declared to be duly elected. Thereafter, the petitioner filed an application before the District Judge, under s. 22 of the Act, in which he questioned the validity of the election of opponents Nos. 3 and 4. He challenged the election on several grounds, out of which we are concerned, in the present application, with only three. He alleged that these opponents were disqualified from standing for election under cl. (ea) of s. 15(1) of the Act. He also contended that some of the persons, whose names were shown in the voters' list, were disqualified to vote. He also alleged that some of the voters were not residents of Ward III, in which the election was held, and as such their votes should not have been taken into consideration. Opponents Nos. 3 and 4, on the other hand, contended that the decision given by the Returning Officer, accepting their nomination papers, was final and could not be challenged in an election petition filed under s. 22. They also contended that questions about disqualification of particular voters could not be gone into in this petition. The learned Assistant Judge framed several issues, out of which he tried the following as preliminary issues:

I. (a) Whether it is open to the petitioner to challenge the validity of the nomination papers of opponents Nos. 2 and 3 (opponents Nos. 3 and 4 in the present application) in the present proceeding?

II. Whether it is open to the petitioner to contend that opponents Nos. 2 and 3 were disqualified under section 15(1) para. (ea) of the Bombay District Municipal Act to contest the election?

IV. Whether the petitioner can challenge that voters as mentioned in Schedule A were below the age of 21 on 1-3-1957, and, if so, whether he proves that they were below the age of 21 years on the said date and whether the votes recorded by them can be held as invalid votes?

V. Whether the petitioner can challenge that voters as mentioned in Schedule B were not entitled to be registered as voters in the voters' list for reasons mentioned in para. 3(e) of the petition and, if yes, whether he proves that they were not entitled to be registered as voters?

VI. Whether it is open to the petitioner to contend that persons whose names are given in Schedule C were not entitled to vote in the constituency in question, and, if yes, whether he proves the same?

The learned Assistant Judge answered all these issues in the negative. Against the findings recorded by him, the present Special Civil Application is preferred.

The first point, which has been urged by Mr. Sukthankar, who appears on behalf of the petitioner, is that the learned Assistant Judge was wrong in holding that the validity of the nomination papers, filed by opponents Nos. 3 and 4, cannot be challenged in the election petition filed under s. 22 of the Act. Sub-section (1) of s. 22 provides:

"If the validity of any election of a councillor is brought in question by any person qualified either to be elected or to vote at the election to which such question refers, such person may, at any time within ten days after the date of the declaration of the result of the election, apply to the District Judge of the district within which the election has been or should have been held."

Sub-section (2) of this section provides for an inquiry being held by a District Judge. This section, therefore, empowers a District Judge to investigate the question whether a councillor has been duly elected. One of the grounds, on which the election of a councillor may be challenged, is that he was not qualified to stand for election. Consequently in the absence of any other provision, which debar him from doing so, the District Judge would be competent to inquire into this question also under s. 22 of the Act. It has, however, been urged by Mr. Jahagirdar on behalf of the opponents that the District Judge cannot decide this question, by reason of the provisions of sub-s. (3) of s. 15, under which, according to him, the only competent authority to decide the question is the Collector. Sub-section (1) of this section begins with the words "No person may be a councillor." Thereafter, follow cls. (a) to (g), specifying the disqualifications, a person subject to any of which may not be a councillor. The words "No person may be a councillor" mean that no person may become a councillor, or, in other words, that he cannot even stand for election, if he is subject to any of the disqualifications mentioned in sub-s. (1). These words, therefore, refer to the period before the person has become a councillor. Mr. Jahagirdar has laid stress on the word "councillor" and has urged that this sub-section applies after a person has become a councillor. This argument ignores the words "may be" in sub-s. (1). The only meaning, which can reasonably be given to the words "no person may be a councillor", is that no person may become or can become a councillor. This sub-section, therefore, specifies the disqualifications, which debar a person from even standing for election as a councillor. That this sub-section applies, before a person has been elected or appointed as a councillor, is made clear by sub-s. (2) of s. 15. This sub-section is in the following terms:

"If any councillor during the term for which he has been elected or appointed—

(a) becomes disqualified under sub-section (1), or

(b) ...to (e) ...

he shall, subject to the provisions of sub-section (3), be disabled from continuing to be a councillor and his office shall become vacant."

This sub-section, therefore, comes into play only after a person has become a councillor. If, therefore, a person becomes disqualified under sub-s. (1) after he has been elected, then under this sub-section he is disabled from continuing to be a councillor and his office becomes vacant. The words "continuing to be a councillor" also emphasise that this sub-section deals with disqualifications incurred after a person has been elected or appointed as a councillor. If, therefore, a person becomes subject to a disqualification specified in sub-s. (1) before the election is held or before the appointment is made, he will not be eligible to stand for election or for being appointed as a councillor. On the other hand, if he incurs the disqualification after he has been elected or appointed, then under sub-s. (2) he will cease to be a councillor. Then comes sub-s. (3), the relevant part of which is in the following terms:

"In every case, the authority competent to decide whether a vacancy has occurred under this section shall be the Collector... Until the Collector decides that the vacancy has arisen, the councillor shall not be disabled under sub-section (2) from continuing to be a councillor."

Sub-section (2) alone provides for an office becoming vacant when a councillor, during the term for which he has been elected or appointed, becomes disqualified. There is no similar provision in sub-s. (1) that a vacancy shall arise, if a person incurs a disqualification referred to in this sub-section. This sub-section deals with disqualifications arising before a person has become a councillor. Consequently, sub-s. (3) becomes applicable only when a vacancy has occurred under sub-s. (2), that is, when a councillor becomes subject to a disqualification after he has been elected. This inference is also suggested by the provision in sub-s. (3) that until the Collector decides that the vacancy has arisen, the councillor shall not be disabled under sub-s. (2) from continuing to be a councillor. A person can continue to be a councillor only after he has become a councillor. It follows that sub-s. (3) applies only when a councillor incurs a disqualification during the term of his office. In such cases, the only authority competent to decide whether a vacancy has occurred is the Collector. Where, however, a candidate was not qualified to stand for election, the question of a vacancy occurring in the office of the councillor, by reason of his disqualification, does not arise. The Collector is not empowered to decide, after the election is over, whether a candidate was or was not qualified to stand for election. This question can, therefore, be raised and decided in an election petition filed under s. 22.

In our opinion, therefore, the petitioner can challenge the validity of the nomination of opponents Nos. 3 and 4 in the election petition filed by him. It will be open to him to contend that these opponents were disqualified from standing for election under sub-s. (1) of s. 15.

Mr. Jahagirdar has placed strong reliance on the decision of this Court in *Narayan Maruti v. District Judge, Kolaba*¹. In that case it was held that s. 15 of the Bombay District Municipal Act deals with the disqualification which attaches to a councillor on his being elected and that no jurisdiction is conferred upon the District Judge to decide whether any disqualification attaches to the councillor under s. 15 of the Act. The provisions of s. 15 were different at that time when this case was decided from what they are today. At that time the section contained two other sub-ss. (1A) and (1B). Sub-section (1A) was in the following terms:

"If any person is elected or nominated as a councillor in contravention of the provisions of sub-section (1) his seat shall, subject to the provisions of sub-section (1B), be deemed to be vacant."

The material part of sub-s. (1B) was as follows:

"In every case, the authority competent to decide whether a vacancy has occurred under sub-section (1A) shall be the Collector... Until the Collector decides that the vacancy has arisen, the seat of the person elected or nominated shall not, under sub-section (1A), be deemed to have become vacant."

These provisions, therefore, specifically empowered the Collector to decide whether a person had been elected or nominated as a councillor, in contravention of the provisions of sub-s. (1). It was, therefore, held in Narayan Maruti's case that the only authority, which could decide whether a person was disqualified from standing for election, was the Collector. Since this decision was given, the law has been changed. Sub-sections (1A) and (1B) have been omitted from s. 15. Under sub-s. (3), as it now stands, the Collector is only empowered to decide whether a vacancy has arisen under sub-s. (2), that is, whether a councillor has, after his election and during the term of his office, incurred any disqualification.

Narayan Maruti's case has been distinguished in V. A. Ransing v. Shankar Vitthal.² In that case, the question was whether in an election petition filed under s. 6 of the Bombay Primary Education Act, sub-ss. (1) and (2) of which contained provisions similar to those contained in sub-ss. (1) and (2) of s. 22 of the District Municipal Act, the District Judge had jurisdiction to decide the case of a person being elected without the necessary qualification or without being eligible to be elected, and it was held that he possessed this jurisdiction. The view taken in this case was, therefore, the same as we are taking in the present case.

We accordingly hold that the answers given by the learned Assistant Judge to issue I(a) and the first part of issue II, were erroneous. Both these issues should be answered in the affirmative.

The second point, which Mr. Sukthankar has urged, is that the electoral roll, on the basis of which the election was held, is invalid, because it shows some persons as voters who are under 21 years of age or who do not reside in Ward III, in which the election was held. Sub-section (1) of s. 12 of the Act provides:

"The electoral roll of the Bombay Legislative Assembly for the time being in force, on such day as the State Government may by general or special order notify in this behalf, for such part of the Constituency of the Assembly as is included in a ward of a municipal district shall, for the purpose of this Act, be deemed to be the list of voters for such ward."

Under this provision, therefore, the relevant portion of the electoral roll of the Bombay Legislative Assembly is deemed to be a list of the voters of the particular ward. Sub-section (1) of s. 13 states:

"Every person whose name is in the list of voters referred to in section 12 shall, unless disqualified under this Act or under any other law for the time being in force, be qualified to vote, and every person whose name is not in such list shall not be qualified to vote, at the election of a member for the ward to which such list pertains."

Every person, whose name is shown in the relevant portion of the electoral roll of the Bombay Legislative Assembly, is, therefore, entitled to vote at the election of a member for the ward to which such list pertains, unless he is disqualified under the Act or under any other law for the time being in force to vote. The only other provisions in the Act, which disqualify a person from voting, are those contained in ss. 21 and 21A, which are in the following terms:

"21. No person shall vote at any municipal election under this Act, if he—

(a) is of unsound mind and stands so declared by a competent court, or

(b) has voluntarily acquired the citizenship of foreign State, or is under any acknowledgment of allegiance or adherence to a foreign State.

21A. (1) No person shall vote at a general election in more than one ward and if a person votes in more than one ward, his vote in all such wards shall be void.

(2) No person shall at any election vote in the same ward more than once, notwithstanding that his name may have been entered in the list of voters for that ward more than once, and if he does so vote, all his votes in that ward shall be void."

If, therefore, a person, whose name is shown in the list of voters referred to in s. 12, is not subject to the disqualification mentioned in s. 21, he is qualified to vote, subject, of course, to the provisions contained in s. 21A that he cannot vote in more than one ward and that he cannot vote more than once. The Act contains no provision that a person shall not be entitled to vote, if he is under 21 years of age or if he does not reside in the ward in which the election is to be held. Consequently, it is not open to the petitioner to object to the electoral roll on the ground that it contained the names of some voters, who are under 21 years of age or who do not reside in ward III. The proper time for the petitioner to raise these objections was when the electoral roll of the Legislative Assembly was being prepared. But he cannot raise them in the election petition filed by him.

Mr. Sukthankar has relied on the decision of the Supreme Court in Chief Commissioner, Ajmer v. Radhey Shyam Dani.³ Sub-section (2) of s. 30 of the Ajmer-Merwara Municipalities Regulation, 1925, as amended provided that "Every person who would be entitled under the Representation of the People Act, 1950 (XLIII of 1950) to be registered in the electoral roll for a Parliamentary Constituency if that Constituency had been co-extensive with the Municipality, and whose name is registered in the electoral roll for the Parliamentary Constituency comprising the Municipality shall be entitled to be enrolled as an elector of the Municipality," and s. 43 enabled the Chief Commissioner to make rules consistent with the Regulation for the preparation and revision of electoral rolls and the adjudication of claims to be enrolled and objections to enrolment. In exercise of this power the appellant framed rules, which, inter alia, provided that the electoral roll for the particular municipality shall be the same as the final printed roll for the Parliamentary Constituency representing the area covered by the Municipality. He notified an electoral programme and also authenticated and published an electoral roll on August 8, 1955. The respondent, whose father's name was recited wrongly in the electoral roll, applied for the rectification of the mistake in the Parliamentary Electoral Roll, on August 10, 1955, but it was rejected on the ground that the roll of the municipal elections had been finally published on August 8, 1955, and, therefore, no correction could be made. The respondent challenged the validity of the notification and the electoral roll. It was held that under s. 30(2) of the Ajmer-Merwara Municipalities Regulation, 1925, the electoral roll for the Parliamentary Constituency was only treated as the basis for the electoral roll of the municipality and that the rules in so far as they made no provision for the revision of the electoral roll, for the adjudication of claims to be included therein or for entertaining objections to such inclusion, were defective and, therefore, the electoral roll of the Ajmer Municipality which was authenticated and published by the appellant on August 8, 1955, was not in conformity with the provisions of s. 30(2) and the relevant provisions of the Regulation and could not form the basis of any valid elections to be held to the Ajmer Municipal Committee. It will be noticed that in that case s. 43 empowered the Commissioner to make rules consistent with the Regulation for the preparation and revision of electoral rolls and the adjudication of claims to be enrolled and objections to enrolment. This case is, therefore, clearly distinguishable. Section 12 of the Bombay District Municipal Act provides that the electoral roll of the Bombay Legislative Assembly for the time being in force, for such part of the Constituency of the Assembly as is included in a ward of a municipal district shall, for the purpose of this Act, be deemed to be the list of voters for such ward. The Act, therefore, makes the relevant part of the electoral roll of the Bombay Legislative Assembly, the electoral roll of the wards of the municipal district. It does not contain any provisions, such as were contained in s. 43 of the Ajmer-Merwara Municipalities Regulation, 1925, for making rules for the preparation and revision of electoral rolls. Consequently, the petitioner is not entitled to object to this electoral roll, on the ground that it was not revised before the elections to the municipality were held.

The answers given by the learned Assistant Judge to issues IV, V and VI were, therefore, correct.

The learned Assistant Judge should now proceed with the petition in the light of what we have stated in this judgment. There will be no order as to costs of this petition.

Order accordingly.

(1) Notwithstanding anything contained in section 8 the landholder may terminate the lease of a protected lessee by giving him notice in writing delivered not less than three months before the commencement of the next agricultural year stating therein the reasons for such termination and the description of the area in respect of which it is proposed to terminate the lease, if the landholder requires the land for cultivating the land personally...

(3) If, upon receipt of a notice under sub-section (1), the protected lessee considers—

(a) that the notice is not bona fide, or
(b) that he should be permitted to give up some other land of the same landholder in lieu of the land mentioned in the notice; he may apply to the Revenue Officer within thirty days from the date of receipt of the notice either for a declaration that the notice shall have no effect or for permission to give up some other land of the same landholder in lieu of the land mentioned in the notice as the case may be...

(6) If on re-entering upon any land after termination of the lease of a protected lessee in accordance with this section, a landholder fails at any time during such period as may be prescribed to utilise the land for the purpose for which the lease was terminated, the dispossessed lessee may apply to the Revenue Officer to put him in possession of the land from the commencement of the agricultural year next following; and the Revenue Officer shall, after hearing the landholder and making such enquiry as he deems fit, put the lessee in possession of the land if he is satisfied of the failure and also award him such sum by way of compensation as the Revenue Officer may consider sufficient.

8. (1) Notwithstanding any agreement, usage, decree or order of a court of law, the lease of any land held by a protected lessee shall not be terminated except under orders of a Revenue Officer made on any of the following grounds, namely:—...

(g) he has been served with a notice by the landholder as provided in section 9.

less there is a stipulation in the sale deed that the landlord was to relinquish the possession at some later date mentioned in the deed itself. Therefore, prima facie, the fact of sale before the lapse of two years from the date of re-entry would show that the landholder was putting himself beyond the possibility of fulfilling the requirement of personal cultivation for the prescribed period under s. 9(6) of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, 1951.

In r. 9 the expression "two years" cannot be construed to mean two cultivating seasons. The two years are to be computed from the specific and definite date of the re-entry by the landholder.

The words, in s. 9(6) of the Act, "a landholder fails at any time during such period as may be prescribed" indicate that the landholder is expected to cultivate the land during the entire period so prescribed; failure of the landholder to cultivate the land even for a short period will entail the consequence of forfeiture.

When an order under s. 9(6) of the Act is passed in favour of the tenant for restoration of the possession the right of the tenant to claim compensation flows from the order and begins from the next agricultural year. Therefore, the word "compensation" must be construed in a restricted sense, namely, that the tenant would be entitled to compensation for the damage caused by injury to the field but there would be no legal basis for the claim either for the income of the land or for the value of the crops for two years.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

Dr. D. W. Kathalay, for the petitioners.

D. B. Padhye, for respondent No. 2.

NAIK J. This is an application under art. 227 of the Constitution of India for setting aside the order passed by the Revenue Tribunal directing the restoration of possession of survey No. 26 to the tenant.

The material facts can be briefly stated as follows:—

Survey No. 26, measuring 23 acres and 37 gunthas, and situated at mouza Pimpri, originally belonged to one Keshao Shamrao Bhende. This land was given on lease to Baliram Panduji Jadhao as a tenant. Keshao served a notice on November 23, 1952, terminating the tenancy of Baliram on the ground that he required the land for his personal cultivation. Baliram did not make any application under s. 9(3) of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, challenging that the notice was not bona fide or even making a prayer under cl. (b) of sub-s. (3) that some other land may be given to him in lieu of the land mentioned in the notice. It appears that Baliram handed over possession of the land to Keshao by the middle of April 1953. It further appears that prior to the surrender of possession Keshao had made an application to the Sub-Divisional Officer on February 13, 1953, under s. 8(1)(g) of the said Act for an order for the termination of Baliram's tenancy. The Sub-Divisional Officer passed an order on June 16, 1954, terminating the tenancy to the extent of 22 acres and 26 gunthas out of the total area of 23 acres and 37 gunthas. Keshao cultivated the land personally for the years 1953-54 and 1954-55. On January 16, 1955, he passed two sale deeds, one in favour of Bhaurao (petitioner No. 2) in regard to 8 acres, and another in favour of petitioners Nos. 3 to 7 in regard to 13 acres and 7 gunthas. Thereafter on May 3, 1956, Baliram made an application under s. 9(6) of the Act requesting for the restoration of the land to him on the ground that the landholder failed to cultivate the land personally for two years as required under the rules framed under the said Act.

The Sub-Divisional Officer came to the conclusion that the landholder had not cultivated the land for the requisite period of two years and, therefore, was liable to be vacated from the land. Consequently he passed an order restoring the possession to the tenant Baliram. Keshao, the landholder, then went up in appeal to the Deputy Commissioner. The Additional Deputy Commissioner held that the landholder had cultivated the land for two years i.e. for the years 1953-54 and 1954-55 before he entered into the transaction of sale. Consequently he passed an order dismissing the original application made by Baliram. Baliram then went to the Revenue Tribunal. The Revenue Tribunal took the view that in view of the provisions of s. 8(1)(g) there could not be a valid termination of the tenancy and, therefore, although the landholder might have secured possession prior to the valid termination of the lease and although he may have cultivated the land for that year, still that would not be a cultivation after the termination of the lease and, therefore, that cultivation would not be available to the landholder. Consequently, it held that there was a contravention of the provisions of s. 9(6) of the Act read with r. No. 9. He, therefore, directed that the land should be restored to the possession of the tenant.

At this stage it will be convenient to mention that in the original application the tenant had not only asked for the restoration of the possession of the land but had also claimed compensation for the loss sustained by him by reason of the fact that he could not cultivate the land for two years. He claimed a sum of Rs. 2,000 on the above account. He also claimed another sum of Rs. 400 for bringing the land under proper cultivation by removing the weeds etc.

So far as the prayer for compensation is concerned, the Revenue Tribunal sent the case back to the Sub-Divisional Officer for settling the amount of compensation. The order of the Revenue Tribunal was passed on March 13, 1958. Keshao, the original landholder died on May 29, 1958. Dhananjaya, the son of the deceased Keshao, filed the present application on August 25, 1958. He stated that he was not aware of the decision of the Revenue Tribunal and that he came to know about the same in June 1958. He has, therefore, prayed for the condonation of the delay in filing the said application.

Mr. Kathalay, the learned counsel for the petitioners, contended that the Revenue Tribunal was wrong in holding that for a valid termination of the lease it is necessary to have the order of the Sub-Divisional Officer. He argued that this question had been concluded by the decision of the Bombay High Court, Nagpur Bench, in Tarabai v. B'bay Rev. Tribunal.¹ He also pointed out that the finding of the Additional Deputy Commissioner which was upheld by the Revenue Tribunal was to the effect that as a matter of fact the landholder started cultivating the land with effect from April 1953. That being the case, he argued that the landholder must be deemed to have cultivated the land for two years 1953-54 and 1954-55. He further contended that although the land was sold in the middle of January 1955 no agricultural operations remained to be done and that, therefore, the period of two years must be deemed to have been completed before the date of sales.

It is clear that the view taken by the Revenue Tribunal viz. that even for the termination of the lease under s. 9(1) it is necessary that there should be an order of the Revenue Officer under s. 8(1)(g) is wrong. This question was considered by this High Court and it was held that the right of the landholder to terminate the lease under s. 9(1) was in no way fettered by the provisions of s. 8(1)(g). Emphasis was laid on the opening words of s. 9 to the effect "Notwithstanding anything contained in section 8". In view of the above decision we must hold that the tenancy was rightly determined as soon as the landholder gave a notice under s. 9(1), particularly so because the tenant did not make any application under sub-s. (3) of s. 9.

We are also bound by the finding of fact recorded in the Revenue proceedings, namely, that the landholder secured the possession of the land sometime in April 1953. Reliance was placed on the crop statements for the years 1953-54 and 1954-55 which shows that Keshao raised crops for both the years 1953-54 and 1954-55. The Additional Deputy Commissioner based his finding that Keshao cultivated the land for both the years mainly on the entries made in the crop statements referred to above. The Additional Deputy Commissioner seems to have assumed that Keshao reaped the harvest for the year 1954-55. It must, however, be pointed out that no evidence was led to show that as a matter of fact the crops were really harvested by Keshao. The crop statement does not give any indication as to whether Keshao actually harvested the crops. At best it shows that he raised the crops for that year. Admittedly he sold the land in the middle of January 1955, and Mr. Kathalay argued that crops like juar, bajra etc. are harvested before the middle of January. It is significant that copies of the sale-deeds have not been produced. We do not know what provisions were made in the sale-deed and whether possession was delivered to the vendee with or without standing crops. Even assuming that the crops were harvested by Keshao for the year 1954-55 before he entered into the sale transaction, still the question to be considered is whether that fulfils the conditions laid down in sub-s. (6) of s. 9 of the Act. The relevant part of sub-s. (6) runs thus:—

"If on re-entering upon any land after termination of the lease of a protected lessee in accordance with this section, a landholder fails at any time during such period as may be prescribed to utilise the land for the purpose for which the lease was terminated, the dispossessed lessee may apply to the Revenue Officer to put him in possession of the land from the commencement of the agricultural year next following;..."

The purpose for which the lease is terminated is mentioned in sub-s. (1) and it is that the landlord required the land for cultivating the same personally. The period has been prescribed in r. 9 as follows:—

"The period for the purpose of sub-section (6) of section 9 shall be two years from the date of re-entry by the landholder."

Mr. Kathalay contended that the expression "two years" should be construed to mean two cultivating seasons. We are not prepared to accept this argument in view of the following considerations.

The first point to be noted is that the date of the commencement of the period of two years has been clearly stated in the rule itself and that is the date of the re-entry by the landholder. Two years are to be computed from this specific and definite date. The re-entry may take place at any time of the season. It may be at the beginning of the season, it may be at the middle, or even it may be at the end of the season. If the rule of two seasons is applied, then in some cases the period of two years would be shortened to less than two years, whereas in others it may be lengthened for more than two years. If the period of commencement is indefinite, then the date of termination also must be equally indefinite. Secondly, if Mr. Kathalay's argument were accepted, then there would be different periods for different kinds of lands, depending on the nature of the crops raised and the period required for the harvesting of the crops. In respect of some lands the crops will be harvested in December, whereas, particularly in respect of lands in which the second crops are grown the period of harvesting would be as late as February or March of the next year. It is impossible to believe that different periods would be contemplated by the Legislature for the same purpose. Thirdly, the words in sub-s. (6) "a landholder fails at any time during such period as may be prescribed" indicate that the landholder is expected to cultivate the land during the entire period so prescribed. The words "at any time during such period" are significant and suggest that the failure of the landholder to cultivate the land even for a short period will entail the consequence of forfeiture. Fourthly, the period of two years that has been fixed in r. 9 is the minimum period during which the landholder is expected to cultivate the land personally after taking over the land from the tenant on the pretext of personal cultivation. In other words, that period seems to have been prescribed to test the bona fides of the landholder. It is true that the rule does not in terms prohibit the transfer or sale of the land before the lapse of two years from the date of re-entry, but the fact that lands have been sold is conclusive that at any rate after the sale the landholder would be incapable of cultivating the land personally for himself unless there is a stipulation in the sale-deed that the landlord was to relinquish the possession at some later date mentioned in the deed itself. Prima facie, therefore, the fact of sale shows that the landholder would be putting himself beyond the possibility of fulfilling the requirement of personal cultivation. In that view of the case it is clear that the conditions laid down in sub-s. (6) of s. 9 have not been fulfilled by the landholder. We must, therefore, hold that he has not utilized the land for the purpose for which he obtained possession thereof, i.e. personal cultivation, for the prescribed period.

Mr. Kathalay suggested that the case should be sent back to the Sub-Divisional Officer for an enquiry as to when the crops were harvested in the year 1954-55 and as to what has been the practice or custom prevailing in that locality regarding the harvesting of the type of crops mentioned in the crop statement. In the view that we have taken any enquiry into the above question would be wholly unnecessary and futile.

Mr. Kathalay pointed out that according to the Revenue Tribunal the period of two years was not completed because the landholder could not be deemed to be in lawful cultivation for the year 1953-54 and his cultivation would be lawful only from June 1954 when there was an order for the termination of the lease. He complained that this Court would be upholding the decision of the Tribunal on the ground that the period of 1954-55 was not completed which is an entirely new and different ground. There is no substance in that grievance. It is open to us to uphold the final conclusion of the Tribunal altogether on new and different grounds which emerge from the record, and we do not require any fresh material.

The last question to be considered is what should be the basis on which the compensation is to be awarded to the tenant after he is restored to possession under sub-s. (6). Under that sub-section the dispossessed tenant is entitled to claim compensation, but the sub-section does not specify as to what kind of compensation the tenant is entitled to and for what purpose. Apparently the tenant had claimed compensation for the value of the crops which he would have raised had he continued to be in possession for the years in question. In other words, according to the tenant he would be entitled to be restituted, that is to say, not only he is entitled to be put in possession of the land but also to be compensated for the loss of the profits that he has sustained due to his remaining out of possession. It is however clear from the wording of sub-s (6) that the tenant would be entitled to be restored to possession after the date of the order passed in that behalf and from the commencement of the next agricultural year. That means that the right of the tenant to claim compensation flows from the order passed in that respect and begins from the next agricultural year. The claim for restitution is founded on the basis that a lawful claimant who is entitled to immediate possession has been kept out of the same. That position does not obtain when an order under sub-s. (6) has been passed in favour of the tenant for restoration of the possession. Therefore, the word "compensation" will have to be construed in a restricted sense, namely, that the tenant would be entitled to compensation for the damage caused by injury to the field. That means that the tenant's claim for compensation for taking out the weeds would be justifiable and can be allowed to the extent of its proof. There will, however, be no legal basis for the claim either for the income of the land or for the value of the crops for two years.

The result is that the application substantially fails. Subject to what we have said regarding compensation the rule is discharged. No order as to costs.

Order accordingly.

CRIMINAL APPELLATE.

RATANCHAND RADHAKISONDAS v. THE STATE.*

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898); Sec. 154—Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), Sec. 30—Bombay Sales Tax Act (Bom. III of 1953), Secs. 9 proviso (1), 12—Bombay Sales Tax (Registration, Licensing and Authorisation) Rules, 1954, Rule 13(2)—First information report in cognizable case reduced to writing but not signed by person giving it—Whether such information inadmissible in evidence—"K" Form of Bombay Sales Tax Office whether "valuable security" within s. 30, Indian Penal Code—Whether fact that purchasing dealer giving "K" Form not a licensed dealer makes Form not a "valuable security."

Under s. 154 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, the condition as to a first information report being reduced to writing and that it shall be signed by the person giving it, is a mere matter of procedure and failure to observe the procedure as to signature will not make the information given, if it is reduced to writing, inadmissible.

The "K" Form of the Bombay Sales Tax Office which contains a declaration that the goods purchased are intended for resale, creates the legal right in the purchasing dealer to get exemption from payment of general sales tax as provided under cl. (1) of the proviso to s. 9 of the Bombay Sales Tax Act, 1953, and is a valuable security within the definition of that term under s. 30 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860. The mere fact that the purchasing dealer has no licence under s. 12 of the Act will not make the "K" Form furnished by him not a valuable security under s. 30 of the Code.

GOKHALE J. Criminal Appeal No. 1491 of 1958 is an appeal by one Ratanchand Radhakisondas against his convictions under s. 471 read with s. 467 and under s. 420 of the Indian Penal Code. The charge against the accused was that on November 12, 1956, at Bombay he fraudulently or dishonestly used as genuine a certain document purporting to be a valuable security, viz., "K" Form of Bombay Sales Tax Office, which he knew or had reason to believe at the time he used it to be a forged document and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 471 read with s. 467 of the Indian Penal Code. The second charge against him was that at the same time and place and in the course of the same transaction, he cheated one Ratilal Wadilal, partner of Shantilal and Company, by dishonestly inducing him to deliver poplin cloth valued at Rs. 884-1-0 to the accused without payment of General Sales Tax and which cloth was the property of the said Ratilal Wadilal and thus committed an offence punishable under s. 420 of the Indian Penal Code. The allegations against the appellant were that on November 12, 1956, he approached Ratilal Wadilal, a partner in the firm of Shantilal & Co., with a representation that he represented a firm named Manmal Kundanmal either as a proprietor or as a representative, stating that he was authorized to make purchases of goods on behalf of Manmal Kundanmal free of general sales tax, as he was a licensed dealer, held a registration certificate and was purchasing the goods in question for the purpose of resale to other persons. Under cl. (1) of the proviso to s. 9 of the Bombay Sales Tax Act, 1953, no general sales tax is to be levied on the sales of goods to a dealer who holds a licence and furnishes to the selling dealer a certificate in "K" Form. On the representation made by the appellant goods worth Rs. 884-1-0 were sold to him without levy of the general sales tax. According to the prosecution, the accused had knowledge that the "K" form which he was furnishing was a forged "K" form that constituted a valuable security, inasmuch as he would be able to purchase the goods that he was purchasing without payment of general sales tax. The representation made by the accused to Shantilal & Co. was, according to the prosecution, a false and fraudulent representation, on the basis of which they parted with goods worth Rs. 884-1-0 on November 12, 1956. It appears that there was another firm in the Mulji Jetha Market called B. Jayantilal & Co. and certain investigations were being made by the Sales Tax Officer, in the course of which the Officer came across a similar "K" form in the name of Manmal Kundanmal and in the course of a cross check the Sales Tax authorities realised that the firm of Manmal Kundanmal had altogether a different business and did not deal in cloth. That was why further inquiries came to be made with B. Jayantilal and on November 29, 1956, Kshatriya, Sales Tax Inspector, located the present appellant sitting at some place. A complaint was filed on December 4, 1956, and a raid was organized in the course of which, according to the prosecution, the appellant was found in possession of a bag containing several forms of a similar type which indicated that the appellant was intending to use them and also that he was responsible for furnishing this form given to Shantilal & Co. on November 12, 1956. On these allegations, the accused was charged as already stated above.

The defence of the appellant was that he had no dealings of any kind with Ratilal Wadilal of Shantilal & Co. According to him, he was a petty commission agent or Dalal working in the Mulji Jetha Market and it was his case that he was making purchases of small quantities of cloth at the instance of customers but that he was not a licenced dealer. As he used to move about in the Mulji Jetha Market, he was taking tea on December 4, when the raid was made, and the place where he was sitting was really a tea-shop. According to him, Jayantilal Punamchand Parekh of the firm of B. Jayantilal & Co. happened to come there for tea, took his seat beside the accused, kept his bag there and told him that he was going to answer a call of nature and left the spot. Within 5 or 7 minutes, the raiding party came and foisted Jayantilal's bag on him. He denied that he had any connection with the transaction on which the prosecution relied or with the bag which he stated was foisted upon him at the instance of Jayantilal.

The accused was tried by the learned Additional Sessions Judge, in the Court of Sessions for Greater Bombay with the aid of a jury which returned a unanimous verdict of guilty on both the charges levelled against the accused. Accepting that verdict, the learned Judge convicted the appellant under s. 471 read with s. 467 of the Indian Penal Code and sentenced him to rigorous imprisonment for two years and a fine of Rs. 300 in default rigorous imprisonment for three months. He also convicted the appellant under s. 420 of the Indian Penal Code and sentenced him to rigorous imprisonment for 18 months on that charge. He directed that the sentences on these charges should run concurrently. That is why the accused has filed the present appeal.

In this appeal, Mr. Mirchandani, learned advocate appearing on behalf of the appellant, has not been able to point out any substantial misdirection or non-direction in the learned Judge's charge to the jury. The only misdirection of which Mr. Mirchandani made a serious grievance was about the use of the first information report. According to Mr. Mirchandani, the first information report in this case consists of the complaint made by Athale, Sales Tax Officer, Enforcement Branch, Sales Tax Department, at the Princess Street Police Station on December 4, 1956. It is admitted by Athale that his signature was not taken upon this complaint. According to Mr. Mirchandani, the signature not having been taken on the first information report as required under s. 154 of the Criminal Procedure Code, that first information report was inadmissible in evidence and since the learned trial Judge has referred to it in his charge to the jury, he has asked the jury to consider and rely on a document which is inadmissible and has thus misdirected the jury. We do not think there is any substance in this argument. Under s. 154 of the Criminal Procedure Code, every information relating to the commission of a cognizable offence, if given orally to an officer in charge of a police station, has to be reduced to writing by him or under his direction and has to be read over to the informant and every such information, whether given in writing or reduced to writing has to be signed by the person giving it and the substance thereof has to be entered in a book to be kept by the officer in such form as the State Government may prescribe in this behalf. Now, the admissibility of a first information report depends not on the fact that it is signed by the person making it, but on the fact that a first information report given in writing or taken down by a police officer would be a part of the official record as the substance of such information is to be entered in a book kept by the station officer in the form prescribed and that may attract the operation of the provisions of s. 35 of the Indian Evidence Act. See Emperor v. Chittar Singh.¹ The condition as to its being reduced to writing and that it shall be signed by the person giving it seems to us to be a mere matter of procedure, and failure to observe the procedure as to signature would not make the information given, if it is reduced to writing, inadmissible. It is well settled, however, that a statement of an informant contained in the first information report is not substantive evidence. The information is only admissible to corroborate or contradict the testimony of the informant when he gives his evidence in Court. The object of the first information report is to obtain early information of any alleged criminal activity, to record the circumstances before there is time for such circumstances to be forgotten or embellished, and the report can be put in evidence when the informant is examined, if it is desired to do so. See Emperor v. Nazir Ahmed.² In the present case, Athale, the Sales Tax Officer, has deposed that he lodged the present complaint on December 4, 1956, at the Princess Street Police Station, that it was reduced to writing and that the same was read over to him though his signature was not taken upon it. He also stated that the statement which was read over to him in Court was the one made by him and was correctly recorded. In our view, therefore, the argument of Mr. Mirchandani that the first information in the present case should not have been read out to the jury because it was not signed by Athale and hence becomes inadmissible is untenable.

Then Mr. Mirchandani has contended that the learned trial Judge has misdirected the jury as regards the contents of the first information report and his grievance is that the first information report does not contain any reference to any bag to be found with the accused. Now, it has to be remembered that the complaint was lodged by Athale, the Sales Tax Officer, before the raid was effected and what was indicated in that information was that a certain person would be sitting at a particular place with certain things in his possession. Thereafter the raid came to be made by the police and in that raid certain things were found in the possession of the accused. In his charge to the jury, at one place, the learned Judge has undoubtedly stated that the raid was arranged in pursuance of the first information report which was lodged and, as alleged in the first information, the accused happened to be found there with a bag in his possession. Mr. Mirchandani's grievance is that since no bag has been actually referred to in the first information report, there has been a misdirection which has introduced an infirmity in the charge. This argument cannot be accepted. The learned Judge referred to the evidence of Athale and Kshatriya and read out the first information to the jury stating that it could not be treated as substantive evidence and thereafter he pointed out as to how in pursuance of the information a raid took place and the accused came to be found in possession of certain things. According to the first information report, the accused was sitting on the first floor, Sanchagalli, Mulji Jetha Market and was issuing 'K' forms. After the raid was carried out, according to the prosecution evidence, in fact the accused was found in possession of a bag which contained amongst other papers similar type of 'K' forms. Merely because the learned Judge at one place, instead of referring to the contents of the bag as disclosed in the evidence, stated that as anticipated and as alleged in the first information report the accused was found with a bag in his possession, we do not think that there has been any misdirection as to seriously prejudice the minds of the jury.

Mr. Mirchandani then contended that Ratilal's evidence was full of contradictions and discrepancies, but the learned Judge, according to him, has gone into too many details which were calculated to confuse the minds of the jury, instead of drawing their pointed attention to the contradictions and discrepancies in the prosecution evidence on which the defence relied. We are not impressed by this argument either. The learned Judge has referred to the evidence of all the three prosecution witnesses at some length. He has also referred to the discrepancies between the evidence of Athale on the one hand and the evidence of Kshatriya, Sales Tax Officer, and Shaikh, Sub-Inspector of Police, on the other. He has also referred to the discrepancies between the evidence of Kshatriya and Shaikh on the one hand and the evidence of the panch witness on the other. The latter discrepancies related to the question whether at the time of the raid the bag was in the hand of the accused or the accused was running away with the bag. The other contradictions and discrepancies in the evidence have also been referred to in the learned Judge's charge to the jury. We do not, therefore, think that there is either any misdirection or non-direction in the charge to the jury delivered by the learned Judge when he dealt with this part of the prosecution evidence on the record.

Then Mr. Mirchandani contends that Jayantilal who gave information to the Sales Tax Officer has been proved to be a shady person and the defence has placed on the record a document which was admitted by the learned trial Judge, which shows that Jayantilal was convicted on a charge of being in possession of counterfeit coins. But Jayantilal was not examined on behalf of the prosecution and Mr. Mirchandani says that the learned Judge's charge has failed to lay the correct emphasis on the failure of the prosecution to examine Jayantilal. This argument also is without any substance. It appears from the evidence that the Sales Tax Officer obtained information against the present appellant while he was making investigation in connection with the dealings of Jayantilal & Co. The prosecution has not examined Jayantilal, but Athale, the Sales Tax Officer, has deposed that Jayantilal had closed his business, that there was a case of evasion of sales-tax against B. Jayantilal for the period commencing from April 1, 1954, and that investigation into it was pending at the time and that he did not know where Jayantilal was at the time he gave evidence. The learned trial Judge referred to this part of Athale's evidence and he also told the jury that it was for them to consider whether Jayantilal was a material witness who could have spoken on material points and whether he had been deliberately kept back by the prosecution, and the learned Judge also told them that if that was their opinion they should draw an adverse inference against the prosecution. In our view, therefore, there is no misdirection or non-direction on this point in the learned Judge's charge to the jury.

As there are no misdirections or non-directions in the charge to the jury, it would not be open to us to examine the correctness of the verdict of the jury by going through the evidence ourselves.

But then Mr. Mirchandani has challenged the conviction of the accused under s. 471 read with s. 467 of the Indian Penal Code on the ground that form 'K' which was alleged to have been used by the appellant would not be a valuable security within the meaning of s. 30 of the Indian Penal Code. Section 467 of the Indian Penal Code deals amongst other things with the offence of forging a document purporting to be a valuable security and prescribes punishment therefor, and s. 471 prescribes the same punishment for the offence of fraudulently or dishonestly using as genuine any document which a person knows or has reason to believe to be a forged document. Under s. 30 of the Code, the words "valuable security" are defined as denoting a document which is, or purports to be, a document whereby any legal right is created, extended, transferred, restricted, extinguished or released, or whereby any person acknowledges that he lies under legal liability, or has not a certain legal right. Mr. Mirchandani has pointed out that according to the prosecution, the appellant is alleged to have tendered to Ratilal Wadilal a 'K' form on behalf of Mamal Kundanmal which enabled him to purchase goods worth Rs. 884-1-0 without paying general sales tax. But Mr. Mirchandani contends that what enabled the appellant to make this purchase without payment of general sales tax was not the 'K' form, but that the right to get such an exemption arose by virtue of the Sales Tax Act itself. Section 9 of the Bombay Sales Tax Act, 1953, deals with the levy of general sales tax and it provides that subject to the provisions of s. 7, there shall be levied a general sales tax on the turnover of sales of goods specified in column 1 of Schedule B at the rates, if any, specified against them in column 3 of the said Schedule. Section 7 provides that no tax shall be payable on the sales or purchases of certain goods. Section 9 is subject to the provisions of this section. There are three clauses to the proviso to s. 9, and in the present case, we are concerned with cl. (1) of the proviso to s. 9 which states that no general sales tax shall be levied on the sale of goods to a dealer who holds a licence and furnishes to the selling dealer a certificate in the prescribed form declaring inter alia that the goods so sold to him are intended for resale by him. Section 45 of the Act gives the State Government power to make rules for carrying out the purposes of the Act and under r. 13(2) of the Bombay Sales Tax (Registration, Licensing and Authorization) Rules, 1954, it is provided that a certificate for the purpose of cl. (1) of the proviso to s. 9 shall be in form 'K'. Under cl. (1) of the proviso to s. 9, the dealer must hold a licence and must furnish to the selling dealer a certificate in the 'K' form declaring inter alia that the goods sold to him are intended for resale by him. It is then alone that he would be entitled to be exempted from levy of the general sales tax. Mr. Mirchandani's argument is that Ratilal's evidence shows that the accused had shown him a licence in the name of Mamal Kundanmal firm and also the registration only once when he had the first transaction with him in 1955 and he relied on the licence shown to him as a genuine one. Thereafter the accused had dealings with his shop on 10 or 12 occasions prior to the transaction in question. But he stated that on subsequent occasions he did not insist on seeing the licence of the accused because he had seen that once and so he merely accepted the 'K' forms. Mr. Mirchandani says that the 'K' form on which the prosecution relies and on basis of which the accused purchased the goods in the present case cannot be considered as a valuable security because the right to be exempted from the payment of general sales tax is conferred by the statute itself and, therefore, the furnishing of the 'K' form duly filled in would not bring the accused within s. 467 of the Indian Penal Code. This argument cannot be accepted. The Sales Tax Act provides for the levy of general sales tax under s. 9. The goods mentioned in s. 7 would be free from levy of the general sales tax. The proviso to s. 9 mentions certain other exemptions and the first clause of the proviso enables a dealer who holds a licence to purchase goods without paying general sales tax, if he furnishes to the selling dealer a certificate in the 'K' form declaring that the goods sold to him are intended for resale by him. What enables the purchasing dealer to get exemption from the levy of general sales tax is the furnishing of a certificate in the 'K' form containing a declaration that the goods sold to him are intended for resale by him. As the 'K' form prescribed itself shows, besides mentioning the licence under s. 12 of the Bombay Sales Tax Act, there has to be a declaration that the goods purchased are intended for resale. It is apparent, therefore, that the 'K' form containing the due declaration creates the legal right in the purchasing dealer to get exemption from payment of general sales tax as provided under cl. (1) of the proviso to s. 9 of the Sales Tax Act.

In *Superintendent and Remembrancer of Legal Affairs, Bengal v. Daulatram Mudi*³ it was held that the original of the transit pass, without which no forest produce could be removed, was a valuable security within the meaning of s. 30 of the Indian Penal Code because it creates or purports to create a right to transport forest produce, an action which, without the transit pass, would be an offence punishable with fine and imprisonment. In *Durgadas Tulsiram v. State*⁴ it was held by a division bench of this Court that an import licence would be a valuable security because it created a right in the licensee to import goods. In the present case also, though cl. (1) of the proviso to s. 9 of the Sales Tax Act provides for an exemption from the payment of the general sales tax, it is the certificate in the prescribed 'K' form containing a declaration that the goods sold to the dealer are intended for resale by him that confers on him the right to purchase these goods without the levy of general sales tax. It is true that the purchasing dealer must be a licensed dealer before he can furnish the necessary certificate. In the present case, it would appear that the licence produced by the accused on the first occasion was in the name of Manmal Kundanmal who deal in gold and silver and with whom the accused had no connection. The 'K' form furnished by the accused was, therefore, a forged one and that was accepted by Ratilal Wadilal as a genuine certificate required under cl. (1) of the proviso to s. 9. The mere fact, however, that the accused had no licence would not make the 'K' form furnished by him not a valuable security under s. 30 of the Indian Penal Code. In our judgment, therefore, the certificate in form 'K' which is alleged to have been furnished to the firm of Shantilal & Co. by the accused on November 12, 1956, was a valuable security within the definition of that term under s. 30 of the Code. There is, therefore, no illegality in the conviction recorded against the accused under s. 471 read with s. 467 of the Indian Penal Code.

We must, therefore, confirm the convictions of the appellant under s. 471 read with s. 467 as well as under s. 420 of the Indian Penal Code.

As regards the sentences imposed on the accused, Mr. Mirchandani appealed to us to reduce these sentences on the ground that they were excessive. He does not dispute the position that as the convictions of the accused are confirmed, the appellant is guilty of an offence which has enabled him to cheat the State of its revenue. But he points out that there was another case of a similar character against the present appellant and that case is the subject of the other appeal which is also before us, viz., Criminal Appeal No. 124 of 1959. In that case, which was also tried in the Court of Session for Greater Bombay, with the aid of a jury, it appears that the jury returned a verdict of not guilty on the charge under s. 471 read with s. 467 of the Indian Penal Code, as regards the 'K' form. The accused was also charged with fabricating the 'N' form and on that charge also the jury returned a verdict of not guilty under s. 471 read with s. 467 of the Indian Penal Code. However, they unanimously found him guilty under s. 471 read with s. 465 in respect of the 'K' and 'N' forms and also under s. 420 of the Code. It appears that in that case by the use of these two forms the accused was alleged to have cheated one Diwanchand Bishandas, partner of Bishandas Diwanchand, cloth merchants, Bombay, by purchasing artificial cloth of the value of Rs. 2,075-11-3 without payment of general sales tax. Mr. Mirchandani says that in the present case the accused purchased without paying general sales tax, goods worth only Rs. 884-1-0, while the goods purchased by him in the other case are worth about 2½ times the value of the goods in the present case, so that the loss to the State in the amount of tax would be larger, and even then the learned Additional Sessions

Judge has imposed on him, in that case, a sentence of six month's rigorous imprisonment on each count under s. 471 read with s. 465 and a sentence of one year's rigorous imprisonment on the third charge under s. 420 of the Indian Penal Code, and while doing so, Mr. Mirchandani points out, the learned Judge observed that he could not help feeling that the accused was a willing tool in the hands of some bigger merchants and that was why he was imposing on the accused a rather lenient sentence. The other appeal is also before us for hearing to-day, and there seems to be some force in what Mr. Mirchandani has urged, though in the present case the conviction is under s. 471 read with s. 467 while in the companion appeal it is under s. 471 read with s. 465 of the Indian Penal Code. In our view, the ends of justice would be met if we reduce to some extent the sentences imposed on the accused on both the charges in the present case. We, accordingly, confirm the conviction of the appellant under s. 471 read with s. 467 of the Indian Penal Code, but reduce the substantive sentence imposed on him with regard to this charge to rigorous imprisonment for one year, but maintain the sentence of fine and the sentence in default of payment of fine. His conviction under s. 420 of the Indian Penal Code is also confirmed, but the sentence in connection with this conviction is also reduced to rigorous imprisonment for one year. Both these sentences will run concurrently.

[NAGPUR BENCH]

Before Mr. Justice Mudholkar and Mr. Justice Naik.

SHRIMATI AMBI PUNDALIK v. PUNDALIK SHANKAR.*

Central Provinces and Berar Courts Act (I of 1917), Sec. 20—Hindu Marriage Act, (XXV of 1955), Secs. 19, 3(b), 28—Suits Valuation Act (VII of 1887), Sec. 9 and Rule 311 framed under Act—Additional District Judge deciding proceedings under Hindu Marriage Act—Whether appeal from such decision lies to District Court or High Court.

Under s. 20(c) of the Central Provinces and Berar Courts Act, 1917, an appeal from a decision in a matrimonial proceeding under the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, given by the District Judge or by an Additional District Judge lies to the High Court Balakotayya v. Nagayya,¹ referred to.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

R. N. Desphande, for the applicants.

W. L. Khare, for the opponent.

NAIK J. This is an application in revision from the judgment of the District Judge, Amravati, holding that the appeal preferred before him in matrimonial proceedings under the Hindu Marriage Act was maintainable. The circumstances which have led to this revision application may be briefly stated as follows: The husband started proceedings for restitution of conjugal rights under the Hindu Marriage Act against his wife. That petition having been dismissed by the Third Additional District Judge, the husband went up in appeal to the District Court in Civil Appeal No. 10-A of 1957. A preliminary objection was raised on behalf of the wife contending that the appeal did not lie to the District Court, but that the appeal should have been properly filed before the High Court. On this preliminary objection, the District Judge, after examining the relevant provisions, came to the conclusion that the appeal to the District Court was competent. It is from that decision that the present revision application has been directed. The application was heard by Mr. Justice Badkas. He found that appeals are being filed in the High Court from the decisions of the additional Judges in a number of cases and, therefore, the question is of general importance. He has, therefore, referred the matter to a Division Bench for a more authoritative decision.

In order to appreciate the question of the competency of the appeal it is necessary to refer first to the provisions of the Hindu Marriage Act. Section 19 of that Act provides that every petition under this Act shall be presented to the District Court within the local limits of whose ordinary original civil jurisdiction the marriage was solemnized or the husband and wife reside or last resided together. The definition of a District Court is contained in cl. (b) of s. 3 of the same Act under which a District Court means the principal civil Court of original jurisdiction, and includes any other civil Court which may be specified by the State Government, by notification in the Official Gazette, as having jurisdiction in respect of the matters dealt with in this Act. The only other provision to which reference need be made is s. 28 of the Act, which lays down that all decrees and orders made by the Court in any proceeding under this Act may be appealed from under any law for the time being in force. It will thus be seen that the District Court has been constituted as the Court having exclusive jurisdiction under the Act and it will continue to exercise such jurisdiction until the State specifies any other civil Court as having jurisdiction in these matters. So far as this area is concerned, no notification has yet been issued specifying any other civil Court as a District Court for the purpose of the Hindu Marriage Act. It would also appear that the District Court cannot transfer the proceedings to any other civil Court for trial. Of course, this does not affect the power of the District Judge, as the officer presiding over the District Court to refer the proceedings for decision to the Additional District Judge attached to the same Court. The jurisdiction of the Additional District Judge, however, does not stem from the order of reference or distribution of business, but from the fact that the Additional District Judge is part and parcel of the District Court.

In view of the provisions of s. 28 of the Hindu Marriage Act in order to determine the forum to which appeals are to be preferred we have to consider the provisions of other enactments. The relevant enactment in this respect is the Central Provinces and Berar Courts Act, 1917. That act contemplates two classes of Courts; (i) the Court of the Civil Judge and (ii) the District Court. Section 20 of the Act deals with the appellate jurisdiction of the Courts. Clause (a) relates to an appeal from the decree or order of the Court of a Civil Judge and it lays down that first appeal would lie to the District Court. Clause (b) is divided into two parts and it relates to an appeal from the decree or order of an Additional Judge. Part (i) provides that where the value of the suit or original proceeding in such Court does not exceed ten thousand rupees, an appeal shall lie to the District Court and part (ii) provides that an appeal shall lie to the High Court where the value of such suit or original proceeding exceeds ten thousand rupees. That shows that an additional District Court deals with suits or original proceedings the value of which is below Rs. 10,000 as also those where the value exceeds Rs. 10,000. The argument advanced by Mr. Khare was based on the provisions of subcls. (i) and (ii) of cl. (b) of s. 20 of the C. P. and Berar Courts Act. He contended that since the decision appealed from is that of the Additional District Court we have to consider the valuation of the suit or proceeding from which the appeal has been preferred. He then drew our attention to r. 311 framed under s. 9 of the Suits Valuation Act which is in the following terms:

the Suits Valuation Act, 1887, and the Central Provinces Courts Act, 1917, be treated as if the subject-matter of such suits were of the value of four hundred rupees:—

(1) suits for the restitution of conjugal rights, for declaration of the validity of marriage, or for a divorce;

(2) suits for the custody or guardianship of a minor; and

(3) suits for declaration that an adoption is valid or invalid."

Mr. Khare, therefore, contended that the valuation of a proceeding for restitution of conjugal rights is an artificial value fixed by this rule, which is Rs. 400. If this argument is correct then it will logically follow in view of the provisions of s. 20(b)(i) and (ii) of the C. P. and Berar Courts Act that the appeal will necessarily lie to the District Court.

We have, however, to take into account some other factors in deciding this question. The first point to be noted is that r. 311 speaks of suits and does not refer to other proceedings of civil nature. This rule has been framed under s. 9 of the Suits Valuation Act and s. 9 also refers only to suits and not to other proceedings. The question, therefore, is whether a petition instituted under the Hindu Marriage Act can be regarded as a suit within the meaning of s. 9 of the Suits Valuation Act or within the meaning of r. 311 of the rules framed thereunder.

It is significant to note that the Legislature has deliberately used the word 'petition', and proceedings under the Hindu Marriage Act are to be initiated by a petition. The word 'suit' is so common that it is impossible to conceive that it would escape the attention of the framers of the law. It is noteworthy that the word 'suit' has been used in respect of matrimonial proceedings under the Indian Divorce Act. That shows that the word 'petition' must have been deliberately employed by the Legislature with the object of distinguishing these proceedings from ordinary suits.

Mr. Khare relying on the decision of the Madras High Court reported in *Balakotayya v. Nagayya*¹ contended that the word suit should be extended to any proceeding in a Court of Justice by which an individual pursues that remedy in a Court of Justice which the law affords him; that the modes of proceeding may be various, but that if a right is litigated between the parties in a Court of Justice the proceeding by which the decision of the Court is sought is a suit. In view of the fact that the Legislature has deliberately used the word 'petition' in the Hindu Marriage Act it is not possible for us to accept the extended meaning of suit as propounded by the Madras High Court in the above ruling. If that is so then the provisions of r. 311 will have to be confined only to suits and cannot be extended to petitions under the Hindu Marriage Act. In that view of the case it is not necessary to take into account the artificial valuation put on a matrimonial proceeding by the provisions of r. 311.

Then the question is whether it is possible or necessary to put any valuation upon the claims made in proceedings under the Hindu Marriage Act. Reliefs claimed in these proceedings are either for restitution of conjugal rights or for divorce or for custody of wife and children and so on. These reliefs are in the very nature of things incapable of valuation in terms of the market value. Further, when a special Court has been created as the Court having exclusive jurisdiction it is hardly necessary to put pecuniary valuation on the relief claimed. Pecuniary valuation becomes necessary to locate the Court where the proceedings are to be instituted. It is also necessary for choosing the Court of lowest grade, because, under s. 15, Civil Procedure Code, where there is concurrent jurisdiction vested in more than one Court, the suit has got to be instituted in the Court of the lowest grade. Such a problem does not arise when a Court of exclusive jurisdiction has been created for certain proceedings under a statute. That being the case, the decrees and orders passed in proceedings under the Hindu Marriage Act cannot fall in any of the categories specified in s. 20 of the C.P. and Berar Courts Act. Therefore, whether the decision has been given by the District Judge himself or by an Additional District Judge, it will have to be treated as a decision of the District Court, and under cl. (c) of s. 20, an appeal from such a decision would necessarily lie to the High Court.

The Legislature has deliberately provided that the proceedings under the Hindu Marriage Act must be instituted in the District Court. Of course, under s. 3 of the Hindu Marriage Act, it is open to the State Government to specify any other civil Court as a District Court. When that is done, different considerations would arise. For instance, if the Court of a Civil Judge is designated as a District Court for the purpose of the Hindu Marriage Act, then naturally appeals from the decisions of such Courts will lie to the District Court under cl. (a) of s. 20 of the C.P. and Berar Courts Act.

We, therefore, hold that the appeal filed before the District Court is not competent and direct that the same should be returned to the parties for being presented to the proper Court.

Costs of this application will be costs in the cause. The rule is made absolute.

Rule made absolute.

RAKHAMA SITARAM GHADGE v. LAXMAN, SITARAM GHADGE.*

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), Sec. 14—Specific Relief Act (I of 1877), Sec. 21—Agreement to sell immoveable property in future on demand by party to agreement—Whether such agreement infringes rule against perpetuity.

A bare agreement to sell immoveable property in future on demand by a party to the agreement does not infringe the rule against perpetuity enunciated in s. 14 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882.

Dinkarrao v. Narayan, Harkisandas v. Bai Dhanu' and Basdeo Rai v. Jhagru Rao,' referred to.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

S. J. Jadhav, for the appellant.

G. R. Madbhavi, R. G. Madbhavi and B. O. Thatte, for respondent No. 1.

SHAH J. The dispute in this appeal relates to two lands—survey Nos. 155/5 and 155/6 of the village of Kandali, Taluka Junnar, district Poona. The lands originally belonged to the plaintiff. By a conveyance, dated January 17, 1951, the plaintiff sold these lands to defendant No. 1 for Rs. 500. Defendant No. 1 then executed an agreement in favour of the plaintiff, who it may be noted is his full brother, whereby he contracted to reconvey the lands to the plaintiff at any time on repayment of Rs. 500. On November 13, 1954, the plaintiff served a notice calling upon defendant No. 1 to reconvey the lands pursuant to the agreement dated January 17, 1951, but defendant No. 1 declined to carry out the requisition. The plaintiff then filed Civil Suit No. 16 of 1955 in the Court of the Civil Judge, Junior Division, Junnar, for a decree for specific performance of the agreement. To that suit, Krishnabai—wife of defendant No. 1—was impleaded as defendant No. 2 on the allegation that she was managing the property on behalf of defendant No. 1. The suit was resisted by defendant No. 1 who contended that the condition relating to “re-conveyance of the property at any time” was fraudulently incorporated in the agreement. Defendant No. 1 submitted that it was agreed between the parties that the condition relating to reconveyance of the property was to be enforced within one year only from the date of the agreement. The learned trial Judge negatived the contentions raised by defendant No. 1 and decreed the plaintiff's claim for specific performance. In appeal to the District Court at Poona, the decree passed by the trial Court was confirmed. A second appeal against that decision was summarily dismissed by Mr. Justice Datar. But Mr. Justice Datar thereafter granted leave to defendant No. 1 to appeal under cl. 15 of the Letters Patent.

Mr. Jadhav, who appears on behalf of defendant No. 1, contends that the agreement to reconvey the property to the plaintiff on demand at any time after January 17, 1951, infringes the rule against perpetuity enunciated in s. 14 of the Transfer of Property Act, and on that account the covenant to reconvey the property is void. In support of his contention, Mr. Jadhav relies upon a judgment of a Division Bench of this Court in Dinkarrao v. Narayan.¹ But under the Transfer of Property Act an agreement to sell immoveable property does not, of itself, create any interest in or charge on such property. The rule against perpetuity prohibits the creation of certain remote interests in immoveable property. It is then difficult to appreciate how by an agreement, which does not create an interest in or charge on immoveable property, the rule against perpetuity can be regarded as infringed.

In Dinkarrao's case, a plot of land was agreed to be sold under a deed of sale, dated September 18, 1878, and there was a covenant in the sale-deed that if the vendee or his heirs desired to sell the plot, the same was to be resold to the vendor at the price mentioned in the sale-deed. Relying upon this covenant, the heirs of the vendor took out an Originating Summons for determining the rights of the heirs of the vendee. It was held by Mr. Justice Pratt, that the covenant contained in the sale-deed was personal and created no rights in rem affecting the title of the vendee, and that no declaration of the rights under a personal contract could be made. Against the decision of Mr. Justice Pratt an appeal was preferred and it was held in appeal that the covenant in question was void and the heirs of the vendee were entitled to a declaration to that effect. The Court expressly held that prior to the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, which was applied to the Bombay Presidency as from January 1, 1893, a contract for sale of immoveable property created an equitable interest in the property and made the purchaser the owner in equity, and the covenant for pre-emption in the sale-deed was void as infringing the rule against perpetuities. Macleod C.J. also claimed to approach the case from another angle. He observed that

"...although contracts for the sale of land which can be specifically enforced immediately or contracts creating a right of pre-emption which cannot be specifically enforced until the proper occasion arises in the future do not according to the law in India create an interest in land either equitable or executory, they do create rights which are capable of being enforced with regard to the land in certain circumstances against third parties and to that extent they are not ordinary personal contracts and stand in a category by themselves." (p. 457)

He further observed that the principles which underlie the rule of perpetuities applied to this class of contracts. Mr. Justice Kanga who delivered a supplementary judgment observed that the "...law laid down in London and South Western Railway Co. v. Gomm applies to a contract for sale of immoveable property in India even where the Transfer of Property Act is in force." (p. 464)

But Gomm's case was expressly decided on the ground that under the law applicable to real property in England a contract of sale creates an executory interest or estate and is, therefore, subject to the rule against perpetuities.

The observations made by Macleod C.J. and by Mr. Justice Kanga as to the effect of a contract to sell immoveable property made after the Transfer of Property Act was applied to the area in which the land is situate were evidently obiter and were not necessary for the decision of the case.

In a later judgment of this Court, Harkisandas v. Bai Dhanu,³ the view which was expressed in Dinkarrao's case was not approved. In dealing with the contention that an agreement to sell immoveable property was void as offending against the rule against perpetuity, Mr. Justice Madgavkar expressed concurrence with the judgment of Mr. Justice Sulaiman in Basdeo Rai v. Jhagru Bai.⁴ The Allahabad High Court in Basdeo Rai's case had taken the view that agreements for sale of land or of pre-emption of an obligation arising out of a contract and annexed to the ownership of the land were not void as infringing the rule against perpetuity. Macleod C.J. in Dinkarrao's case expressed the opinion that even though by a contract of sale no interest in land which is the subject-matter of the agreement is created, because the contract is capable of specific performance against third parties in certain cases, the result is that the law in England and India is substantially the same "with regard to the enforcement of the contract". He observed (p. 460):

"...The only difference is that in England the owner of the equitable interest is considered as the owner of the property contracted to be conveyed. But no such result can follow from a contract creating an executory interest. If such a contract purports to do by indirect means what the law forbids to be done directly it is void and the principle is the same in India as in England."

But the possibility of a contract of sale being enforced against a third person acquiring interest in the subject-matter of the agreement does not attract the rule against perpetuity which is restricted in its application to transfers of immoveable property. Nor is the Court on alleged grounds of public policy entitled to extend a statutory rule to classes of property which are not expressly within its purview. If under the statute law of India an agreement to sell immoveable property does not create an interest in that property, it is difficult to hold that because under an agreement one person agrees to sell to another on demand by the latter immoveable property at some indefinite time in future the agreement is impressed with incidents which it does not possess. It is also difficult to appreciate how a contract to sell property in future when demanded by another person "purports to do by indirect means what the law forbids to be done directly."

We are unable to hold that a bare agreement to sell immoveable property in future on demand by a party to the agreement infringes the rule against perpetuities.

Mr. Jadhav then contended that the agreement in question was void on the ground that there was absence of mutuality, and he sought to rely upon the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Mir Sarwarjan v. Fakhruddin Mahomed Chowdhuri.⁵ That was a case in which the guardian of a minor had entered into a contract to purchase immoveable property, and it was held that on the ground of absence of mutuality the contract could not be specifically enforced. We fail to appreciate how this case can have any application to the facts of the present case. In that case it was held that because the contract was not enforceable against the minor it could not be enforced at the instance of the minor. In the present case, defendant No. 1 has solemnly agreed to reconvey the property on payment of Rs. 500 and that was one of the covenants which formed consideration for the sale; and we are unable to see any ground of equity relying on which defendant No. 1 may be entitled to evade his obligation to sell the property. Section 21 of the Specific Relief Act enumerates certain contracts which cannot be specifically enforced, and a contract which may be enforced at a time to be selected by one of the parties thereto and not at the instance of the other is not one of such contracts. We are, therefore, of the view that there is no substance in this alternative contention also.

The appeal, therefore, fails and is dismissed with costs.

CRIMINAL APPELLATE.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. H. K. Chhainani, Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice S. T. Desai.

RAMDAS KIKABHAI v. STATE.*

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Secs. 207A, 173, 287—Whether Magistrate can examine accused for enabling him to explain circumstances appearing in documents referred to in s. 173—Statement of accused recorded by Magistrate after such examination whether admissible in evidence.

Under s. 207A of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, the Magistrate may examine the accused for the purpose of enabling him to explain any circumstances appearing in the documents referred to in s. 173 of the Code. If the Magistrate so examines the accused and records his statement, that statement will be admissible in evidence under s. 287 of the Code.

*State v. Anadi Betankar,*¹ dissented from.

*State v. Dhtrajlal Maneklal,*² referred to.

ONE Ramdas (accused) was a resident of Bajupura in Valod Taluka. He had married the deceased Kavita about five years ago. He was not pulling on well with his wife. He had no issue from her. He, therefore, used to beat her frequently with the result that she began to ask for divorce from him. On the night of December 25, 1957, there was a quarrel between the accused and his wife. He then attempted to commit suicide by pouring kerosene on his clothes and then lighting the same. He received severe burns, on account of which he was detained in the Civil Hospital at Surat for about 6 months. During this period, his wife Kavita used to take food for him to the hospital. The accused was discharged from the hospital a day or two before June 3. He then went back to his village. His mother-in-law, Chhani, used to stay in the hut of one Chhotu Daya, which was at a short distance from the house of the accused. On the evening of June 3, Kavita and Chhani were sitting outside on the Otila of Chhotu's house. The accused went there. He asked Kavita to go to his house for applying medicine and giving him food. She, accordingly, accompanied the accused to his house. Apprehending that the accused might again beat Kavita, Chhani went to the house of the accused some time thereafter, but the accused drove her away. On that night, the accused slept inside his house, while Kavita slept outside in the Pejari of the house. Chhani slept in a cart outside the house of Chhotu Daya. She woke up at about 5 a.m. in the morning. She then heard some noise and went to the house of the accused. She found her daughter lying in the Pejari with severe injuries on her head and mouth. She was unable to speak and she was about to breathe her last. She questioned the accused why he had beaten her daughter. He told her that she had been asking him to give her divorce and that he had given it to her. Chhani then raised cries, on hearing which, one Thakorebhai, who was headmaster of a primary school in a neighbouring village and Chhotubhai and Ranchhod, who lived nearby, went there. They questioned the accused and he told them that Kavita had not been looking after him, that she had not applied medicine to him and that, instead, she had been asking him for a divorce and that, therefore, he had caused injuries on her with a stone. Chhani informed the police patil, Sorabji Framji, who then wrote a report. In this report, he stated that, at about 7 a.m. the accused's mother-in-law Chhani had given him information that the accused had beaten her daughter with a stone on her head and mouth, that her daughter was unable to speak and that she was on the point of death. This report was then sent to the police station at Valod. Kavita died within a short time after she had received the injuries. The police then went to the village and started investigation. On the same day, the accused took the police and the panchas to a place near the hedge in front of his house and from there took out the stone, which was attached. The body of Kavita was then sent for post-mortem examination. Three injuries were found on her person. She had a contused wound at the bridge of the nose and a lacerated wound on her forehead and ecchymosis on both the lips. Her jaw was fractured and some teeth were missing. Below the injury on her head, there was a fracture of the frontal bone. This injury was the cause of the death. In the opinion of Dr. Vyas, who held the post-mortem examination, this injury was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The accused was then sent up for trial on the charge of committing the murder of Kavita. Before the Committing Magistrate, he admitted that he had caused the injuries to his wife, which resulted in her death. In the Sessions Court, however, he denied that he had given any beating to his wife. He stated that he was sleeping inside his house as he was still not well; that he did not know who had caused the injuries to his wife and that, in the morning, when the police patil and others had gone to his house, he told them that he did not know how she had died. The Sessions Judge, however, believed the evidence of Chhani, Thakorebhai, Chhotubhai and Ranchhod that the accused had confessed soon after the offence that he had committed the offence. He also relied on the statement made by the accused before the Committing Magistrate in which he had admitted his guilt. He, therefore, convicted the accused under s. 302, Indian Penal Code.

THE accused appealed.

I. C. Bhatt, for the appellant.

V. H. Gumaste, Assistant Government Pleader, for the State.

CHAIYANI C.J. [His Lordship after stating the facts and dealing with the evidence in the case, proceeded.] Then, there is the statement of the accused made before the Committing Magistrate. In this statement, he has stated that, on that night, he had asked Kavita to sleep inside his house, that she refused to do so and that she told him that she would not stay with him and that on the following morning she would send for panchas and take a divorce. She then slept outside in the Pejari. He woke up in the morning and as he was angry with her, he took up a stone and gave two or three blows with it to her and killed her. In this statement, therefore, the accused has admitted that he had killed Kavita. Before recording this statement of the accused, the Committing Magistrate had not recorded any evidence. It has, therefore, been urged that this statement made before the Committing Magistrate is not admissible in evidence. It is, therefore, necessary to consider the relevant provisions of s. 207A, which lay down the procedure to be adopted in proceedings instituted on a police report. Sub-section (4) of s. 173 provides that, after the investigation is completed, the accused shall be supplied with a copy of the report of the police officer submitted to a Magistrate under sub-s. (1) and of the first information report recorded under s. 154 and of all other documents or relevant extracts thereof on which the prosecution proposes to rely. Sub-section (3) of s. 207A states that at the commencement of the inquiry, the Magistrate shall satisfy himself that the documents referred to in s. 173 had been furnished to the accused, and if he finds that the accused had not been furnished with such documents or any of them, he shall cause the same to be so furnished. Sub-section (4) states that the Magistrate shall then proceed to take the evidence of such persons, if any, as may be produced by the prosecution as witnesses to the actual commission of the offence, and if the Magistrate is of opinion that it is necessary in the interests of justice to take the evidence of any one or more of the other witnesses for the prosecution, he may take such evidence also. This sub-section has been construed by this Court in State v. Dhirajlal Maneklal,¹ in which it was held that it is not obligatory upon the prosecution to produce before the Magistrate at the stage of the committal inquiry all or any of the persons who might have witnessed the actual commission of the offence and that the prosecution has an absolute discretion in the matter. It is, therefore, open to the prosecution not to examine any witnesses in the inquiry held by the Magistrate. Then come sub-ss. (6) and (7), which are in the following terms:

"(6) When the evidence referred to in sub-section (4) has been taken and the Magistrate has considered all the documents referred to in section 173 and has, if necessary, examined the accused for the purpose of enabling him to explain any circumstances appearing in the evidence against him and given the prosecution and the accused an opportunity of being heard, such Magistrate shall, if he is of opinion that such evidence and documents disclose no grounds for committing the accused person for trial, record his reasons and discharge him, unless it appears to the Magistrate that such person should be tried before himself or some other Magistrate, in which case he shall proceed accordingly.

(7) When, upon such evidence being taken, such documents being considered, such examination (if any) being made and the prosecution and the accused being given an opportunity of being heard, the Magistrate is of opinion that the accused should be committed for trial, he shall frame a charge under his hand, declaring with what offence the accused is charged."

The procedure which the Magistrate has to follow, therefore, is that after satisfying himself that the accused has been supplied with the requisite documents, he has to take the evidence of such eye-witnesses as may be produced by the prosecution and of those other witnesses, whom he considers it necessary to examine in the interests of justice. He may then, if necessary, examine the accused for the purpose of enabling him to explain any circumstances appearing in the evidence against him. Thereafter he has to give the prosecution and the accused an opportunity of being heard. He has then to consider the evidence, if any, taken by him, the documents referred to in s. 173 and the statement of the accused, if any, recorded by him, in the light of the arguments advanced by the prosecution and the accused and decide whether the accused should or should not be committed for trial.

These provisions draw a distinction between evidence and the documents referred to in s. 173, which also the Magistrate has to consider before deciding whether the accused should be committed for trial. The evidence referred to is the evidence, if any, taken under sub-s. (4). It cannot, therefore, include the documents referred to in s. 173. The learned Assistant Government Pleader has urged that the word "evidence" which follows the words "any circumstances appearing in the" in sub-s. (6) is used in a wider sense so as also to include the documents referred to in s. 173. This argument cannot be accepted, in view of the latter part of the sub-section, which requires the Magistrate to form an opinion on "such evidence and documents". Here again the documents are referred to separately from evidence. It is, therefore, clear that "evidence" does not include the documents, which are mentioned separately in both sub-ss. (6) and (7). Consequently, "evidence" in these provisions means evidence, if any, recorded under sub-s. (4). The section, therefore, contemplates an examination of the accused for the purpose of enabling him to explain any circumstances appearing in the evidence against him, that is in the evidence, if any, recorded under sub-s. (4). It has, therefore, been urged that the Magistrate has no power to question the accused for the purpose of enabling him to explain any circumstances appearing in the documents referred to in s. 173. This argument ignores the requirement of the section that the Magistrate should give the prosecution and the accused an opportunity of being heard before deciding whether there are or are not sufficient grounds for committing the accused for trial. The hearing is given to the accused in order to enable him to show cause why he should not be committed for trial. The Magistrate is, therefore, under an obligation to give a hearing to the accused, so that the accused may be able to satisfy him that sufficient grounds do not exist for committing him to the Sessions Court. In cases in which no evidence has been recorded under sub-s. (4), the accused can satisfy the Magistrate by reference only to the documents referred to in s. 173. The Magistrate is, therefore, bound to hear the explanation of the accused in regard to circumstances appearing in the documents referred to in s. 173. Instead of hearing this explanation orally and making notes about it, the Magistrate may question him and record it in writing. There is undoubtedly a lacuna in sub-s. (6), but this does not appear to be intentional, having regard to the provisions which require the Magistrate to give the accused an opportunity of being heard as to why he should not be committed for trial. It is implicit in these provisions that the Magistrate may examine the accused for the purpose of enabling him to explain any circumstances appearing in the documents referred to in s. 173. There is also nothing in the section which debars him from doing so.

Mr. Bhatt has urged that, if the Magistrate questions the accused in regard to the documents referred to in s. 173, matters may be brought on record, which are inadmissible under s. 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code. There is no force in this argument, for the Magistrate can only question the accused with regard to the circumstances disclosed against him in these documents. The questions put by the Magistrate will not be evidence of the facts stated therein. What will be evidence will be the replies given by the accused to the questions put to him. It is, therefore, not likely that any matters, which cannot be brought on record under s. 162, will become admissible in evidence by the Magistrate's questioning the accused in regard to circumstances appearing against him in the documents referred to in s. 173.

Mr. Bhatt has relied on a decision of a single Judge of the Orissa High Court in State v. Anadi Betankar.² With respect, we are unable to agree with the view taken in this case.

We are accordingly of the opinion that, while a Magistrate is not bound to question the accused and ask him to explain the circumstances appearing in the documents referred to in s. 173, he may do so, if he so deems it proper or necessary in the interests of justice. If he examines the accused and records his statement, that statement will be admissible in evidence under s. 287 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The statement of the accused recorded by the Committing Magistrate is, therefore, admissible in evidence.

[The rest of the judgment is not material to this report.]

Inspector in the Ahmednagar Municipality, a certain quantity of butter and ghee for analysis. It was the case of the prosecution that the butter and ghee sold by the accused to the complainant were adulterated and the accused had committed an offence under s. 16(1)(a) of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, 1954. The trying Magistrate acquitted the accused of the charge for sale of adulterated ghee but convicted him of the offence under s. 16(1)(a) of the Act. On appeal the Additional Sessions Judge confirmed the conviction of the accused but reduced the sentence passed on him. The accused applied in revision to the High Court. The application was heard by Shah and Mody JJ. who referred the following question to a larger bench:—

“Whether the expression ‘butter’ within the meaning of rule A. 11.05 in the Rules framed under section 24 of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act includes butter prepared from curd?”

In the course of his judgment delivered on February 6, 1959, Shah J. observed as follows:—

SHAH J. ...It was finally contended by Mr. Adik that the butter sold by the petitioner was not butter prepared from milk or cream but it was prepared from curd, and that the prosecution having failed to lead evidence that the butter which was sold by the petitioner was prepared from milk or cream, the petitioner was not guilty of the offence of selling adulterated butter: and in support of that argument reliance was placed upon a judgment of this Court reported in Narsinha Bhaskar v. State of Bombay,¹ where it was held that butter prepared from curd did not come within the purview of the definition “butter” given in A. 11.05 of Appendix B to the Prevention of Food Adulteration Rules, 1955. In order to appreciate this contention, it is necessary to refer to certain provisions of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act. Under s. 24 of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act the State of Bombay has published rules inter alia prescribing the forms of licences for the sale and distribution of articles of food or any specified article of food or class of articles of food. Rule A. 11.01 in Appendix B to those rules defines “milk” as meaning

“the normal clean and fresh secretion obtained by complete milking of the udder of a healthy cow, buffalo, goat or sheep during the period following at least 72 hours after calving or until colostrum free whether such secretion has been processed or not.” Butter is defined in A. 11.05 as meaning

“the product prepared exclusively from the milk or cream of cow or buffalo, or both, with or without the addition of salt and annatto...”

Curd is defined in A. 11.06 as “the product obtained from fresh whole milk either of cow or buffalo by souring”. Cream is defined in A. 11.10 as meaning “that portion of milk rich in milk fat which has risen to the surface of milk on standing and has been removed or which has been separated from milk by centrifugal force.”

It is urged by Mr. Adik, relying on the judgment in Narsinha Bhaskar's case, that butter is only that product which is derived exclusively and directly from the milk or cream of cow or buffalo or both and it does not include a product which is prepared from curd. Mr. Adik submits that if the Legislature intended to include in the definition of the word “butter” a product prepared from curd, the rule making authority would have used the expression “from the milk or cream or curd of cow or buffalo...” in A. 11.05. The absence of the words “or curd” in A. 11.05, says Mr. Adik, indicates that the rule making authority intended only to make provision in respect of butter which was prepared directly from milk or cream and not from curd. On the other hand, the learned Government Pleader contends that butter which is prepared by the process of souring milk into curd and churning it is as much butter prepared from milk as butter prepared directly from milk by adding an acid or otherwise. It is, therefore, urged that in the absence of any express provision made by the rule making authority which excludes from the definition in A. 11.05 butter which is prepared from curd, no artificial meaning as suggested by Mr. Adik should be given. Reliance in that behalf is also put upon the definition of the word "buttermilk" given in A. 11.03, where that expression is defined as meaning "the product obtained after removal of butter from curds by churning or otherwise", and it is submitted that the rule making authority also recognised that product as butter which is prepared by separation of buttermilk from curd after churning or otherwise. It is submitted that if the rule making authority defined butter as meaning only that product which was directly obtained from milk or cream and not from curd, there is still a product which is designated butter under A. 11.03 which is not butter within the meaning of A. 11.05 and for the sale, storage, distribution and adulteration of which no provision is made. The learned Government Pleader says that practically all butter in the villages in India is prepared by churning curd and not directly from milk or cream; and it could not have been the intention of the Legislature to exclude from the purview of the Act this important commodity which is used extensively as food.

The difficulty in the interpretation of A. 11.05 arises by reason of the addition of the words "or cream". Evidently cream is also prepared from milk, and the rule making authority has included in the definition of the word "butter" a preparation which is made from milk or cream, and has not expressly included a preparation which is made from curd. It is suggested by Mr. Adik that this absence is deliberate. There is a judgment of this Court in Narsinha Bhaskar v. State of Bombay in which it has been held that the rule making authority by defining the expression "butter" contemplated that product only which was prepared directly from milk or cream and not a preparation made from curd. Authority of that judgment is challenged by the learned Government Pleader. As the question is of considerable importance, we think that this case may be placed before a larger Bench for decision.

THE question was heard by a full bench composed of Chainani C.J. and S. T. Desai and Tarkunde JJ.

R. W. Adik, for the petitioner.

N. H. Gursahani, for respondent No. 1.

Y. V. Chandrachud, Government Pleader, for respondent No. 2.

CHAINANI C.J. The question referred to the Full Bench is "whether the expression "butter" within the meaning of rule A. 11.05 of the Rules framed under section 23 of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act includes butter prepared from curd." In order to answer this question, it is necessary to consider the relevant provisions of the Act and the Rules. The Act was enacted in 1954 in order to make provision for the prevention of food adulteration. Clause (1) in s. 2 of the Act defines the term "adulterated". This clause contains sub-cl. (a) to (1), which lay down the different circumstances in which an article of food shall be deemed to be adulterated. For instance, under sub-cl. (a) an article of food is to be deemed to be adulterated, if the article sold by the vendor is not of the nature, substance or quality demanded by the purchaser and is to his prejudice, or is not of the nature, substance or quality which it purports or is represented to be. Under sub-cl. (1), with which we are concerned in this case, an article of food is to be deemed to be adulterated, if the quality or purity of the article falls below the prescribed standard or its constituents are present in quantities, which are in excess of the prescribed limits of variability. The word "prescribed" is defined in cl. (xii) as meaning prescribed by rules made under this Act. The rule making power is conferred upon the Central Government by s. 23 of the Act. Clause (b) in sub-s. (1) of this section empowers the Central Government to make rules defining the standards of quality for, and fixing the limits of variability permissible in respect of, any article of food. In exercise of the powers conferred by s. 23, the Central Government has made the Prevention of Food Adulteration Rules, 1955. Rule 5 of these Rules states that the standards of quality of the various articles of food specified in Appendix B to these rules are as defined in that Appendix. Appendix B does not, therefore, lay down the standards of quality of all articles of food, but only of those articles which are specified in this Appendix. The heading of Appendix B is "Definitions and Standards of Quality." Rule A. 11 in this Appendix contains provisions with regard to milk and milk products. Rule A. 11.01 defines milk as meaning

"the normal clean and fresh secretion obtained by complete milking of the udder of a healthy cow, buffalo, goat or sheep during the period following at least 72 hours after calving or until colostrum free whether such secretion has been processed or not." Rule A. 11.03 defines butter-milk as meaning the product obtained after removal of butter from curds by churning or otherwise. Rule A. 11.05 is in the following terms:

"Butter means the product prepared exclusively from the milk or cream of cow or buffalo, or both, with or without the addition of salt and annatto and shall contain not less than 80 per cent of milk fat and not more than 16 per cent of moisture. No preservative is permissible in butter."

Rule A. 11.06 defines whole milk dahi or curd as meaning the product obtained from fresh whole milk either of cow or buffalo by souring, and states that it shall not contain any ingredient not found in milk. Cream is defined in Rule A. 11.10 as meaning that portion of milk rich in milk fat which has risen to the surface of milk on standing and has been removed or which has been separated from milk by centrifugal force.

The question, which we have to decide, is whether butter prepared from dahi or curd can be said to be butter prepared from milk within the meaning of Rule A. 11.05.

On behalf of the petitioner-accused it has been urged by Mr. Adik that the rules contain separate provisions with regard to milk products and prescribe different standards for such products, that curd is a milk product and not milk, that Rule A. 11.05 also deals with butter prepared from a milk product, viz. cream, and that the fact that the rule refers separately to cream only also indicates that the rule making authority intended to exclude from the purview of the rule butter prepared from other milk products such as curd. Stress has also been laid on the word "exclusively" and it has been contended that the rule applies only to butter prepared directly from milk and cream, but not to butter made from curd. Reliance has been placed on Narsinha Bhaskar v. State of Bombay,¹ in which Miabhoy J. held that butter prepared from out of curd does not come within the purview of the definition of the word "butter" given in Rule A. 11.05.

In appreciating these arguments, it is important to note that the words used in Rule A. 11.05 are "exclusively from milk or cream" and not "directly from milk or cream." The emphasis is, therefore, on the basic material from which butter is prepared and not on the process by which it is made. Dahi is prepared from milk by souring it. Butter prepared from dahi can, therefore, be said to be butter prepared from milk itself, after it has undergone the process of souring. The two well known and widely prevalent methods of preparing butter are by souring milk and then churning the product so obtained, viz. curd, or by souring cream and churning it. There is, also, a third method, which is used in some dairies, and that is to produce butter directly from milk itself. In all these three cases, the basic material from which butter is made is milk. Only the processes adopted for making it are different. In one case it is produced from milk directly. In the other two cases, cream and curd are first prepared and these are then churned to obtain butter. The preparation of cream or curd is only an intermediate process in the manufacture of butter from milk. Butter made from dahi or curd is therefore, also butter made from milk.

It is also difficult to understand why the process, by which an article is prepared, should make any difference as to whether it falls or does not fall within the scope of the Act and the rules. In almost all places in this country, outside the bigger towns, butter is prepared not directly from milk, but from dahi or curd. The object of the Act is to prevent the sale of adulterated butter, and it is impossible to believe that either the Legislature or the rule making authority could have intended to exclude butter prepared from dahi, which, as I have stated, forms the bulk of the butter, which is sold in this country, from the purview of the Act and the rules made under it. It is well settled that so far as possible the Court should adopt that interpretation, which will promote and further the object and policy of the legislation and suppress the mischief which the statute was enacted to prevent. In Rule A. 11.03, the substance left, after churning curd and separating butter-milk, is referred to as butter. The provisions of this rule also make it clear that the rule making authority intended that the rules should also apply to butter prepared from dahi or curd.

Cream, like curd, is a milk product. Rule A. 11.05 refers to cream but not to curd. It does not contain the words "or curd" after the words "or cream". Mr. Adik has, therefore, contended that the intention clearly was to make provision only for butter prepared from milk or cream and to exclude butter obtained from curd. This argument cannot be accepted for the reasons which I have given above. It seems to us that reference was made to cream in this rule by way of abundant caution and not in order to exclude butter prepared from curd. According to the ordinary meaning of the word "butter", it would include butter prepared from curd. In fact, in common parlance, butter prepared from dahi or curd would be regarded as butter prepared from milk. The language used in rule A. 11.05 is not such as to exclude the ordinary meaning of the word "butter".

With respect, therefore, we do not agree with the view taken in Narsinha Bhaskar v. State of Bombay. In our opinion, Rule A. 11.05 applies also to butter prepared from dahi or curd. The reply to the question referred to the Full Bench will, therefore, be in the affirmative.

Answer accordingly.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Sec. 522—Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), Secs. 341, 339—Accused breaking open lock of complainant's room and occupying it—Complainant coming to know of trespass for first time about a month after his locking the room—Complainant when attempting to enter room next day after receiving information of trespass, obstructed from entering by accused—Accused convicted of wrongful restraint under s. 341, I. P. Code and further ordered under s. 522, Cr. Pr. Code to restore possession of premises to complainant—Whether Magistrate competent to pass order under s. 522—Complainant whether dispossessed by show of force employed by accused.

The complainant, who had locked and left his room on January 16, 1958, came to know for the first time on February 22, 1958, that the accused had broken open the lock and occupied the room. Next day, i.e. on February 23, 1958, when the complainant tried to enter the room the accused personally obstructed the complainant from entering the room. On a complaint being filed by the complainant, the accused was convicted by the Magistrate of the offence of wrongful restraint under s. 341 of the Indian Penal Code and it was further ordered under s. 522 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, that possession of the premises in dispute be restored to the complainant by the accused. On the question whether the Magistrate was in law justified in passing the order under s. 522 of the Criminal Procedure Code, it was contended by the accused that the complainant was dispossessed sometime between January 16, 1958, and February 22, 1958, and not when he tried to enter the room on February 23, 1958, and that, therefore, his dispossession was not brought about by the wrongful restraint at the hands of the accused on February 23, 1958:—

Held, that the dispossession of the complainant took place when he was wrongfully restrained from entering the room in dispute on February 23, 1958, and that, therefore, the Magistrate was competent to pass the order under s. 522 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Mahabir v. Rex,² referred to.

THE premises in dispute consisted of a room and a verandah in a certain building at Bandra. One Ramprasad Dhobi was the tenant of these and several other premises in the same building. Before 1950 a lady named Marie Gonsalves was the sub-tenant of Ramprasad Dhobi in the said premises. The case of the complainant, Edward A. L. Gameiro, was that in 1950 he obtained the possession of the premises as a result of a document passed by Marie Gonsalves. When Marie Gonsalves was in occupation of these premises Francis D'Souza (accused) and his wife and children were staying with her. According to the complainant, when Marie Gonsalves left the place after transferring possession of the premises to him, he allowed the accused and his family to occupy a portion of the verandah as his licensees on payment of compensation for use and occupation at the rate of Rs. 7 per month. The complainant was married in 1955 and sometime thereafter there were disputes between the parties. According to the complainant, he and his wife were harassed by the accused. In January 1958 the complainant's wife was expecting a child within a few months and, therefore, in order to avoid the harassment of the accused when his wife was in that delicate condition, the complainant left the premises on January 16, 1958. He carried some goods with him and locked the room and obtained temporary accommodation from his employer. On February 22, 1958, one Waxirali whom the complainant had asked to keep a watch on the room informed the complainant that the room was entered into and occupied by the accused and his family. The complainant, his wife and his brother visited the place and finding the accused in occupation, lodged a complaint at a police station. Next day, i.e., on February 23, 1958, the complainant went again to the room and tried to enter it but was prevented from doing so by the accused. Accordingly, he filed a complaint against the accused for wrongful restraint under s. 341, Indian Penal Code.

The accused stated in his defence that when Marie Gonsalves left the premises in 1950 he and not the complainant became the sub-tenant of the premises and that he took the complainant merely as his paying guest. He further stated that after the complainant got married, he (the accused) was asking him to leave the place and, therefore, on January 16, 1958, the complainant left the premises with the intention of leaving them permanently. The accused denied that the complainant had visited the premises on February 23, 1958, and that he was prevented from entering the room on that day.

The trying Magistrate came to the conclusion on a consideration of the evidence led before him that the complainant was in exclusive occupation of the room from about 1950 till the date when he left the room on January 16, 1958, after locking it. The Magistrate relied on the rent receipts produced by the complainant, and on the oral evidence including that of one Hanuman Ramprasad, the son of the tenant, to whom the rent of the premises was being paid by the complainant, and held that the accused and his family were occupying only a portion of the verandah outside the room. The accused was able to produce one receipt the contents of which suggested that he paid the rent of the premises in the month of April 1951. The accused also produced a letter written by an advocate of the tenant Ramprasad Dhobi dated June 1, 1954, which contained the statement that the accused was the sub-tenant of Ramprasad. This evidence was not accepted by the Magistrate as sufficient to cast doubt on the evidence led by the complainant to the effect that he was in sole occupation of the room since 1950. On these findings, the Magistrate convicted the accused under s. 341, Indian Penal Code, and sentenced him to pay a fine of Rs. 150. He also passed an order under s. 522, Criminal Procedure Code, that the accused should forthwith hand over to the complainant possession of the room and the portion of the verandah where the complainant had his kitchen. In his judgment the trying Magistrate observed as follows:—

"Shri Mascarenhas for the complainant has applied for an order under s. 522, Criminal Procedure Code, restoring possession of the room and portion of the verandah used by the complainant as a kitchen. Shri Neemuchwalla for the accused opposes the application and submits that no order under s. 522, Cr. P. C., should be made and the complainant should be left to his remedy in the civil Court. In my opinion the complainant has made out a case for an order under s. 522. The complainant has deposed that on February 22, 1958, when he was going to his room after lodging his complaint at the police station and after the accused was called to the police station and warned, two persons threatened him near the gate obviously at the instigation of the accused. On February 23, 1958, the accused stopped him from entering the verandah. The complainant's wife has similarly deposed that on February 22, 1958, the accused refused to allow them to enter. As they reached the gate of the house, two boys assaulted her husband and so they did not enter the compound. On February 23, 1958, also the accused restrained them from entering the room. The accused told them that he would not allow them to enter the room. This implies that if the complainant and his wife used force, the accused would use force. In these circumstances the complainant and his wife went away. In [1949] A.I.R. All. 228 [Mahabir v. Rex] Wanchoo J. has stated; 'if the accused or his accomplices having entered upon the land do not quit when the true owner protests against such unauthorised entry and are ready to fight, the offence can be said to have been attended by "show of force". Show of force may consist in the physical presence of the accused, his servants or companions in such a way that the true owner is put to the fear that if he tried to regain possession by force, he will be met by force... We think that dispossession of the complainant had not become complete till the complainant appeared on the scene, protested and had to go away...where shortly after the commission of the offence, the true owner becoming aware of the trespass committed in his absence, goes to the spot to regain possession of his land and is prevented from doing so by the accused showing readiness to fight if attempts were made to regain possession, the case would be covered by s. 522, Criminal P.C., and an order for restoration of possession can be passed by the Court'. I respectfully agree with these observations. It would be obviously improper to drive the complainant to the civil Court after he has established in this Court that he had possession of the room and a portion of the verandah and that he has been wrongfully deprived of the same by the accused. I accept the case of the complainant that he had only temporarily left the premises after putting locks on his room and kitchen. Subsequently the accused is found in occupation of the room and kitchen. It would be legitimate to presume in these circumstances that it is the accused who broke open the locks and went into occupation. Thereafter the accused has by show of force retained possession of the premises which were in the possession of the complainant. He cannot in these circumstances be allowed to retain possession.

I may also refer to the judgment of Allsop J. reported in [1943] A.I.R. All. 7 [Chhabia v. Ram Charan]. There his Lordship has stated: 'It is open to argument that it is not necessarily at the time the criminal trespasser goes upon the property that dispossession takes place. It may perhaps be said that it sometimes takes place at the time when he prevents the rightful possessor from coming upon the property'.

In [1938] A.I.R. Lah. 839 [Roda v. Autar Singh], a case which is almost on all fours with the case before me, it has been held that an order under s. 522, Cr. P. C., would be proper in these circumstances although the complainant was not present when the lock was broken open and the accused went into occupation. In this case Skemp J. has not followed an earlier decision of the same Court. In [1939] A.I.R. Lah. 184 [Ganda Singh v. Warsakha Singh] the judgment of Skemp J. has not been followed. In the absence of any judgment of our High Court on this point, I prefer to follow the judgment of Skemp J."

The accused applied in revision to the High Court.

The application was heard.

S. A. Neemachwala, with N. G. Menon, for the petitioner.

C. B. Dalvi, Hon. Assistant Government Pleader, for the State.

T. V. Mascarenhas, for the complainant.

TARKUNDE J. [His Lordship after stating the facts and holding that the conviction of the accused under s. 341 of the Indian Penal Code was justified, proceeded]. Mr. Neemachwala then urged that the learned Presidency Magistrate erred in law in passing an order under s. 522, Criminal Procedure Code, for the restoration of possession of the premises to the complainant. In order to appreciate the arguments of Mr. Neemachwala the terms of s. 522(1) may be set out:

"Whenever a person is convicted of an offence attended by criminal force or show of force or by criminal intimidation and it appears to the Court that by such force or show of force or criminal intimidation any person has been dispossessed of any immoveable property, the Court may, if it thinks fit, when convicting such person or at any time within one month from the date of the conviction order the person dispossessed to be restored to the possession of the same."

It will be seen that two conditions are required to be fulfilled in order that possession may be restored under s. 522. The first condition is that the accused must have been convicted of an offence attended by criminal force or show of force or by criminal intimidation. The second is that it must appear to the Court that by such force or show of force or criminal intimidation any person has been dispossessed of any immoveable property. In the present case it cannot be doubted that the offence of the petitioner of wrongful restraint was attended by show of force. Mr. Neemachwala contests this, but the very definition of "wrongful restraint" as given in s. 389, Indian Penal Code, shows that the offence consists of obstructing another person so as to prevent that person from proceeding in a certain direction, and the fact that, according to the finding of the learned Presidency Magistrate, the petitioner personally obstructed the complainant from entering the room implies that the offence of the petitioner was attended by show of force.

The question which is not so easy to decide is whether the complainant was dispossessed of his room by the show of force employed by the petitioner. The complainant had locked and left the room on January 16, 1958, and he came to know for the first time on February 22, 1958, that the petitioner had broken open the lock and occupied the room. The offence of wrongful restraint took place the next day, i.e., on February 23, 1958. Mr. Neemachwala urged that the complainant must have been dispossessed some time between January 16, 1958, and February 22, 1958, and not when he tried to enter the room on February 23, 1958, so that his dispossession was not brought about by the wrongful restraint at the hands of the petitioner on February 23, 1958. I do not think that Mr. Neemachwala is right in this contention. A person in juridical possession of any immoveable property cannot be rightly said to be dispossessed as soon as a trespasser occupies that property. When a trespasser enters into the property in the absence of the person in possession, the latter, when he comes to know of the trespass, has still the right without recourse to a Court of law to try to secure possession back from the trespasser. In other words, a trespasser cannot merely by the act of trespass constitute himself into a person in possession. If, however, the person in juridical possession, after his physical dispossession, allows a sufficiently long time to pass or adopts some course such as instituting a legal action, from which an inference arises that he has mentally relinquished the possession which he had physically lost, then he can properly be held to be dispossessed. In the present case the complainant came to know of the trespass of the petitioner on February 22, 1958, and immediately on the next day he tried to enter the room as he was in law entitled to do. It cannot, therefore, be said that he was dispossessed earlier than on the occasion when the offence of wrongful restraint was committed.

A similar view was taken by a Division Bench of the Allahabad High Court in *Mahabir v. Bez.*¹ In that case Mr. Justice Wanchoo, delivering the judgment of the Court, observed (p. 230):

"...We think that where shortly after the commission of the offence, the true owner becoming aware of the trespass committed in his absence, goes to the spot to regain possession of his land and is prevented from doing so, by the accused showing readiness to fight if attempt were made to regain possession, the case would be covered by s. 522, Criminal P.C., and an order for restoration of possession can be passed by the Court."

For the contrary view, Mr. Neemachwala relied on Narayan v. Visaji,² which was a decision of a Division Bench of this Court consisting of Parsons and Ranade JJ. The facts in that case were that the accused entered into possession of an agricultural land and sowed it with rice in July 1897. About a month and a half thereafter, in September 1897, the complainant went to the land but was turned out by force by the accused. On these facts the accused was convicted of criminal trespass under s. 447, Indian Penal Code, but it was held by this Court that the order passed by the trial Magistrate restoring possession to the complainant was not justified by law. It is clear from the facts of that case that the complainant was fully aware since the month of July 1897 of the illegal entry effected on the land by the accused and of the sowing operations thereon. It was his case that the trespass had taken place in the month of July 1897. Under these circumstances the Court held that the offence of the accused was not attended by force and that the complainant was not dispossessed by the use of force. Delivering the principal judgment in that case Ranade J. observed (p. 500):

"...In the present case, the illegal entry on the land, according to the complainant himself, took place in July, 1897, when Ravlo is alleged to have sown it with rice. Complainant went to the place towards the close of September, and Ravlo refused to vacate or pass a kabulayat, and pushed out complainant. Complainant did not bring any charge for this assault, but complained of the trespass which took place some months before. Under these circumstances, it is clear that the offence complained of was not attended by criminal force nor did the use of such force cause the dispossession."

It is obvious that the offence which was held to have been committed by the accused in that case was the offence of trespass which took place in July 1897 and it was at that time that the dispossession of the complainant had taken place. No complaint regarding the assault in the month of September 1897 had been filed by the complainant. It is clear, therefore, that this decision does not come in the way of my holding that the dispossession of the complainant in the present case took place when he was wrongfully restrained from entering the room in dispute on February 23, 1958.

The result, is that this revision application fails and is dismissed.

Mr. Neemachwala requests that the petitioner should be allowed some time for restoring the possession of the premises to the complainant. On behalf of the complainant Mr. Mascarenhas agrees that time may be extended provided the petitioner pays to the landlord, without prejudice to the rights of either party, all the arrears of rent due in respect of the period from February 22, 1958, till the date on which the petitioner is allowed to hand over possession to the complainant. I accordingly order that the petitioner shall hand over possession to the complainant of the room and that part of the verandah in which the complainant had his kitchen on or before August 31, 1959. The petitioner has given an undertaking to the Court that he will, without prejudice to the rights of either party, pay to the tenant Ramprasad Dhobi by June 1, all the arrears of rent in respect of the period between February 22, 1958, and May 31, 1959, and that he will pay regularly the rent of the three subsequent months of June, July and August 1959. If the petitioner fails to pay the rent according to his undertaking, this part of the order by which time is given to him for handing over possession to the complainant will be vacated.

Application dismissed.

Before Mr. Justice K. K. Desai.

TARA SINGH UJAGAR SINGH v. THE UNION OF INDIA.*

Constitution of India, Arts. 310, 311—Army Instructions in India—Civilian employed in defence service whether entitled to protection under art. 311(2)—Whether non-observance of rules in Army Instructions give cause of action to such civilian—Army Instructions whether affect art. 310.

A person holding any post connected with defence within the meaning of art. 310(1) of the Constitution of India is not included in the class of persons holding a civil post under the Union referred to in art. 311(1) of the Constitution. A civilian employed in defence service is not entitled to protection under art. 311 and is not entitled to any reasonable opportunity of showing cause against the action proposed to be taken in regard to him.

Chhandra Bhan v. Union of India,' Chandra Bhan Varma v. Union of India,' Subodh Ranjan v. N.A.O. Callakhan' and Dass Mal v. Union of India,' referred to.

The rules contained in Army Instructions in India (No. 212/1949 dated June 25, 1949) do not affect the provisions of art. 310 of the Constitution regarding the tenure of office of persons employed in the service of Government of India or State. The Army Instructions, therefore, are not binding on the Union and the non-observance of the rules contained therein do not give any cause of action to a civilian employed in the defence service.

Attindra Nath v. G. F. Gillet' and T. V. Ravindran v. C. M. Patel,' referred to.

On August 15, 1933, one Tara Singh (plaintiff) was initially employed at Bombay as a temporary clerk in the defence service. In connection with his employment the plaintiff signed a printed form of agreement dated January 5, 1934. This agreement was not signed on behalf of the Government of India and remained escrow. In December 1935 the plaintiff was appointed a temporary Overseer. In March 1940 the plaintiff was appointed Overseer on permanent substantive basis and then he signed a printed form of agreement dated June 21, 1940 (exh. 5). This agreement was executed (on behalf of the Governor General in Council) by Garrison Engineer, Wellington. As appeared from his service book, the plaintiff was discharging his duties at Wellington for a considerable time before March 1940. In about July 1941 the plaintiff was appointed temporary Sub-Divisional Officer and was made permanent in that post in August 1941.

After the plaintiff was transferred to and served at different places in June 1951 the plaintiff was stationed at Baroda as a Sub-Divisional Officer attached to a Military Camp situate at Baroda. The plaintiff's salary then was Rs. 480 (Rs. 350 as basic pay and Rs. 130 being dearness and other allowances). On May 6, 1950, the plaintiff got prepared an indent No. G-30801-A dated May 6, 1950, for striking off a quantity of $1\frac{1}{2}$ tons of coal from stocks that were in his charge. The Accounts Office reported that there was no basis for such an indent being prepared and inquiries were instituted. On March 27, 1951, the plaintiff was served with a charge-sheet along with certain documents in support of the charge in respect of the aforesaid $1\frac{1}{2}$ tons of coal. The relevant part of the charge served on the plaintiff ran as follows:—

"Committing an act prejudicial to good order and departmental discipline involving fraudulent issue and misappropriation of Government Stores in that he while employed as Superintendent B/R Gde. 1 at Baroda on 6-5-1950 struck off ledger charge $1\frac{1}{2}$ tons of steam coal on indent No. ..."

By a reply dated March 29, 1951, the plaintiff admitted having made out the indent. He, however, gave explanations as to why he had made "a consolidated indent to regularise the issue for accounting purposes". The plaintiff's explanations were not acceptable to the authorities and by a show cause notice dated September 5, 1951, the Commander, Works Engineers, Bombay, referred to the aforesaid charge against the plaintiff and further stated as follows:—

"The Chief Engineer, Southern Command, Poona, has after duly considering your statements of defence and all relevant documents, proposed to take the following action:

"Mr. Tara Singh should be removed from service without disqualification from further Government employment".

You are hereby required to show cause in writing as to why the proposed action should not be taken..."

By his letter dated September 22, 1951, the plaintiff denied the charge against him and asked for a chance of defending himself. He referred to the Army Instructions No. 212/49 as giving him the right to a complete hearing before proposed punishment. By an order dated October 12, 1951, the plaintiff was removed from service with effect from October 25, 1951, without disqualification from further government employment. An appeal to the Union of India against the order of removal was dismissed. Intimation of such dismissal was given to the plaintiff on June 12, 1952. The plaintiff, therefore, filed this suit after serving statutory notice dated September 2, 1952, inter alia for declarations that "the order of dismissal dated October 12, 1951 is illegal and void" and "the plaintiff continues in the service" of the Union and for arrears of salary on that basis. The sole ground on which the plaintiff based his claim was the right which according to him he had under Army Instructions in India No. 212/49 dated June 25, 1949, which inter alia provide for giving an opportunity to all employees for hearing and cross-examining the evidence in support of any charge and also for submitting written statement and evidence in defence and for a due and complete hearing. The plaintiff's contention in the plaint was that these rules of procedure in departmental enquiry were not observed in his case and, therefore, his dismissal was wrongful.

By its written statement the Union did not deny that the plaintiff has had no hearing in accordance with the Army Instructions No. 212/49. The Union's case was that the plaintiff did not ask for a personal hearing when the charge-sheet was served on him and that he was not entitled to ask for a hearing after the appropriate authority had decided that the plaintiff was guilty of the offence mentioned in the charge. The two main contentions which the Union raised were that (i) the plaintiff held a "post connected with defence" within the meaning of art. 310 of the Constitution, and the grievance of the plaintiff was not justiciable and the plaint, therefore, did not disclose any cause of action; and (ii) that the cause of action did not arise wholly in Bombay, and the plaintiff having failed to obtain leave under cl. 12 of Letters Patent, the High Court had no jurisdiction. The Union also contended that the notice under s. 80 of the Code of Civil Procedure was defective.

K. L. Gauba, for the plaintiff.

S. B. Kher, with Ajit Mehta, for the defendant.

K. K. DESAI J. [His Lordship after stating the facts and dealing with points not material to this report, proceeded.] As regards the contention of the Union that the plaintiff held "post connected with defence" and that the grievance of the plaintiff is not justiciable, it is necessary to refer to the provisions of arts. 310(1) and 311 of the Constitution which provide as follows:—

"310. (1) Except as expressly provided by this Constitution, every person who is a member of a defence service or of a civil service of the Union or of an all-India service or holds any post connected with defence or any civil post under the Union, holds office during the pleasure of the President..."

"311. (1) No person who is a member of a civil service of the Union or an all-India service or a civil service of a State or holds a civil post under the Union or a State shall be dismissed or removed by an authority subordinate to that by which he was appointed.

(2) No such person as aforesaid shall be dismissed or removed or reduced in rank until he has been given a reasonable opportunity of showing cause against the action proposed to be taken in regard to him."

It is obvious that art. 310(1) deals with tenure of office of persons holding posts and offices under the Union or a State. It is also patent on the language of that article that the tenure as fixed under the article can only be affected or altered by provisions contained in the Constitution itself. By the language of the article it is made impossible for any other statute made by Parliament or State Legislature to provide for different tenure of office. The limitation as regards the tenure, if any, must be found in the Constitution.

Article 311, which provides for protection of persons employed by the Government, can only be available to specific persons mentioned in that article. The protection provided by art. 311 is protection given to a member of (i) a civil service of the Union or (ii) an all-India service or (iii) a civil service of a State or (iv) a person who holds a civil post under the Union or a State. All these specific persons and/or members of each class mentioned in art. 311 are also mentioned in art. 310. It is, however, significant that art. 310 makes specific reference to (a) "a member of defence service" and (b) "persons who hold posts connected with defence". No reference is made to "a member of defence service" and "persons who hold posts connected with defence" in art. 311. Members belonging to these classes have been specifically taken out of the provisions of art. 311 with intent to deprive them of the protection given to others under art. 311.

Having regard to the aforesaid position Mr. Gauba contended that the plaintiff held "a civil post under the Union" and was, as such, entitled to protection under art. 311 and was entitled to a reasonable opportunity of showing cause against the action proposed to be taken in regard to him. This, of course, is a new contention and is not mentioned in the plaint. It is not included in the statutory notice given under s. 80 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This contention came to be made because on the amendment of the written statement the Union for the first time in August 1958 relied upon art. 310 as complete defence to the plaintiff's suit. I have allowed Mr. Gauba to argue on the footing that this contention was included in the plaint only because the plaintiff has had long service with the Government of India and it was necessary to see if the defence raised by the Union of India on the footing of art. 310 was correct.

As regards the nature of his employment it is admitted by the plaintiff that he was a civilian employee in defence service. It is also admitted by the plaintiff that his salary and allowances came out of the defence expenditure. The description of rules on which the plaintiff relies indicates that they are made with reference to persons in defence service. These rules are described as "Army Instructions". These are rules relating to civilians paid from defence expenditure. These rules are admittedly not made for any person who is not holding a civilian post paid from defence expenditure. Mr. Gauba contends that since the plaintiff is described as a civilian employee in defence service he is holding a civil post under the Union. This contention appears to me to be ill-founded. A person holding "civil post under the Union" is classified separately from "a person holding any post connected with defence" in art. 310(1) of the Constitution. On comparison of the provisions of art. 310(1) and art. 311 it is clear that the person described as "a member of defence service" or "holding any post connected with defence" has been altogether excluded from art. 311. The tenure of office of such a person under art. 310(1) was "at pleasure" and yet he was not intended to be given any protection as provided under art. 311. That is the irresistible conclusion one reaches by reason of specific exclusion of such a person from art. 311.

It is not the contention of Mr. Gauba that the plaintiff is not holding a post connected with defence. On the contrary the plaintiff proceeds on the footing and it is admitted that the plaintiff holds a post connected with defence. In my opinion "person holding a post connected with defence" cannot be stated to be included in the class of persons "holding civil post under the Union" if the provisions of art. 310(1) are read correctly. I do not agree with the contention of Mr. Gauba that the plaintiff held "a civil post under the Union" within the meaning of these two articles. The only class within which the plaintiff falls is the class which is described in art. 310 as "holds any post connected with defence". I accordingly hold that the plaintiff is not entitled to any protection under art. 311 and is not entitled to any reasonable opportunity of showing cause against the action proposed to be taken in regard to him.

In this connection Mr. Kher has relied upon the decision of this Court in the case of Chandra Bhan v. Union of India,¹ where in the first Court (S. T. Desai J.) considered and construed the provisions of art. 310 in regard to "a member of defence service". The relevant observations in that case are as follows (p. 602):—

"Now it is obvious that Art. 310 so far as it relates to a member of the defence service lays down in terms both express and explicit that in the absence of any provision of the Constitution and subject to the exception to which I shall presently refer:

'every person who is a member of a defence service or holds any post connected with defence...holds office during the pleasure of the President.'

The limitation or exception contained in the initial part of the Article has no bearing to any such case...I find that Art. 310 inevitably leads to the conclusion that a member of the defence service is dismissible at will unless he is protected by any of the restrictions and limitations provided for by the Article itself. Restrictions and limitations on the exercise of the 'pleasure of the President' as I have already pointed out are not applicable to the case of the plaintiff and his case would therefore be clearly covered by the rules relating to service 'durante bene placito' and on that view of the matter the claim made by the plaintiff would not be justiciable under Art. 310, if it fell under that Article because he could have no right of action against the Union of India for wrongful dismissal."

As regards the rules of procedure made under the Army Act for giving a complete hearing to an alleged defaulter in his defence it was observed in that decision as follows (p. 603) :—

"Then again the sections of the Army Act and the Rules and Regulations to which I have referred do not, in my judgment lay down any stipulations as to the tenure of service. Moreover as I shall have occasion to point out later on in my judgment these sections do not in any way affect the rule relating to tenure of service being terminable at will...Therefore, even if I were to accept the contention that Art. 310 permits any statute of Parliament modifying the general rule contained in it so far as it affects the defence personnel the conclusion would still have to be that the tenure of service was during the pleasure of the President."

Referring to the general rule that the tenure of office of serviceman was durante bene placito it was observed that (p. 604) :—

"There is another consideration of the matter. It seems to me that the principle underlying the rule should apply with greater force to a member of the defence service than to a civil servant. Article 311 of the Constitution and the provisions of S. 240, Government of India Act, 1935, in which there is no reference at all to a member of the defence service are to a degree illustrative of the principle."

After considering all the provisions applicable to a person in defence service as also to persons holding civilian posts in defence service it was held in that case that the tenure of office of such a person was at pleasure of the President and any grievance in respect thereof was not justiciable.

The judgment of S. T. Desai J. came before the appeal Court in *Chandra Bhan Varma v. Union of India*², and Chagla C.J. also agreed with the ratio of that judgment as correct and held that on a true construction of art. 310 as regards a member of the defence service the tenure of office must be at pleasure of the President and any grievance in that connection was not justiciable.

The provisions of these articles came to be considered in the case of Subodh Ranjan v. N. A. O. Callaghan.³ The question there also related to a civilian employed in defence service holding position similar to the plaintiff in this case. It was there also held that a civilian employed in defence service was not entitled to protection under art. 311 and that his tenure of office was at pleasure of the President and the grievance made by him was not justiciable.

The question whether a civilian employed in defence service could be classified as a person holding a civil post under the Union came to be considered by Kapur J. in the case of Dass Mal v. Union of India.⁴ The plaintiff in that case was a civil clerk employed in the defence services. He was not governed by the provisions of the Army Act. The contentions raised on his behalf were same as the contentions raised before me by Mr. Gauba. After considering the relevant provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935, as also arts. 309, 310 and 311 of the Constitution, the conclusion that was reached appears in the following words (p. 44) :

"In Article 311(1) a member of a defence service or a person who holds any post connected with defence has been omitted, and in my view this omission has only one meaning that the protection afforded under Article 311(1) is not available to the appellant Dass Mal."

The contention raised on behalf of the plaintiff in that suit that he held "a civil post under the Union" and was entitled to protection of art. 311 was negatived.

In connection with the Army Instruction No. 212/1949 Mr. Kher referred me to a decision in the case of Atindra Nath v. G. F. Gillot.⁵ What appears in that decision seems to me to be applicable in all respects to the case before me.

The information given to me as regards the "Army Instructions" is nothing more than the production of "Army Instructions" as evidence in this case. Mr. Gauba contends that these rules appearing in the Army Instructions must have been enacted under s. 241 of the Government of India Act. Neither side, however, is in a position to give me correct information as to under what provisions these Army Instructions have been framed. It appears to me that these are the subject matter of a Government Resolution and made for the purpose of guidance of military authorities in connection with civilians employed in defence services. These rules have no binding force in themselves. These rules are only directory rules. They do not appear to have been made under provisions of any particular statute. These rules have in any event no force of affecting the provisions of art. 310 regarding the tenure of office of persons employed in the service of Government of India or State. The tenure of office of persons employed in such service continues to be at pleasure of the President or the Governor or the Rajpramukh as the case may be.

In this connection Mr. Kher has referred me to the judgment of Chagla C.J. in T. V. Ravindran v. C. M. Patel.⁶ That was a case of dismissal of an employee from Ordnance Depot at Ambarnath. The contention raised before the Division Bench was that the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act which were admittedly applicable even to the government employees came in the way of dismissal of the petitioner in that case and that the dismissal was, therefore, not effective. Rejecting these contentions it was held that by reason of the provisions of art. 310 the tenure of office of a government servant employed even in civil service continued to be at the pleasure of the President or the Governor, that even by legislation, (viz. as in that case the Industrial Disputes Act) Parliament had no authority to derogate from the provisions of art. 310 of the Constitution. The petitioner's petition was accordingly dismissed in that case.

Having regard to the decisions referred to by me above, I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff does not hold a civil post under the Union and is not entitled to protection of art. 311. I have also come to the conclusion that the Army Instructions referred to in the plaint are not binding on the Union and the non-observance of the rules contained in these Army Instructions do not give any cause of action to the plaintiff. The validity of dismissal of the plaintiff is not justiciable and this Court has no jurisdiction to give any relief to the plaintiff.

The third contention raised by Mr. Kher related to the statutory notice given by the plaintiff under s. 80 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This notice admittedly does not refer to the reliefs claimed by the plaintiff in this suit. That notice only indicated that the plaintiff would be claiming damages against the Union and did not indicate that the declarations as mentioned in the plaint would be sought against the Union. The plaint and the notice do not refer to art. 311 of the Constitution.

Mr. Gauba has referred me to the commentary of Sir Dinshaw Mulla on s. 80 and also to the decision in Secretary of State v. Chimanlal Jamnadas.⁷ He says that this notice must be construed liberally and is valid. Having regard to my conclusions on the main contentions of the parties as hereinbefore mentioned, I do not propose to decide the issue as to whether the notice under s. 80 in this case is improper.

In the result the suit is dismissed with costs.

Suit dismissed.

SHIRINBAI MANCHERSHAW MEHANTY v. THE STATE OF BOMBAY.*

Bombay Land Requisition Act (Bom. XXXIII of 1948), Secs. 6, 9, 4(5)—Word "release" in ss. 6(1) and 9(1) whether means restoration of physical possession—Whether de-requisition order made under s. 9(1) complete before its service on landlord and before physical possession of premises transferred to appropriate person—Whether vacancy under s. 6 can arise by reason of mere order of de-requisition of premises—Order of requisition whether effective without transfer of physical possession of premises to Government.

The word "release" used in ss. 6(1) and 9(1) of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, does not mean restoration of physical possession. The word is used not as other word for restoration of possession, but as something precedent to transfer and/or restoration of physical possession of the premises.

A de-requisition order made under s. 9(1) of the Act is complete in all its effects and aspects when it is made. It is, therefore, complete before service or communication thereof on the landlord and even if physical possession is not transferred to the appropriate person.

Under s. 6 of the Act a vacancy can arise by reason of release of the premises from requisition under s. 9(1) notwithstanding the fact that the de-requisition order is not communicated to the person concerned and physical possession of the premises in question is not given to such person.

An order of requisition under the Act in all its aspects is completed by merely making an order for the purpose. Even when physical possession is not transferred to the Government and/or taken on behalf of the Government, a requisition order made would exist in all its effects.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

B. L. Dalal, for the petitioners.

S. J. Sorabji, for the respondent.

K. K. DESAI J. This is a petition under art. 226 of the Constitution challenging the validity of a requisition order dated July 4, 1958, passed in pursuance of cl. (a) of sub-s. (4) of s. 6 of the Bombay Land Requisition Act of 1948.

The relevant facts are as follows: The petitioner is the owner of Heera Building at Jehangir Daji Lane, Sleater Road, D. Ward, Bombay 7. Prior to May 31, 1957, one P. N. Mehta was occupying the first floor of that building as a tenant of the petitioner. By a notice to quit P. N. Mehta gave notice to the petitioner that he would vacate the first floor of the premises on the expiry of the month of the tenancy, viz., May 31, 1957. In fact on June 5, 1957, P. N. Mehta vacated the first floor of the premises—hereinafter referred to as the premises. By a letter dated June 5, 1957, the petitioner gave information regarding P. N. Mehta having vacated the premises. On June 14, 1957, the petitioners signed the printed prescribed form relating to intimation of vacancy and furnished the same to the Accommodation Officer. A copy of that form is annexed as Annexure I to affidavit to the reply dated November 1, 1958. This form reached the Accommodation Department on June 18, 1957. By a requisition order dated July 17, 1957, the premises were requisitioned under cl. (a) of sub-s. (4) of s. 6 for housing a person rendered homeless due to house demolition on the ground that the intimation under sub-s. (1) of s. 6 of the Bombay Land Requisition Act had been received from the petitioner on June 18, 1957.

The petitioner made several representations to the Government from time to time that he intended to sell off the Heera Building and that the Government should, therefore, not enforce the requisition order and should not take possession of the premises. The Government accepted the representations made by the petitioner and from time to time extended the date within which the petitioner should complete the intended sale of the property. The time was extended ultimately to May 31, 1958. As the petitioner had not completed the sale of the property an enforcement order dated May 30, 1958, was issued and on June 3, 1958, possession was taken by the Government of the premises.

It appears that having regard to the time that was given to the petitioner from July 1957 till May 1958, the premises were not needed for housing a person rendered homeless due to house demolition for which purpose the requisition order dated July 17, 1957, was made. Government thereupon by a de-requisition order dated July 3, 1958, made under s. 9 of the Act de-requisitioned the premises.

On July 4, 1958, the requisition order in question was made for housing a State Government servant. The de-requisition order and this requisition order were served on the petitioner on July 4, 1958. The petitioner has challenged the requisition order dated July 4, 1958, before me on the following grounds:—

(1) The first requisition order dated July 17, 1957, was illegal and void because the intimation (of vacancy) dated July 14, 1957, which was delivered to the Accommodation Department did not comply in all respects with the prescribed form as certain details to be mentioned were incomplete and that the intimation did not amount to an intimation of vacancy, on the footing whereof a requisition order could be made by the Government. The first order being illegal and void, there could not be any release from requisition in respect of such illegal and void requisition.

(2) The requisition under s. 6, on the ground of release of premises from requisition, must comply with the provisions of s. 9 of the Act and under s. 9 release is not complete unless physical possession is restored to the person entitled to the same. The requisition order cannot be made under s. 6 on the ground of release of the premises from requisition without restoration of physical possession to such person. The requisition was in fact made without release and, therefore, is illegal.

(3) No vacancy as required under s. 6 could come into existence by the said de-requisition order before the same was served on the petitioner. Before such service and communication of the de-requisition order on the petitioner a fresh requisition order on the ground of release of the premises from requisition was made. The order was without existence of vacancy.

(4) As both the de-requisition order and the requisition order were served at the same moment on the petitioner, there was no vacancy and jurisdiction under s. 6 to the Government to make a requisition order; that in fact no inquiry had taken place as required under the provisions of sub-cl. (4) of s. 6, and, therefore, the condition precedent to exercise of the jurisdiction had also not been satisfied.

For the examination of these contentions of the petitioner it is necessary to recite the whole of the de-requisition order and the requisition order in question. The de-requisition order dated July 3, 1958, runs as follows:

"In exercise of the powers conferred by sub-section (1) of Section 9 of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948 (Bom. XXXIII of 1948), the Government of Bombay hereby releases from requisition the premises specified below which were requisitioned under Government Order No. R14/101-G/Hira-I-A-1565, dated 17th July 1957..."

The requisition order dated July 4, 1958, runs as follows:—

"Whereas on inquiry it is found that the premises specified below had become vacant on the 3rd day of July 1958 by reason of the de-requisition Order No. VI/101-G/Heera-1, dated 3rd July 1958.

Now therefore, in exercise of the powers conferred by clause (a) of sub-section (4) of section 6 of the Bombay Land Requisition Act 1948 (Bom. XXXIII of 1948) the Government of Bombay is pleased to declare that the said premises had become vacant after 4th December 1947 and to requisition the said premises for a public purpose, namely, for housing a Bombay State Government Servant..."

It is patent that the requisition order in question is made on the basis that the premises had become vacant on July 3, 1958, by reason of the de-requisition order dated July 3, 1958. Jurisdiction to make that requisition order is to be found under s. 6 of the Act. The relevant part of section 6 runs as follows:—

"6. (1) If any premises situate in an area specified by the State Government by notification in the Official Gazette, become vacant...by reason of the release of the premises from requisition...the landlord of such premises shall give intimation thereof in the prescribed form to an officer authorised...

(4) Whether or not an intimation under sub-section (1) is given and notwithstanding anything contained in section 5, the State Government may by order in writing—

(a) requisition the premises for the purpose of the State or any other public purpose and...

Provided that where an order is to be made under clause (a) requisitioning the premises in respect of which no intimation is given by the landlord, the State Government shall make such inquiry as it deems fit and make a declaration in the order that the premises were vacant or had become vacant..."

The relevant provisions of s. 9 are as follows:—

"9. (1) The State Government may at any time release from requisition any land requisitioned or continued to be subject to requisition under this Act.

(2) (a) Upon such release the land shall be restored as far as possible in the same condition in which it was on the date on which the State Government was put in possession thereof, and the State Government shall pay compensation for deterioration, if any,...

(3) When any land is to be released from requisition, the State Government may, after making such inquiry, if any, as it deems fit, specify by order in writing the person to whom possession of the land shall be given."

There are further provisions in s. 9 relating to the machinery for crystallising rights and obligations between the person entitled to possession and the Government regarding the premises. These are not relevant for the purpose of this petition.

Mr. Dalal has referred me to the definition of the word "to requisition" in sub-cl. (5) of s. 4, which runs as under:—

"4. (5) 'to requisition' means in relation to any land to take possession of the land or to require the land to be placed at the disposal of the State Government."

In developing the grounds (2), (3) and (4) mentioned above, Mr. Dalal argues that the word 'release' in sub-s. (1) of s. 6 and sub-s. (1) of s. 9 must be given the same meaning. He contends that 'release' is converse of the definition of the words 'to requisition' as quoted above. He says that requisition means taking of physical possession and the word 'release' when used in ss. 6 and 9 means restoration of physical possession. He contends that on a true construction of the provisions of s. 6, vacancy cannot arise by reason of release of the premises from requisition until after the communication of a de-requisition order to the person concerned and restoration of physical possession of the premises in question to such person. For this contention he places emphasis on sub-s. (2) of s. 9 and says that it is patent that on de-requisition physical possession is directed to be restored. It is not possible, he says, to complete the de-requisition without such restoration of possession. Now, if one looks at the definition of the words 'to requisition' as quoted above, the second part thereof does not refer to or contemplate immediate transfer of physical possession. "To require the land to be placed at the disposal of the State Government" is merely to make a requisition for the purpose. Such an "order of requisition" in all its aspects is completed by merely making an order for the purpose. Even when physical possession is not transferred to the Government and/or taken on behalf of the Government, a "requisition order" made would exist in all its effects. The converse is true of the de-requisition order, if true meaning is to be given to the provisions of s. 9(1) of the Act. The word 'release' is used not as other word for restoration of possession, but as something precedent to transfer and/or restoration of physical possession of the premises. A release from requisition is made in all cases by a "de-requisition order". That order is complete in all its effects and aspects when it is made in the relevant Department of the Government. It is, of course, true that consequent upon such "de-requisition order" the Government will restore physical possession of the premises in question to the appropriate person. It is also necessary that rights and liabilities and obligations in respect of such premises between the Government on the one hand and of the appropriate person on the other hand must be crystallised. The provisions under sub-s. (2) and other subsequent sub-sections of s. 9 relate to the machinery for crystallisation of the rights and liabilities of the parties in respect of the premises including the restoration of the premises. It would not be that in respect of a "de-requisitioned" premises "requisition order" would continue, or be effective in law if physical possession is not restored. Nor would it be conversely true for the Government in a given case to contend that possession having not been restored, there is no "de-requisition" of the property in spite of a "de-requisition order" having been made.

If this is the true meaning of the provisions of s. 9, the same should be applicable to the relevant provisions of s. 6, which provides that a vacancy comes into existence by reason of "release of the premises from requisition". In my view upon a de-requisition order being made there is a release of premises from requisition. This is the meaning of s. 6, and in case of a vacancy arising on "release of the premises from requisition" there is jurisdiction to make an order for requisition on the basis of such vacancy. I, therefore, negative the contention of Mr. Dalal that the word 'release' as mentioned under ss. 6 and 9(1) has reference and/or is connected with restoration of possession. I also negative his contention that no vacancy is created by release from requisition until a de-requisition order is served on the landlord. The de-requisition order is, as I have already held, complete before service or communication thereof on the landlord. I, therefore, negative the contention of Mr. Dalal that there was no vacancy in this case because the de-requisition order and the requisition order in question were served on the petitioner at the same time.

FRANCESCO CORSI v. M/S. GORAKHRAM GOKALCHAND.*

Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act (VI of 1937), Secs. 2, 4(1), 5; First Schedule, Cl. 2—Indian Independence (International Arrangements) Order, 1947, Schedule, Cls. 1, 3, 4—Indian Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Art. 178—Arbitration Act (X of 1940), Sec. 14—Agreement to refer disputes arising out of contract to arbitration in London in accordance with rules of specified Association—Award obtained in London—Petition for filing award in Court in India under Act VI of 1937—Maintainability of petition—Whether award a foreign award within s. 2 of Act—Award whether made in pursuance of an agreement for arbitration to which Protocol applies—Act VI of 1937 whether has force in India after January 26, 1950—Applicability of art. 178, Indian Limitation Act, to application for filing award under s. 5 of Act VI of 1937.

Under a contract the respondents agreed to sell to the petitioner Indian groundnut oil on certain terms and conditions set out in the contract including the term that "all other terms and conditions as per London Oil and Tallow Trade Association Contract." One of the terms of the London Oil and Tallow Trade Association Contract was to the effect that "any dispute arising out of this contract shall be settled by arbitration in London in accordance with the Rules endorsed on this contract." On the petitioner contending that the respondents had failed to supply the goods agreed to be sold by them to the petitioner under the contract, the matter was referred to arbitration in London in accordance with the rules endorsed on the standard form of the contract of the London Oil and Tallow Trade Association. The petitioner obtained an award in his favour and filed a petition under the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, 1937, in the High Court, praying that the award may be ordered to be filed in Court and a decree may be passed according to it. The respondents resisted the application contending that the arbitral procedure including the constitution of the Arbitral Tribunal was not governed in the instant case by the will of the parties within the meaning of clause 2 in the First Schedule to the Act, but the parties had bound themselves by the provisions contained in the London Oil and Tallow Trade Association contract as regards the arbitral procedure and the constitution of the Arbitral Tribunal and their will in that connection had been expressed and that, therefore, the Protocol set forth in the First Schedule to the Act did not apply and the award was not a foreign award within the meaning of s. 2 of the Act:—

Held, that clause 2 in the First Schedule to the Act does not preclude the will of the parties in connection with the arbitral procedure and the constitution of the Arbitral Tribunal being expressed in the instrument whereby the parties agree to refer disputes that may arise in connection with the contract to arbitration, and that, therefore, the agreement for arbitration in the instant case was one to which the Protocol applied and the award was a foreign award within the meaning of s. 2 of the Act.

Clause 2 in the First Schedule to the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, 1937, requires that the constitution of the Arbitral Tribunal should be governed by the will of the parties and that will can be expressed in the agreement of reference. By the expression of that will the Protocol is not excluded.

THE facts are stated in the judgment.

D. P. Madan, with P. P. Khambata and J. M. Thakore, for the petitioner.

M. P. Laud, with J. S. Khambata, for the respondents.

K. T. DESAI J. The petitioner is a national of Italy. He carries on business under the name and style of Messrs. Francesco Corsi. The respondents are a firm, the partners whereof are citizens of India. The respondents carry on business inter alia of import and export at Choksi Chambers, Sheikh Memon Street, Bombay. By three contracts in writing the respondents agreed to sell to the petitioner 300 tons of Indian crude groundnut oil in the aggregate, 100 tons being agreed to be sold under each of the aforesaid contracts on the terms and conditions set out in those contracts. One of the terms of each of the said contracts is as follows:—

"All other terms and conditions as per London L.O.T.T.A. contract (that is, "London Oil and Tallow Trade Association Contract.")"

One of the terms of the said London Oil & Tallow Trade Association contract is as follows:—

"(15) Any dispute arising out of this contract shall be settled by arbitration in London in accordance with the Rules endorsed on this contract..."

The petitioner contended that the respondents had failed to supply the goods agreed to be sold by them to the petitioner under each of the aforesaid contracts and committed a breach of the said contracts. The matter was referred to arbitration in London in accordance with the rules endorsed on the standard form of the contract of the London Oil & Tallow Trade Association. The petitioner obtained an award in his favour on February 23, 1953, for £ 3,711-15-3. The petitioner has filed the present petition praying that the said award may be ordered to be filed in this Court and that judgment may be pronounced and a decree may be passed according to the said award. The respondents have resisted that application and have raised numerous contentions. As the respondents contended that there were several issues which were liable to be tried as preliminary issues, the matter was placed on board for raising issues and for determining which of those issues should be tried as preliminary issues and for trying such preliminary issues. After the issues were raised in this case, the parties agreed that four issues should be tried as preliminary issues. Those issues are as follows:—

(1) Whether the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act of 1937 under which the petitioner has filed the application has any force in India after January 26, 1950.

(2) If the answer to issue No. 1 is in the negative, whether this Honourable Court has jurisdiction to entertain the application.

(3) Whether the said award is a foreign award within the meaning of the said Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, and

(4) Whether the application is barred by the law of limitation.

It was strenuously contended on behalf of the respondents that the Convention on the Execution of Foreign Arbitral Awards had not been duly signed on behalf of India so as to bind the Government of India after India attained independence. The matter was adjourned from time to time in order to enable the respondents to get whatever evidence they desired in the matter. They are, however, not in a position to show that the Convention had not been duly signed or that the Convention is not binding on the present Government of India.

India is a State signatory to the Protocol on Arbitration Clauses and to the Convention on the Execution of Foreign Arbitral Awards. In order to give effect to the said Protocol and of enabling the said Convention to become operative in India, the Indian Legislature passed the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act VI of 1937. In the preamble to the Act, it has been recited as follows:—

"Whereas India was a State signatory to the Protocol on Arbitration Clauses set forth in the First Schedule, and the Convention on the Execution of Foreign Arbitral Awards set forth in the Second Schedule, subject in each case to a reservation of the right to limit its obligations in respect thereof to contracts which are considered as commercial under the law in force in the Provinces of India."

Reliance was placed by Mr. Laud, the learned counsel for the respondents, on foot-note (q) which appears in Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. II, 3rd edn., at p. 52, which runs as follows:—

"Arbitration (Foreign Awards) No. 1 Order, 1938, S.R. & O. 1938 No. 137. Although it is considered that India and Pakistan are now effective participants in the Convention, it may be that a further Order is required in view of the fact that the Arbitration (Foreign Awards) No. 1 Order, 1938, S.R. & O. 1938 No. 137, merely declared that India was a territory to which the Convention applied and did not declare India to be a party to the Convention."

Beyond citing the footnote the learned counsel for the respondents was not in a position to carry the matter any further. He has not referred me to any document for the purpose of showing that India is not bound by the Convention. The Indian Independence (International Arrangements) Order, 1947, came into force on August 14, 1947. By s. 2 of that Order it is provided that the agreement set out in the Schedule to that Order shall, as from the appointed day, have the effect of an agreement duly made between the Dominion of India and the Dominion of Pakistan. In the Schedule it has been stated by cl. 1 that the international rights and obligations to which India was entitled and subject immediately before August 15, 1947, would devolve in accordance with the provisions of that agreement. Clause 3 of the Schedule provides as follows:—

"3. (1) Rights and obligations under international agreements having an exclusive territorial application to an area comprised in the Dominion of India will devolve upon that Dominion..."

Clause 4 of the Schedule provides as follows:—

"Subject to Articles 2 and 3 of this agreement, rights and obligations under all international agreements to which India is a party immediately before the appointed day will devolve both upon the Dominion of India and upon the Dominion of Pakistan, and will, if necessary, be apportioned between the two Dominions."

India being a State signatory to the Protocol on Arbitration Clauses set forth in the First Schedule to the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, 1937, and to the Convention on the Execution of Foreign Arbitral Awards set forth in the Second Schedule to that Act, the obligations undertaken thereunder continue to bind India after India was constituted a Dominion and they continue to bind India thereafter. The Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, 1937, has been duly passed by the Indian Legislature and I am bound to give effect to its provisions. It has not been shown how the said Act has ceased to be in force after January 26, 1950. Issue No. 1 is answered in the affirmative.

In view of the answer given on issue No. 1, issue No. 2 does not arise for consideration.

It is next contended on behalf of the respondents that the award that has been obtained by the petitioner is not a foreign award within the meaning of the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, 1937. Section 2 of that Act, which defines a foreign award, runs as follows:—

"In this Act 'foreign award' means an award on differences relating to matters considered as commercial under the law in force in the Provinces made after the 28th day of July, 1924,—

(a) in pursuance of an agreement for arbitration to which the Protocol set forth in the First Schedule applies, and

(b) between persons of whom one is subject to the jurisdiction of some one of such Powers as the Central Government, being satisfied that reciprocal provisions have been made, may, by notification in the Official Gazette, declare to be parties to the Convention set forth in the Second Schedule, and of whom the other is subject to the jurisdiction of some other of the Powers aforesaid, and .

"(c) in one of such territories as the Central Government, being satisfied that reciprocal provisions have been made, may, by like notification, declare to be territories to which the said Convention applies, and for the purposes of this Act an award shall not be deemed to be final if any proceedings for the purpose of contesting the validity of the award are pending in the country in which it was made."

The only ground urged by the learned counsel on behalf of the respondents for saying that the award was not a foreign award within the meaning of the Act was that it was not made in pursuance of an agreement for arbitration to which the Protocol set forth in the First Schedule applied. It was argued that the parties had contracted themselves out of the Protocol set forth in the First Schedule to the Act. In this connection, strong reliance was placed upon cl. 2 appearing in the First Schedule. That clause runs as under:—

"The arbitral procedure, including the constitution of the Arbitral Tribunal, shall be governed by the will of the parties and by the law of the country in whose territory the arbitration takes place."

It is not disputed that the arbitral procedure, including the constitution of the Arbitral Tribunal, is governed under the terms of the contract by the law of the country in whose territory the arbitration was to take place viz. England. What is urged is that the arbitral procedure including the constitution of the Arbitral Tribunal is not governed in the present case by the will of the parties within the meaning of the said cl. 2. It is urged that as the parties in the present case have bound themselves by the provisions contained in the London Oil & Tallow Trade Association's contracts as regards the arbitral procedure and the constitution of the Arbitral Tribunal, their will in that connection has been expressed and does not thereafter remain to be expressed and where such will has been expressed, the protocol cannot apply. In this connection, cl. 14 of the London Oil and Tallow Trade Association's contract was referred to. That clause provides as under:—

"For the purpose of all proceedings whether at law or by arbitration this contract shall be deemed to be in all respects an English contract, and all disputes and questions thereunder shall be decided in accordance with the law of England. The arbitrators appointed in England and/or the English Courts as the case may be, shall have exclusive jurisdiction over all such disputes and questions. Any party domiciled resident or trading in Scotland shall be held to have prorogated jurisdiction against himself to the English Courts and any party domiciled resident or trading elsewhere than in England or Scotland shall be deemed to have submitted to the jurisdiction of the English Courts. Provided nevertheless that for the purpose only of enforcing or carrying into effect any order, award or judgment of the arbitrators or the English Courts outside the jurisdiction of the English Courts either party may resort to any Court or Authority within whose jurisdiction the other party or any property of his may be found. All proceedings, notices of proceedings and other notices in connection with or to give effect to the arbitration shall be served upon any party not domiciled in England by leaving the same addressed to such party at the office in London of the London Oil and Tallow Trades Association and in the case of a party domiciled, resident or trading elsewhere than in England, Scotland or Ireland by leaving copies or duplicates thereof with the Consul or Agent in London of the country in which such party's last known address is situate..."

Clause 15 of the said contract provides for settlement by arbitration in London of any dispute arising out of the contract in accordance with the rules endorsed on the contract. The rules contain detailed provisions as regards the constitution of the Arbitral Tribunal and the arbitral procedure. The parties in this case have bound themselves by the aforesaid provisions and their will in connection with the arbitral procedure and the constitution of the Arbitral

Tribunal has been duly expressed. The argument of counsel for the respondents is that in order that the protocol may apply the will of the parties in that connection must not have been crystallised and expressed in the contract whereunder the parties agree to submit their disputes to arbitration. I do not see any reason or any warrant for this submission. There is nothing in cl. 2 which precludes that will being expressed in the instrument whereby the parties agree to refer disputes that may arise in connection with the contract to arbitration. I fail to see how the parties could be said to have contracted themselves out of the Protocol by reason of cl. 14 or 15 of the London Oil and Tallow Trade Association's contract.

Mr. Land relies upon two judgments of the Calcutta High Court in this connection delivered by one Judge of that Court. The first is the case of *W. Wood & Sons v. Bengal Corpn.*¹ In that case an application was made under s. 3 of the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, 1937, for the stay of a suit on the ground that the parties had agreed to refer the subject-matter of the suit to arbitration. In that case the party applying for stay had itself brought an action in the Queen's Bench Division in England in connection with the very contract giving rise to the claim in the suit and had obtained a judgment against the plaintiff in that suit and could not be said to be ready and willing to go to arbitration. The learned Judge there observed that the party applying for stay had by bringing the action in the Queen's Bench Division in respect of the matter agreed to be referred showed that it was not at the time when the proceedings were commenced in the Calcutta High Court ready and willing to do all things necessary to the proper conduct of the arbitration and that the application on that ground was liable to be dismissed. Thereafter the learned Judge, however, further proceeded to observe as follows (p. 240):

"My second reason is that it is open to parties, subject respectively to the jurisdiction of different Contracting States who are signatories to the Protocol and Convention, to elect to come either under Arbitration under the National Statutes or under Arbitration under the Protocol. If by their Arbitration Agreement such parties choose Arbitration under National Statutes, such as the course which is chosen by the parties here, the agreement being that the parties should be governed by the English Arbitration Act mentioned in Cl. 9 of the Agreement, there is then no further scope left for invoking the Protocol Arbitration any more.

To hold otherwise will be tantamount to saying the nonsense that parties choose two different competitive Arbitration Tribunals to decide disputes under the same contract. This conclusion becomes clear on the construction of the words 'a submission made in pursuance of an agreement to which the Protocol set forth in the First Schedule applies' used in S. 3 of that Act. A reference to the First Schedule of that Act will at once show the meaning of those words. Clause 2 of the First Schedule says:

"The arbitral procedure, including the constitution of the Arbitral Tribunal, shall be governed by the will of the parties and by the law of the country in whose territory the arbitration takes place'.

Now plainly the Arbitral Tribunal there contemplated has to be governed by the 'will' of the parties. It is obvious on the facts of this case that there is no agreed will of the parties on such Arbitral Tribunal. It was contended by Counsel on behalf of the applicant that the will of the parties was the contract between the parties or, in other words, Arbitration under the English Arbitration Act.

Clearly that argument is erroneous for two reasons: firstly because if that is the Arbitral Tribunal, then it is not a Tribunal under the Protocol and, secondly because the words 'will of the parties' in Cl. 2 of the First Schedule cannot represent the contract between the parties because wherever the contract between the parties is intended, the First Schedule uses the word 'contract' not 'will'."

I have quoted the observations of the learned Judge in extenso because the learned counsel who has urged this point before me has adopted those words as part of his argument and he has frankly stated before me that beyond what is stated in the observations of the learned Judge he is not in a position to advance any argument or in any way to implement further those observations. With respect to the learned Judge, I am unable to agree with the observations made by him and the reasons given therefor. One of the reasons on which the learned Judge has based his decision is that if a view contrary to that expressed by the learned Judge is taken, there would be constituted two different competitive Arbitration Tribunals to decide the disputes under the same contract. With respect to the learned Judge, I fail to see how two different competitive arbitration tribunals would be constituted. Clause 2 of the First Schedule on which reliance has been placed refers to an Arbitral Tribunal constituted by the will of the parties. If the parties express their will and say that the Tribunal shall be constituted as provided under the English Arbitration Act, there is no room for appointing another Tribunal. The learned Judge perhaps seems to be labouring under the impression that under the Protocol a separate tribunal is constituted and that if there is an agreement for arbitration to which the Protocol applies, the parties are bound to have the matters in dispute adjudicated before that Tribunal. There is no such Tribunal constituted under the Protocol. The Protocol itself by cl. 2 provides that the constitution of the Arbitral Tribunal shall be governed by the will of the parties. According to the will of the parties as expressed in the contract in that case which provided for the constitution of the Arbitral Tribunal according to the English Arbitration Act, there would only be one Tribunal. With respect to the learned Judge, I do not agree with his view that if the parties elect to have the Arbitral Tribunal constituted in accordance with the "National Statutes", the application of the Protocol is excluded. Clause 2 requires that the constitution of the Arbitral Tribunal should be governed by the will of the parties and that will can be expressed in the agreement of reference. By the expression of that will the Protocol is not excluded.

The second decision of the same Judge relied upon by learned counsel on behalf of the respondents is the one reported in *Bajrang E. S. Co. v. Commrs. for Port of Cal.*² In that case, a suit was filed against four different defendants of whom one alone was a party to the arbitration agreement and he applied for stay of the suit. The Court held that the entire suit could not be stayed as it would mean staying the suit against the other defendants who were not parties to the arbitration agreement. The learned Judge refused to stay the suit saying that at best the applicant could ask for a stay of the suit against himself and no others. He further observed that that was a course which had its peculiar difficulties mainly because that meant trial of a suit piecemeal and that such a procedure was most undesirable and unfair unless there were cogent reasons to the contrary and that no such reasons existed in that case. This point by itself was sufficient for the purpose of disposing of the matter. The learned Judge thereafter following his earlier judgment further held that in his opinion the Protocol arbitration did not apply to the case as it was stipulated by the parties to the arbitration agreement that disputes were to be decided in England and that no legal proceedings should be taken to enforce any claim except in England, so that it could at best stipulate for English Arbitration in England or trial of the dispute in English Courts of law in England. It is not necessary for me to state once again the reasons which impel me not to accept the conclusion reached by the learned Judge about the non-applicability of the Protocol.

In my view, the agreement for arbitration in the case before me is one to which the Protocol set forth in the First Schedule to the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, 1937, applies and that the award is a foreign award within the meaning of the said Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act. Issue No. 3 is accordingly answered in the affirmative.

As regards the fourth issue, the learned counsel for the respondents urged that the application was barred by the law of limitation. The award was made on February 23, 1958. The petition has been filed on October 13, 1955. It is urged that art. 178 in the First Schedule to the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, governs the filing of the petition and that the period of limitation being 90 days, the petition is barred by the law of limitation. Article 178 runs as follows:—

"Under the Arbitration Act, 1940, for the filing in Court of an award, period of limitation ninety days from the date of service of the notice of the making of the award."

It is not disputed that the petition has been filed more than 90 days from the date of service of the notice of the making of the award. By the petition the petitioner has prayed that the award may be filed in this Court and that judgment may be pronounced and a decree may be passed according to the said award. Now, the application has been made under the provisions contained in the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, 1937. It is not an application made under the Arbitration Act, 1940, and the short answer to the argument advanced on behalf of the respondents is that it is not an application under the Arbitration Act, 1940, for the filing in Court of an award and that art. 178 cannot possibly apply. Section 14 of the Indian Arbitration Act provides as follows:—

"14. (1) When the arbitrators or umpire have made their award, they shall sign it and shall give notice in writing to the parties of the making and signing thereof and of the amount of fees and charges payable in respect of the arbitration and award.

(2) The arbitrators or umpire shall, at the request of any party to the arbitration agreement or any person claiming under such party or if so directed by the Court and upon payment of the fees and charges due in respect of the arbitration and award and of the costs and charges of filing the award, cause the award or a signed copy of it, together with any depositions and documents which may have been taken and proved before them, to be filed in Court, and the Court shall thereupon give notice to the parties of the filing of the award."

A duty is cast upon the arbitrators or umpire to cause an award or a signed copy of it to be filed in Court under the circumstances mentioned in that section. When the arbitrators or umpire send the award to the Court for the purpose of being filed in Court, it is the duty of the Court to file the award and give notice to the parties of the filing of the award. The filing contemplated under s. 14 is a ministerial act. Article 178 of the Indian Limitation Act does not apply to such filing. There is no time limit for the arbitrators or umpire to file the award in Court. The application contemplated by art. 178 is an application to direct or compel the arbitrators or umpire to carry out their obligation under s. 14, sub-s. (2), of the Indian Arbitration Act. The period of 90 days is provided only for such an application. So far as the Bombay High Court is concerned, it has been so held by Chagla J., as he then was, in the case of Jayantilal Jamnadas v. Chhaganlal.³

Counsel for the respondents relied on s. 4(1) of the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, 1937, which provides that a foreign award shall, subject to the provisions of the Act, be enforceable in India as if it were an award made on a matter referred to arbitration in India. He urged that as a foreign award is enforceable in India as if it were an award made on a matter referred to arbitration in India, art. 178 would apply to an application for filing a foreign award in Court. Merely because a foreign award is enforceable in India as if it were an award made on a matter referred to arbitration in India, it does not make that award an award under the Indian Arbitration Act, 1940. It has been held by a Division Bench of this Court consisting of Chagla C.J. and Bhagwati J. in the case of *Madhav Prasad Nigam v. Chandavarkar*⁴ at p. 749, that it is an elementary principle of construction that the scope of the Limitation Act cannot be extended by implication, and a party's right to come to Court cannot be taken away unless the Limitation Act expressly provides that his right is so barred. Section 4(1) of the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, 1937, does not say that a foreign award shall be deemed to be an award made under the Arbitration Act, 1940. It is only enforceable in India subject to the provisions of that Act as if it was an award made on a matter referred to arbitration in India. Before a foreign award is filed under the provisions contained in the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, 1937, there are various requirements of law which have to be satisfied. Section 6 of the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, 1937, provides that it is only where the Court is satisfied that the foreign award is enforceable under that Act that the Court should order that award to be filed. Section 7 of the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, 1937, requires that in order that a foreign award may be enforceable under the Act, it must have been made in pursuance of an agreement for arbitration which was valid under the law by which it was governed, it must have been made by the tribunal provided for in the agreement or constituted in the manner agreed upon by the parties, it must have been made in conformity with the law governing the arbitration procedure, it must have become final in the country in which it was made and it must have been in respect of a matter which may lawfully be referred to arbitration under the law of India and the enforcement thereof must not be contrary to the public policy or the law in India. Sub-section (2) of s. 7 provides for various circumstances under which a foreign award is not made enforceable under the Act. The provisions of law in connection with the filing of an award under the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, 1937, are entirely different from the provisions contained under the Arbitration Act, 1940, for the filing of the award. The nature of the inquiry before the Court under the two Acts is entirely different and an application for the filing of an award under the provisions of the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, 1937, cannot be equated with an application for directions to file an award under the Arbitration Act, 1940.

Mr. Laud has relied upon an unreported judgment of a single Judge of the Madras High Court in support of his argument in this connection, and if I may say so, that judgment constitutes his sheet-anchor. It is the judgment of Mr. Justice Basheer Ahmed Sayeed in Civil Revision Petitions Nos. 46 of 1954 and 2369 of 1953, delivered on March 13, 1956. In that case an application was made for the filing of a foreign award. That application was filed more than 90 days from the date of the service of notice of the making of the award. Mr. Justice Basheer Ahmed Sayeed, who decided the matter, held that art. 178 applied and considered the application to be barred by the law of limitation. In the course of his judgment the learned Judge observes as follows:—

"By analogy, the provisions contained in sec. 4 of the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act VI of 1937 that a foreign award shall, subject to the provisions of the said Act, be enforceable in the provinces as if it were an award made on a matter referred to arbitration in the provinces, would mean that the foreign award, when it is sought to be enforced, shall conform to all the procedure provided for in the Indian Arbitration Act and laws of the country, before it could become a decree of a Civil Court. When the foreign award filed thus attracts to itself all the provisions of the Indian Arbitration Act and other laws of the State (Provinces) ipso facto the law of limitation in force in this country also becomes applicable to the foreign award. The foreign award is placed exactly on the same footing as an Indian award so far as its enforcement is concerned...in view of the express terms of sec. 4 of the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, Act VI of 1937, it cannot stand to reason that the period of limitation available for the enforcement of such foreign awards should be different from the period of limitation that is applicable to awards made under the Indian Arbitration Act."

With respect to the learned Judge, I am unable to agree with the conclusion reached by the learned Judge. A foreign award is not placed exactly on the same footing as an Indian award so far as its enforcement is concerned. Section 4 of the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, 1937, makes the enforceability subject to the provisions of that Act. Section 7 of that Act lays down numerous conditions which have to be satisfied before a foreign award is considered enforceable. The period of limitation required to be considered is for an application for the filing in Court of an award. As I have already indicated, the provisions in connection with the filing of the award under the Indian Arbitration Act are totally different from those contained in the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, 1937, and an application for filing an award under s. 5 of the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act cannot be treated as an application for filing an award under the Arbitration Act, 1940. In my view, art. 178 does not apply to the application before me. The other articles referred to were arts. 181 and 120. Article 181 has been held to cover only applications made under the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code and no other in numerous cases which had been decided prior to the legislative changes made in arts. 158 and 178 by s. 49(2) of the Arbitration Act, 1940. It is not necessary for me to consider in the present case the effect of the new arts. 158 and 179 on the interpretation of art. 181 or the applicability of art. 120. The only article relied on for the purpose of showing that the application is barred by the law of limitation is art. 178. That article does not apply to the facts of the case. It is not contended before me that if the provisions of art. 178 do not apply the petition is in any way barred by the law of limitation. I answer issue No. 4 in the negative.

The proviso to s. 73(1) of the Berar Land Revenue Code, 1928, does not apply in cases in which the commencement of tenancy is known. Therefore, a tenant cannot, under this proviso, claim the status of a tenant of antiquity if the date of commencement of his tenancy is known.

ONE Rajeshwarrao, father of Raje Nilkantharao (defendant No. 1) and husband of defendant No. 2, who had filed C.S. No. 190-A of 1953 in the Court of the Second Civil Judge, Second Class, Washim, against Shiekh Rahiman (plaintiff), was a superior holder. His allegation against the plaintiff was that he was an annual tenant of the fields in suit and that his lease was terminated by notice on December 27, 1941. The plaintiff pleaded that he was a tenant of antiquity of the fields. The suit was decreed in favour of the defendants, and the trial Judge held that the plaintiff was only an annual tenant. In execution of this decree, the defendants obtained possession of the fields from the plaintiff on May 7, 1944, and since then continued in possession till they executed a lease-deed on December 19, 1947, in favour of defendants Nos. 3 and 4 and the fields came into possession of defendants Nos. 3 and 4 as lessees of defendants Nos. 1 and 2.

The plaintiff filed Civil Suit No. 74-A of 1950 against defendant No. 1 and others for possession of the same fields. The plaintiff urged that his predecessors-in-title had been in possession of the fields for over a period of 75 years and it could not be said when the tenancy of his predecessors-in-title started. The defendants contended that the plaintiff and his predecessors-in-title came in possession of the fields in suit on October 15, 1919, under a registered Kabuliast and before that they were not in possession.

The trial Court found that the plaintiff was a tenant of antiquity and it decreed the plaintiff's suit. On appeal the Additional District Judge reversed the finding of the trial Court and allowed the appeal. The plaintiff appealed to the High Court Bench at Nagpur. The appeal came on for hearing before J. C. Shah and Kotval JJ. who referred the appeal to a full bench. The following order of reference was made by their Lordships on July 24, 1957:—

This second appeal raises a question as to the conditions requisite for raising a presumption of permanent tenancy in favour of a tenant whose tenancy is of long duration. There appears to be a conflict of decisions in the Nagpur High Court on the question as to the true interpretation of s. 73 of the

“...if twenty years' user is proved, the landlord can get rid of the presumption arising under the proviso in two ways only, that is to say, (i) by proving that the tenant is an annual tenant, or (ii) that the period of twenty years is covered by one or more valid written leases. There may be no need to go to the main section unless the landlord established one or the other of the two circumstances under which the presumption is displaced. Once the presumption is lost to the tenant, the matter is again at large for decision under the main section.”

Whereas it appears that in an earlier judgment, V. H. Shastry v. R. B. V. P. Puranik,² it was observed by the division bench consisting of Mr. Justice Bose and Mr. Justice Mangalmurti in para. No. 36 of the judgment:

“...if there is 20 years continuous possession by the person in possession, he must now succeed in all cases where the first provision in Section 73 is prima facie fulfilled, unless the Landlord proves an exact commencement for the tenancy, or unless he proves that the defendant is an annual tenant.”

The learned advocates on behalf of the parties agree that there is a conflict between the two Division Bench judgments. We think, in the circumstances, that the papers be placed before the Chief Justice for constituting a full bench to hear and decide this second appeal.

The appeal was heard by a full bench composed of Chainani C.J. and Tambe and Badkas JJ.

CHAINANI C.J. The order of reference to the Full Bench does not formulate the question, which we have to decide. In consultation with the learned counsel on both sides, the question has been formulated as follows:

“Whether the proviso to sub-section (1) of section 73 of the Barar Land Revenue Code applies in cases in which the commencement of tenancy is known.”

In order to appreciate the arguments, which have been advanced before us, it is necessary to refer to the relevant provisions of the Code. Sub-section (1) of s. 73, as it originally stood, was as follows:

“Where, by reason of the antiquity of a tenancy in an alienated village or holding, no satisfactory evidence of its commencement and of its period is forthcoming and there is no usage of the locality as to such period, the period shall, as against the landlord of the tenant, be presumed to be co-extensive with the duration of the tenure of such landlord and those who derive title under him.

Such tenant is called a tenant of antiquity and his rights shall be heritable and transferable in accordance with his personal law.”

There was an explanation to this sub-section, which provided that antiquity did not mean absolute antiquity but meant antiquity in reference to the difficulty of securing evidence. This sub-section was in similar terms to s. 83 of 1 [1956] Nag. 357.

2 (1948) Letters Patent Appeal No. 6 of

1945, decided by Bose and Mangalmurti JJ., on December 31, 1948 (Unrep.)

the Bombay Land Revenue Code, which is as follows:

"And where by reason of the antiquity of a tenancy, no satisfactory evidence of its commencement is forthcoming, and there is not any such evidence of the period of its intended duration, if any, agreed upon between the landlord and tenant, or those under whom they respectively claim title, or any usage of the locality as to duration of such tenancy, it shall, as against the immediate landlord of the tenant, be presumed to be co-extensive with the duration of the tenure of such landlord and of those who derive title under him."

This section came up for consideration before the Privy Council in Shankarrao Dagadujirao v. Shambhu Nathu Patil.¹ The Privy Council held that the particular presumption mentioned in this s. 83 could not be made save upon two conditions: first, that there is no satisfactory evidence of the date of the commencement of the tenancy, and secondly, that this lack is due to the antiquity of the tenancy. It was observed that by a tenancy's antiquity the section does not intend any reference to remote ages in the past or to time immemorial, but that it is to be given the practical meaning appropriate to its context and afforded by the limits within which living testimony to past facts is necessarily restricted. In order to be entitled to the status of a tenant of antiquity under sub-s. (1) of s. 73 of the Berar Land Revenue Code, a tenant had therefore to prove, firstly, that no satisfactory evidence of the commencement of the tenancy and of its period was forthcoming; and, secondly, that this was due to the antiquity of the tenancy; in other words, he had to show that the origin of the tenancy was lost in antiquity or that it came into existence before the period of living memory. This naturally imposed a heavy burden upon the tenants for proving that they were tenants of antiquity. It was also held by the Courts that if during the period, for which a tenant had been in possession of a land, he had executed leases or kabuliyaats, such leases or kabuliyaats created new tenancies and that consequently, in such cases, the presumption about the antiquity of a tenancy could not arise. See, for instance, *Vijbhukhandas v. Ishvardas*² and Mohammad v. Maruti.³ In the last case, it was held that the execution of a kabuliyaat by a tenant imports a surrender of the old tenancy and commencement of a fresh one from that date, and that the commencement of the tenure being known, the requisite conditions in s. 73 of the Berar Land Revenue Code were not fulfilled in order to entitle the tenant to claim a tenancy of antiquity.

In 1948, the Legislature amended s. 73 of the Code. A proviso was inserted in sub-s. (1) of s. 73 and this was in the following terms:

"Provided that where a tenant not being an ante-alienation tenant proves that he has personally or through his predecessors-in-title held land continuously for a period in excess of twenty years shall be deemed to be a tenant of antiquity unless the landlord proves that such tenant is an annual tenant or a tenant holding the land under one or more valid written leases covering the entire period of twenty years."

This amendment was given retrospective effect by a new s. 73-A inserted in the Code, which also made a provision for tenants ejected after January 1, 1935, to file suits in order to recover possession of lands from which they had been evicted. Sub-section (3) of s. 73-A provided that the Court should decide such suits as if s. 73, as amended by the Act of 1948, was in force on January 1, 1935. The proviso added to sub-s. (1) of s. 73, therefore, creates a new rule of evidence, under which if a tenant shows that he has been in continuous possession of a land in excess of twenty years, he is to be deemed to be a tenant of antiquity. It may also be said to have conferred the status of tenants of antiquity on those classes of tenants, who have been in continuous possession of their lands for more than twenty years. If a tenant proves continuous possession of his land for a little over twenty years, a presumption arises in his favour that he is a tenant of antiquity. The burden then shifts to the landlord to show either that the tenant was an annual tenant or that he was a tenant who held the land under one or more valid written leases covering the entire period of twenty years. If the landlord is unable to discharge this burden, the tenant is to be deemed to be a tenant of antiquity.

The question, which we have to determine, is whether this proviso applies in cases, in which the origin of a tenancy can be ascertained or is known. On behalf of the tenants it has been urged that the proviso enacts a substantive provision, that this provision has been made in order to counter or destroy the effect of sub-s. (1) of s. 73 as it stood before its amendment, that it brings into existence a new concept as to for what period a tenancy must exist before it can be said to be a tenancy of antiquity, that this proviso is, therefore, independent of the main part of sub-s. (1) of s. 73, and that if the conditions mentioned in the proviso are satisfied, the tenant must be deemed to be a tenant of antiquity, irrespective of whether the commencement of the tenancy is or is not known. On the other hand, it has been urged by the learned counsel, who have appeared on behalf of the landlords, that the main part of sub-s. (1) of s. 73 must be read along with the proviso and that a tenant cannot claim the status of a tenant of antiquity, if the origin of the tenancy is known.

To decide which of these contentions should be accepted, it is necessary to bear in mind that in 1948 when the Legislature amended s. 73, the original provision contained in sub-s. (1) was not repealed, that it was allowed to stand as it was before, and that a new provision was inserted in the form of a proviso. This provision also was not enacted in the form of a separate sub-section or section. The fact that the original provision of sub-s. (1) was not repealed or modified negatives the argument, which has been advanced that the Legislature enacted the new provision to destroy the effect of this part of the section.

In *M/s. Ram Narain Sons Ltd. v. Asst. Commissioner of Sales Tax*⁴ the Supreme Court has observed (p. 493):—

“...It is a cardinal rule of interpretation that a proviso to a particular provision of a statute only embraces the field which is covered by the main provision. It carves out an exception to the main provision to which it has been enacted as a proviso and to no other.”

In *Abdul Jabar Butt v. State of Jammu and Kashmir*⁵ it has been observed that it is a fundamental rule of construction that a proviso must be considered with relation to the principal matter, to which it stands as a proviso and that the proviso has to be construed harmoniously with the provisions, to which it is a proviso.

Mr. Kherdekar on behalf of the tenants has referred us to *Shankarlal v. Pandharinath*⁶ in which it was held that if the proviso in clear and explicit terms enacts a substantive provision, it cannot necessarily be controlled by the language of the main enactment. But in the same case it was observed that the normal function of a proviso is to except and deal with a case which would otherwise fall within the general language of the main enactment and its effect is confined to that case. Mr. Kherdekar has also referred us to the observations in *Keshavlal Premchand v. Comr. I.T.*⁷ that a Legislature may enact a substantive provision in the garb or guise of a proviso and that if the Court is satisfied that the language used in the so-called proviso is incapable of making it applicable to the section, then the Court, if the proviso has a clear meaning, must look upon the proviso as a substantive provision enacted by the Legislature and give effect to it as such. But, in the same case, it was observed that ordinarily the proviso cannot deal with any other field than the field which the section itself deals with and that the duty of the Court also must be to give to the proviso as far as possible a meaning so restricted as to bring it within the ambit and purview of the section itself. Therefore, if a proviso is capable of a wider connotation and is also capable of a narrower connotation, if the narrower connotation brings it within the purview of the section, then the Court must prefer the narrower connotation rather than the wider connotation.

It is clear from these authorities that the duty of the Court is to effect a harmonious construction between a proviso and the provision to which it is a proviso and that as far as possible the proviso must be so interpreted and its meaning so restricted as to bring it within the ambit and purview of the main provision itself. In this case, it is possible to read the main provision in sub-s. (1) of s. 73 and the proviso together. That, this is what the Legislature intended, is also suggested by the fact that in the proviso the Legislature has not used the words, such as, "notwithstanding anything contained above, or in sub-section (1)". The effect of reading the main provision of sub-s. (1) of s. 73 and the proviso together will be that the proviso will only apply in cases in which the commencement of a tenancy cannot be ascertained. This interpretation is also in accordance with the basic concept of the expression "tenancy of antiquity". The ordinary conception of such a tenancy is that the tenancy is so ancient that its origin cannot be determined.

We have been referred to the Statement of Objects and Reasons which led to the enactment of the Amending Act of 1948. The Statement of Objects and Reasons is not admissible as an aid to the construction of a statute. But it can be referred to for the limited purpose of ascertaining the conditions prevailing at the time, which actuated the sponsor of the Bill to introduce the same and the extent and urgency of the evil which he sought to remedy. See *The State of West Bengal v. Subodh Gopal Bose*⁸ and M. K. Ranganathan v. Government of Madras.⁹ This Statement of Objects and Reasons is in the following terms:

"In alienated villages in Berar ante-alienation tenants and tenants of antiquity have protected status. According to the present law, a tenant has to prove facts existing before 1875, or thereabout, for being declared an ante-alienation tenant. Generally the tenants are illiterate and they are rarely in possession of documentary evidence to show what rent their ancestors or predecessors-in-title paid as far back as 1875. Moreover in Berar oral sales were quite common before 1908, in which year the Transfer of Property Act came into force, and oral sales at this distance of time are often difficult of proof. A tenant is often unable to prove a continuous line of succession from 1875 and thus is not able to take advantage of the protected status.

2. The position of tenants of antiquity as defined in section 73 is equally unsatisfactory. The law does not define what is antiquity and individual Judges have taken different views...

3. This Bill is designed to facilitate the conferral of protected status on the tenants."

This Statement of Objects and Reasons shows that the principal reasons for amending the Act were that the law did not define what was antiquity and that a tenant found it difficult to prove continuous possession of land for a very long period. It, therefore, appears that in order to reduce the heavy burden, which lay on the tenants to prove continuous possession of land for a period beyond living memory, the Legislature decided to amend the section so as to confer a certain status on tenants, who had been in continuous possession of lands for twenty years. The Legislature, however, also decided to retain original sub-s. (1) of s. 73. The object, therefore, appears to have been to confer the status of tenants of antiquity on those tenants, who were in continuous possession of lands for twenty years or more, in cases in which the origin of tenancy was not known. After the Act was amended, it is not necessary for the tenant to prove that he was in continuous possession of the land or that the tenancy was in existence since long before living memory. As soon as he proves that he has been in continuous possession of the land for twenty years or more, he is presumed to be a tenant of antiquity. The burden of proof, which the tenant had to discharge under the old law, has, therefore, been considerably reduced. The Legislature has also imposed restrictions, so as to make it difficult for landlord to eject such tenants, who have been in continuous possession of the lands for twenty years or more, by requiring them to prove either that the tenants were only annual tenants or that they held the lands under one or more written leases covering the entire period of twenty years. A landlord can no longer obtain possession of a land merely on proof of execution by the tenant of one or more kabuliyats or leases during the long period of his tenancy. He has to prove execution of valid written leases covering the entire period of twenty years.

It has been urged on behalf of the tenants that the presumption arising under the proviso can be destroyed only in two ways mentioned in the proviso and that in the view we are taking, we are not giving full effect to the provisions contained in the proviso. We do not think that there is much force in the argument, because what we are doing is to give effect and meaning both to the main provisions contained in sub-s. (1) of s. 73 and also to the proviso to this sub-section. The Legislature having decided in its wisdom to retain the original sub-s. (1) of s. 73, it cannot be ignored. It must be given its full meaning and the proviso must be read along with it and not independently. The whole section, as amended in 1948, must be read together in order to ascertain what the real aim and purpose of the Legislature was, and if this is done, it appears to us that the aim and purpose of the Legislature was to confer the status of tenants of antiquity on those tenants, who were in continuous possession of their lands for a period exceeding twenty years, in cases in which the origin or the commencement of the tenancy could not be ascertained.

We have been referred to certain cases, in which a contrary view has been taken. In *Martand v. Ganpat*¹⁰ it was held that the presumption arising under the proviso to sub-s. (1) of s. 73 of the Berar Land Revenue Code can be got rid of in two ways only, viz. (i) by proving that the tenant is an annual tenant, or (ii) that the period of twenty years is covered by one or more valid written leases and that it is only when the presumption arising under the proviso is lost, that resort can be had to the main section. This decision has been followed in *Mohammad v. Kundalik*¹¹ and in some other unreported cases. The judgment in Martand's case shows that the learned Judges had found it difficult to interpret the section and the proviso harmoniously. With respect, it seems to us that it is possible to harmonise the main section and the proviso and to read them in a manner, which would give full effect and meaning to both. We may also mention that a view similar to that which we are taking was also taken by another Division Bench of the Nagpur High Court in V. H. Shastri v. B. B. V. P. Purank,¹² in which it was observed that

"If there is 20 years' continuous possession by the person in possession, he must now succeed in all cases where the first provision in section 73 is prima facie fulfilled, unless the landlord proves the exact commencement of the tenancy or unless he proves that the defendant is an annual tenant."

We are, therefore, of the opinion that the question, which we have formulated above for decision by us, must be answered in the negative and that a tenant cannot claim the status of a tenant of antiquity, if the date of commencement of tenancy is known. In this connection it is necessary to consider what the expression 'commencement of tenancy' means. Except in the case of one or more isolated leases executed by a tenant during a very long period of his possession, the former view was that if a tenant during the period of his tenancy executed a lease, the date of commencement of the tenancy was the date on which the lease came into force. This view can no longer be regarded as correct, for, under the proviso unless a landlord proves valid written leases covering a period of twenty years, he cannot displace the presumption arising under the proviso that the tenant is a tenant of antiquity. The words 'commencement of tenancy' must, therefore, be held to refer to the original or the first tenancy, under which the tenant or his predecessor-in-title entered into possession of the land as a tenant and since the time of which tenancy he and his predecessors-in-title have been in continuous and uninterrupted possession of the land.

Appeal No. 6 of 1953 will now be placed before a Division Bench for further orders.

Answer accordingly.

A municipal corporation is included within the expression "municipality" appearing in the Fourth Schedule of the Representation of the People Act, 1950.

The expression 'municipality' used in the Constitution of India as well as in the Fourth Schedule of the Representation of the People Act, 1950, includes all bodies entrusted with the administration of municipal affairs of a city or a town.

A notified area committee is not included in the expression "municipality" used in the Fourth Schedule of the Representation of the People Act, 1950.

Section 27 of the Representation of the People Act, 1950, confers on all the members of the local authorities specified in the Fourth Schedule of the Act, a right to get their names entered in the electoral roll of the local authorities' constituency. Therefore, under the 7th Item [i.e. "Janapada Sabhas (Rural Circle)"] in the Fourth Schedule to the Act relating to the State of Bombay, such a right is conferred not only on members selected from rural circles of the Janapada Sabhas but also on members selected from urban circle of the Janapada Sabhas.

The Electoral Registration Officer erroneously entered the names of the members of certain notified area committees in the Vidarbha electoral roll of the Vidarbha Local Authorities Constituency for electing members to the Bombay Legislative Council. On the question whether this error on the part of the Officer attracted the Held, that there was no improper reception of any vote within the meaning of the first part of cl. (iii) of s. 100(1)(d) of the Act even assuming that all the members of the notified area committees had voted at the election, that under s. 62 of the Act the votes cast by these members were not void and, therefore, these could not be deemed to be void votes within the meaning of the second part of cl. (iii) of s. 100(1)(d) of the Act, and that the non-compliance contemplated in cl. (iv) of s. 100(1)(d) of the Act is the non-compliance of the provisions of the Constitution of India or of the provisions of the Act or of the rules or orders made under the Act, and, therefore, non-compliance with the provisions of s. 27(2)(a) read with the Fourth Schedule of the Representation of the People Act, 1950, does not fall within the scope and ambit of cl. (iv) of s. 100(1)(d).

TAMBE J. This is an appeal under s. 116-A of the Representation of the People Act, 1951 (hereinafter referred to as Act of 1951) by one Ramdayal Ayodhyaprasad Gupta, a defeated candidate at the election held on January 24, 1958, for electing five members to the Legislative Council of the State of Bombay from the Vidarbha Local Authorities' Constituency. The questions raised in this appeal relate to the scope and ambit of expressions "Municipality" and "Janapada Sabha (Rural Circle)" appearing in the Fourth Schedule of the Representation of the People Act, 1950 (hereinafter referred to as Act of 1950).

Article 171 of the Constitution relates to the composition of the Legislative Council. It provides that the Legislative Council of a State shall consist of members elected from certain electorates referred to in sub-cl. (a) to (d) of cl. (3) of this article and of certain nominated members as provided in sub-cl. (e) of the said cl. (3). We are here concerned with the electorate mentioned in sub-cl. (a) of cl. (3) of art. 171 which is an electorate consisting of members of municipalities, district boards and such other local authorities in the State as Parliament may by law specify. Clause (2) of this article provides that until Parliament by law otherwise provides, the composition of the Legislative Council of a State shall be as provided in cl. (3). The Act of 1950 was enacted by the Parliament to provide for the allocation of seats in, and the delimitation of constituencies for the purposes of elections to, the House of the People and the Legislatures of States, the qualifications of voters at such elections, the preparation of electoral rolls, the manner of filling seats in the Council of States to be filled by representatives of Union territories, and matters connected therewith. Part II-A of Act of 1950 relates to the appointment of the officers for carrying out duties enjoined on them under the Act. Section 13-A provides for appointment of a Chief Electoral Officer for a State, and s. 13-B empowers the State Government to appoint Electoral Registration Officer for each Assembly Constituency as well as Council Constituency, and he is entrusted with the work of preparation and revision of the electoral rolls. Section 27 (Part IV) deals with preparation of electoral rolls for Council Constituencies. Sub-section (1) of s. 27, inter alia, provides that the constituencies referred to in sub-cl. (a) of cl. (3) of art. 171 would be termed as "Local Authorities' Constituency." Clause (a) of sub-s. (2) of s. 27 provides that for the purpose of elections to the Legislative Council of a State in any local authorities' constituency the electorate shall consist of members of such local authorities exercising jurisdiction in any place or area within the limits of that constituency as are specified in relation to that State in the Fourth Schedule. Clause (b) thereof provides that every member of each such local authority within a local authorities' constituency shall be entitled to be registered in the electoral roll for that constituency. The local authorities specified in the Fourth Schedule in relation to the State of Bombay are—

- (1) Municipalities.
- (2) District Local Boards.
- (3) Cantonment Boards.

It is common knowledge that as a result of reorganisation of States brought into effect by the States Reorganisation Act of 1956, eight districts of former Madhya Pradesh, namely Buldana, Akola, Amravati, Yeotmal, Wardha, Nagpur, Bhandara and Chanda, known as Vidarbha area, were integrated with the new State of Bombay formed under cl. (c) of sub-s. (1) of s. 8 of the States Reorganisation Act. The former State of Bombay had a Legislative Council but the former State of Madhya Pradesh had no Legislative Council. The result thereof was that the aforesaid eight districts had no representation in the Bombay Legislative Council, and provisions had to be made to secure representation from this area. Similar situation also arose in respect of certain other newly formed States. Section 34 of the States Reorganisation Act provided for the reconstitution of the Legislative Council for the new State of Bombay. The Parliament enacted the Legislative Councils Act, 1957 (No. 37 of 1957) to provide for the creation of a Legislative Council for the State of Andhra Pradesh and the increasing of the strength of the Legislative Councils of the States having such Councils and for matters connected therewith. Sub-section (1) of s. 5 of this Act provided that the total number of seats in the Legislative Council of Bombay shall be increased to 108 and of these seats the numbers to be filled by persons elected by the electorates referred to in sub-cl. (a) of cl. (3) of art. 171 shall be 36. Sub-section (2) of s. 5 further provided that as from the commencement of this Act the Delimitation of Council Constituencies (Bombay) Order, 1951, shall, until other provision is made by law, have effect subject to the modifications directed by the Second Schedule and in the said Order as so modified, any reference to the State of Bombay shall be construed as a reference to that State as formed by s. 8 of the States Reorganisation Act, 1956. This sub-section read with Second Schedule resulted in the creation of a Local Authorities' Constituency for Vidhardha consisting of the aforesaid 8 districts and the number of representatives that were to be elected by this constituency was 5. Sub-section (5) of s. 5 further provided that as soon as may after such commencement, elections shall be held to fill such of the seats allotted to the several Council constituencies by the Delimitation of Council Constituencies (Bombay) Order, 1951, as modified by this Act and such of the seats to be filled by persons referred to in cl. (b) of sub-s. (1) as are then vacant, as if these seats had then become vacant. Clause (c) of s. 12 of this Act also amended the Fourth Schedule of the Act of 1950 and the changes effected by this Act, so far as it related to the State of Bombay, are contained in sub-cl. (ii) of cl. (c) of s. 12 of the Act, and it provided for addition of certain other authorities to the Schedule already referred to. The combined effect of the Act of 1950 as amended by this Act is that the Fourth Schedule of the Act of 1950 so far as it relates to the State of Bombay reads as follows:—

"Local authorities for purposes of elections to Legislative Councils

Bombay.

- (1) Municipalities.
- (2) District Local Boards.
- (3) Cantonment Boards.
- (4) District Boards.
- (5) District Panchayats.

(6) Town Committees.

(7) Janapada Sabhas (Rural Circle)."

To implement the direction given by sub-s. (5) of s. 5 of the Legislative Councils Act, the Deputy Commissioner of Nagpur came to be appointed as Electoral Registration Officer under s. 13-B of the Act of 1950 for Vidarbha Local Authorities' constituency. The Chief Electoral Officer, Bombay, issued directions to various Electoral Registration Officers, including the Deputy Commissioner, Nagpur, vide his letter dated November 4, 1957, the material part whereof reads as follows:

"So far as the local authorities' constituencies are concerned, Government has proposed you for appointment as the Electoral Registration Officer for the constituency mentioned in column 1 of the attached statement. You are, therefore, requested to prepare the electoral rolls of the local authorities' constituency for which you are being appointed as Electoral Registration Officer. According to the provisions of sub-section (2) of section 27 of the Representation of the People Act, 1950, every member of the constituent local authority within a local authorities' constituency will be entitled to be registered in the electoral roll of that constituency without any reference either to the qualifying date or qualifying period. The electoral roll for the local authorities' constituency will consist of a list of such members. In view of this, the question of publishing these rolls either preliminarily or finally does not arise."

In pursuance of these directions, the Deputy Commissioner, Nagpur, in his capacity as Electoral Registration Officer of the Vidarbha Local Authorities' Constituency prepared the electoral roll, but it does not appear to have been formally published, presumably on account of the directions contained in the aforesaid letter of the Chief Electoral Officer, Bombay. In the Bombay Government Gazette of December 26, 1957, two notifications under the signature of Under Secretary to the Election Commission and purported to be of date December 17, 1957, were published. By one notification, Vidarbha Local Authorities' Constituency was called upon to elect 5 members. The second notification published the various dates appointed by the Election Commission in connection with the election. December 27, 1957, was the last date fixed for making nominations, December 30, 1957, for the scrutiny of the nomination papers, January 2, 1958, as the last date for withdrawal of candidatures, January 24, 1958, for taking a poll, if necessary, and February 8, 1958, was the date for completing the election.

For the election from the Vidarbha Local Authorities' Constituency, appellants and respondents Nos. 1 to 8 filed their nomination papers. On the date of the scrutiny of the nomination papers, an objection was raised to the validity of the nomination paper of respondent No. 2 Ishwar Deshmukh on the ground that his nomination form was subscribed by persons who were not qualified for being voters they being members of the Nagpur Corporation. The objection was overruled. Poll was taken on January 24, 1958, the method of voting being by single transferable vote. After counting, respondents Nos. 1 to 5 were declared duly elected on February 8, 1958. Feeling aggrieved, the appellant made this election petition to the Election Commissioner under s. 81 of the Act of 1951 on various grounds. We are, however, for purposes of this appeal, not concerned with all the grounds raised. The contentions raised by the appellant in the petition and which are material for purposes of this appeal in brief were:

Appellant contended that in preparation of the electoral roll of the Vidarbha Local Authorities' Constituency, the Electoral Registration Officer was in error in including the names of 55 councillors of the Nagpur Corporation, 10 members of the Fatur Notified Area Committee, 13 members of the Tiroda Notified Area Committee, 84 members of the Janapada Sabhas who were elected from the urban circles, 50 members of the Janapada Sabhas who were elected directly as Presidents, Vice Presidents and Chairmen of the Standing Committees of Janapada Sabhas. In short, the contentions raised on behalf of the appellant were that the aforesaid members were not the members of any of the authorities specified in the Fourth Schedule of the Act of 1950, and were, therefore, not qualified to vote and their names were wrongly included in the electoral roll by the Electoral Registration Officer. The electoral roll was not published. The appellant or any other person had no opportunity to object to the wrong inclusion of these names in the electoral roll. No finality, therefore, could be attached to this electoral roll. This error has resulted in 212 unqualified persons casting their votes at the election. The total number voted at the poll was only 2,027. The voting was by single transferable vote. In these circumstances, it was contended on behalf of the appellant that a presumption could be raised that the result of the election had been materially affected. The aforesaid contentions of the appellant failed before the Election Tribunal appointed by the Election Commission. The appellant has, therefore, preferred this appeal.

The first question that arises is whether the names of the Councillors of the Nagpur Corporation, the members of the Notified Area Committees of Fatur and Tiroda and the members of Janapada Sabhas elected by the urban circles, and Presidents, Vice Presidents and Chairman of the Standing Committees were properly included in the electoral roll.

As regards the Councillors of the Nagpur Corporation, it is the contention of Mr. Gokhale, learned counsel for the appellant, that these councillors were not qualified to get their names included in the electoral roll of this constituency. On a true construction of art. 171(3)(a) and s. 27 of the Act of 1950 read with the Fourth Schedule, persons who are qualified to vote are only members of such of the authorities as are specified in the Fourth Schedule. Municipal Corporation of Nagpur or any other City is not an authority specified in the Fourth Schedule. The authorities specified are only municipalities. A "Municipal Corporation" cannot be included in the expression "Municipality". Inclusion of the names of councillors of Corporation of City of Nagpur in the electoral roll was, therefore, bad. On the other hand, the contention on behalf of the respondent is that a municipal corporation is included within the expression "Municipality" appearing in the Fourth Schedule. In support of his contention Mr. Gokhale, learned counsel for the appellant, has further argued that the expression "municipality" must be understood and has to be understood only with reference to the local Acts in force in various States and in no other sense. In support of the argument he has also referred us to the fifth entry in the Second List of the Seventh Schedule of the Constitution, cl. (31) of s. 3 of the Central General Clauses Act, 1897 (No. I of 1897), cl. (2) of s. 2 of the Madhya Pradesh Local Authorities (Electoral Offences) Act, 1952 (No. XI of 1952) and the Notification issued under s. 3 of the C.P. and Berar Local Fund Audit Act, 1933 (Act IX of 1933). We find it difficult to accept this contention of Mr. Gokhale. The expression "municipality" occurs both in art. 171 of the Constitution as well as in the Fourth Schedule of Act of 1950. This expression has not been defined either in the Constitution or in the Act of 1950. In the absence of any definition or any other indication in the Act, it is difficult to assume that the Constituent Assembly or the Parliament was using the expression "municipality" in any narrower sense than what it actually means. The primary meaning of the word "municipality" as given in the Oxford Dictionary is "a town, city or district possessed of privileges of Local Self Government", and it is in this sense, in our opinion, that the expression has been used both in the Act of the Parliament and in the Constitution. It would not be reasonable to assume that the intention of the Legislature was to confer a right to vote only on the members of a body for the municipal administration of a town and deprive the councillors or members of the corporation, which is nothing but a body for the municipal administration of a city, of this right. There appears to be no good reason to infer any such intention. The provisions of the Central enactments referred to by

Mr. Gokhale, also, in our view, are not of any assistance to him. Item 5 of List 2 of the Seventh Schedule of the Constitution reads as follows:

"Local Government, that is to say, the constitution and powers of municipal corporations, improvement trusts, district boards, mining settlement authorities and other local authorities for the purpose of local self-government or village administration."

True, the expression used is 'municipal corporation' but it is to be noted that in this entry the expression 'municipality' or 'municipal committee' is not used. It cannot be assumed that the intention of the Constitution-makers was to empower the State Government to enact in respect of municipal corporation i.e. a body to conduct municipal affairs of a city only and not in respect of the municipal committee or municipality i.e. a body to conduct the municipal affairs of a town. It appears that the expressions 'municipality' and 'municipal corporation' have been interchangeably used in the Constitution, such expression meaning a body for conducting the municipal administration of cities or towns. Similar is the position also when we refer to cl. (31) of s. 3 of the General Clauses Act. It reads:

"'local authority' shall mean a municipal committee, district board, of port commissioners or other authority legally entitled to, or entrusted by the Government with, the control or management of a municipal or local fund."

It is pertinent to note that the expression used is 'municipal committee' and there is no reference to municipal corporation. For reasons already stated above, it is difficult to assume that the intention of the Legislature in enacting the General Clauses Act was to exclude a municipal corporation from the definition of local authority. The other two references to the Provincial Acts undoubtedly make mention both of corporation as well as municipality. It is true that in cl. (2) of s. 2 of the Madhya Pradesh Local Authorities (Electoral Offences) Act, 1952, and in the list of local bodies published under s. 3 of the C.P. and Berar Local Fund Audit Act, 1933, both the expressions 'City of Nagpur Corporation' and 'municipal committee' are used, but it cannot be lost sight of that both these enactments have a specific objective. The former was enacted to provide for electoral offences of or in connection with the election of certain bodies, and the Legislature, therefore, was enumerating these bodies ex abundanti cautela. Similar is the case with the list published under the C.P. and Berar Local Fund Audit Act. It is to be noted that the accounts of every local authority is not subjected to audit under the Act unless the State Government, by notification, declares that the accounts of a particular body would be subject to audit under the Act. That being the position, the State Government had to enumerate in the notification all these bodies whose accounts it desired to be subjected to audit under the Act. Reference to the two aforesaid enactments, therefore, in our view, is hardly of any assistance to the appellant in his contention that the municipal corporation is not included in the expression 'municipality'.

In the result, therefore, in our opinion the expression 'municipality' used in the Constitution as well as in the Fourth Schedule of the Act of 1950 is used in the most widest sense and includes all bodies entrusted with the administration of municipal affairs of a city or a town. The Electoral Registration Officer, therefore, was not in error in including the names of the councillors of the City of Nagpur Corporation in the electoral roll for the Vidarbha Local Authorities' Constituency.

Turning next to the contention of Mr. Gokhale relating to the members of the Notified Area Committees of Tiroda and Fatur, in our opinion, the contention is well founded, as, in our opinion, it is not possible to hold that a notified area committee is a body which carries on the municipal administration of a city or a town. We will first refer to the provisions contained in the C.P. and Berar Municipalities Act, 1922. Sub-section (1) of s. 240 provides that the Provincial Government may, by notification, declare that, with respect to some or all of the matters upon which a municipal fund may be expended under s. 63, improved arrangements are required within a specified local area, which, nevertheless, it is not expedient to constitute as a municipality. Sub-section (2) provides that such area would be called a "Notified Area". Under sub-s. (3) of s. 240, the area which the Provincial Government is authorised to declare as a notified area is one having a population less than 10,000. Sub-clause (d) of cl. (1) of s. 241 provides for the constitution of a committee to conduct the administration of the notified area. It was not possible for us to refer to the provisions of the enactments in force in all other States except the two Acts, namely the Bihar and Orissa Municipal Act of 1922 and the Bombay District Municipal Act of 1922. The provisions of these two enactments to certain extent are the same. We, therefore, consider that the body, that is the notified area committee, thus being a body not discharging the functions of municipal administration of a city or a town, does not fall within the meaning of the term 'municipality'. Mr. Ghate, learned counsel for respondents Nos. 2 and 5, referred us to the provisions of s. 242 of the C.P. and Berar Municipalities Act, and on the strength of these provisions he contends that the Act itself recognises a notified area committee as a municipal committee, and therefore, the expression 'municipal committee' includes a notified area committee. He further contends that s. 240 onwards fall within Chapter XXXI—"Small Towns", and it is his contention that a notified area committee also is a body that conducts the municipal affairs of a town. In our opinion, there is little force in the contention raised by Mr. Ghate. We have already shown that on the language of sub-s. (1) of s. 240 a notified area committee is constituted by the Government when the Government is of opinion that it is not expedient to constitute a municipality. Section 242 also does not provide that a notified area committee when constituted would have the rights and privileges of the municipal committee but the expression used is that for certain purposes mentioned in that section a notified area committee shall be deemed to be a municipal committee. Now the use of the word "deemed" affords answer to the contention of Mr. Ghate. In *Income-Tax Commissioner, Bombay Presidency v. Bombay Trust Corporation*¹ their Lordships of the Privy Council observed (p. 55):

"Now when a person is 'deemed to be' something, the only meaning possible is that whereas he is not in reality that something the Act of Parliament requires him to be treated as if he were."

Thus, on the language of s. 242 itself it is clear that a notified area committee is, in fact, not a municipality but for certain purposes as provided in the section it would be treated as a municipality. This fiction, in our opinion, cannot be carried further so as to include a notified area committee in the expression 'municipality' used in the Fourth Schedule of the Act of 1950.

Apart from this, there is another difficulty in the way of Mr. Ghate. If we turn to the Fourth Schedule, it would be seen that therein a "notified area committee" is specified as one of the authorities whose members are entitled to be enrolled in the electoral roll of the local authorities' constituency so far as they relate to the State of Bihar, State of Madhya Pradesh, State of Punjab and State of Uttar Pradesh but is not included so far as it relates to the State of Bombay, State of Madras, State of Mysore and State of West Bengal. Now, when the Legislature has specifically included a notified area committee in this Schedule so far as it relates to some of the States and has omitted it from other States, it is clear that the omission is intentional. It is also pertinent to note that in those States where a notified area committee is included in this Schedule, the expression 'municipality' is also separately used. This also indicates that the Legislature has treated a notified area committee as a local authority separate and distinct from a municipality. It would also be seen that so far as Vidarbha is concerned, the Act in force in the Vidarbha area, namely the C.P. and Berar Municipalities Act, which provides for the formation of a "Notified Area Committee", is also in force in the areas which formed part of the former State of Madhya Pradesh and which now form part of the new State of Madhya Pradesh. In the list of local authorities relating to the formation of Madhya Pradesh Council, a notified area committee is specifically mentioned but relating to the Bombay State a notified area committee is not included. This omission also indicates that the Legislature did not intend to confer on the members of a notified area committee in the Vidarbha area a right to be enrolled in the electoral roll of the local authorities' constituency for electing members to the Legislative Council. In our opinion, therefore, the Electoral Registration Officer was in error in entering the names of 13 members of the Tiroda Notified Area Committee and 10 members of the Fatur Notified Area Committee in the electoral roll of the Vidarbha local authorities' constituency. Mr. Ghate has also advanced an argument that it is not open to the appellant to challenge the inclusion of the names of the aforesaid 23 members inasmuch as he has failed to call the Chief Electoral Officer to the witness box to explain as to why he had asked the names of the 23 members to be included in the electoral roll. In our opinion, the argument has very little substance. Whatever view the officer may be holding for including the names of the members of the notified area committee in the electoral roll is wholly irrelevant in construing a statute.

Turning to the inclusion of the names of the Janapada Sabhas elected from urban circles and inclusion of the names of the Presidents, Vice Presidents and Chairmen of the Standing Committees of the Janapada Sabhas, it is the contention of Mr. Gokhale that their names had been wrongly included. He referred us to the 7th item in the Fourth Schedule relating to the State of Bombay which reads:

"Janapada Sabhas (Rural Circle),"

and laying emphasis on the words "Rural Circle", he very vehemently contends that the intention of the Legislature is to confer a right only on the members elected from the rural circles and on no other member. He has also taken us through certain provisions of the C.P. and Berar Local Government Act, 1948 (XXXVIII of 1948) under which Janapada Sabhas are constituted. To summarise these provisions, s. 3 empowers the State Government to divide the State into administrative areas to be known as Janapada. It also empowers the State Government to sub-divide a Janapada area into two categories of circles (1) an urban circle and (2) a rural circle. The urban circle consists of the existing municipal and notified areas comprised in a janapada, and the rural circle consists of the areas in a janapada other than municipal, notified and cantonment areas. Sub-section (1) of s. 4 of the Act provides that for each Janapada a Sabha would be constituted. Sub-section (1) of s. 6 provides that such Sabha would consist of the councillors elected by the electoral divisions in the rural circle and such number of councillors, not exceeding one-sixth of the total number of councillors of the Sabha, as may be prescribed. Sub-section (5) of s. 3 empowers the State Government to sub-divide the rural circle into electoral divisions. On the other hand, the urban circle in the janapada area constitutes only one electoral division. Sub-section (1) of s. 13 provides that after a Sabha has been constituted, it shall at its first meeting elect from its own body, or from other persons residing in the janapada area and qualified to be a councillor, a chairman and a deputy chairman of the Sabha, and sub-s. (2) of s. 13 provides that the chairman and the deputy chairman so elected shall be deemed to be councillors under the Act. Sub-section (1) of s. 23 provides that every Sabha shall appoint certain standing committees mentioned therein, and sub-s. (3) of s. 23 provides that every standing committee shall have a chairman elected either from the councillors or from other persons residing in the Janapada area and qualified to be a councillor, and a chairman when so elected would be deemed to be a councillor of the Janapada Sabha. The aforesaid provisions undoubtedly indicate that the Janapada is divided into two circles, rural circle and urban circle. The urban circle consists of the existing municipal and notified areas comprised in the Janapada. It is also clear that a chairman or a deputy chairman of the Janapada Sabha or a chairman of the standing committee need not necessarily be a person resident in the rural circle, and it is on the strength of these provisions and mention of the words 'rural circle' in the entry in Fourth Schedule that the contention of Mr. Gokhale is founded. We find it difficult to accept this contention of Mr. Gokhale. In the first instance, if the contention is accepted, it would mean that the right to vote or in other words right to get the name entered in the electoral roll of the local authorities' constituency is conferred not on all the members of the Janapada Sabha but only on some of them, namely those elected to the Janapada Sabha from the rural circles. Had the Legislature so intended, it would have used the expression "members elected to the Janapada Sabha from rural circles". The expression used in the aforesaid 7th item is not that. To accept Mr. Gokhale's contention it would be necessary to read certain words in that item. A Court would refrain from adopting this course unless it is so compelled. We also find another difficulty in the way of Mr. Gokhale. In our opinion, the rule of construction requires us to read this entry in conjunction with the main provision contained in the section under which the schedule is framed, and it would not be proper to read that entry completely divorced from the provisions of the said section. The relevant provision is cl. (a) of sub-s. (2) of s. 27 of the Act of 1950. It reads:

"For the purpose of elections to the Legislative Council of a State in any local authorities' constituency—

(a) the electorate shall consist of members of such local authorities exercising jurisdiction in any place or area within the limits of that constituency as are specified in relation to that State in the Fourth Schedule;"

On the language of this clause, it is clear that in framing the Schedule, the intention of the Legislature was only to specify a local authority and was not to confer the right only on certain members of that local authority. Had that been the intention, in our view, cl. (a) of sub-s. (2) of s. 27 would have read—

"For the purpose of elections to the Legislative Council of a State in any local authorities' constituency—

(a) the electorate shall consist of such members of such local authorities exercising jurisdiction in any place or area within the limits of that constituency as are specified in relation to that State in the Fourth Schedule."

To accept Mr. Gokhale's contention would mean to add the word 'such' in sub-cl. (a) before the word 'members'. As already stated, a Court in interpreting a statute would refrain from adding anything to the statute unless the context clearly so indicates. Further, the Legislature has not left the matter in any doubt. After enacting sub-cl. (a) and the Schedule, it has further enacted sub-cl. (b) to sub-s. (2) of s. 27 of the Act and it reads:

"every member of each such local authority within a local authorities' constituency shall be entitled to be registered in the electoral roll for that constituency;"

Assuming that there is any ambiguity in the language of the aforesaid 7th item of the Fourth Schedule, no doubt is left in our mind on account of the provisions of cl. (b) of sub-s. (2) of s. 27 that the intention of the Legislature was to confer on all the members of the local authorities specified in the Fourth Schedule a right to get their names entered in the electoral roll of the local authorities' constituency. Mr. Gokhale in support of his contention also argued that the C.P. and Berar Local Government Act, 1948, is in force in the areas of the present Madhya Pradesh which formerly formed part of the old Madhya Pradesh. The expression used in the second item of the Fourth Schedule relating to the Madhya Pradesh is 'Janapada Sabha'. The expression used in the 7th item of the Bombay list is 'Janapada Sabhas (Rural Circle)'. Mr. Gokhale contends that the use of these different expressions in the aforesaid two items clearly indicates that the intention of the Legislature was to confer a right to vote on all members so far as Madhya Pradesh was concerned, but so far as the State of Bombay is concerned the intention was to confer the right only on members elected from rural circles. If these two entries are read only by themselves this argument no doubt is plausible, but in view of the clear indication of the intention of the Legislature contained in cls. (a) and (b) of sub-s. (2) of s. 27 of the Act of 1950, cannot be accepted. In our judgment, therefore, the Electoral Registration Officer was not in error in including the names of all the members of the Janapada Sabhas in the electoral roll of the local authorities' constituency for Vidarbha.

The result is that the appellant has been able to establish his contention only in respect of 23 members of the Notified Area Committees of Tiroda and Patur.

The question that next arises is whether on account of this error on the part of the Electoral Registration Officer, the appellant is entitled to claim the relief claimed by him, namely setting aside the election. On our findings, it is not necessary to consider the contention of Mr. Gokhale, relating to the validity of the nomination paper of respondent No. 2. It is not in dispute that it was subscribed by councillors of the Nagpur Corporation whose names had been included in the electoral roll of the constituency. As already stated, inclusion of the names of the councillors was valid. That being the position, acceptance of the nomination paper of respondent No. 2 is not open to challenge. Mr. Gokhale next contends that the aforesaid error on the part of the Electoral Registration Officer in including the names of 23 members of the Notified Area Committees would attract the provisions of sub-cl. (iii) and (iv) of cl. (d) of sub-s. (1) of s. 100 of the Act of 1951. Sub-clause (iii) reads:

"(d) that the result of the election, in so far as it concerns a returned candidate, has been materially affected—...

(iii) by the improper reception, refusal or rejection of any vote or the reception of any vote which is void..."

This sub-clause contemplates two contingencies—(1) improper reception, refusal or rejection of any vote, and (2) reception of any vote which is void. The question of reception, refusal or rejection of a vote arises only at two stages, the first when the voter goes to the polling station to vote, and the second when the votes cast are counted. This clause obviously relates to something that happens at those two stages. The contention of Mr. Gokhale is not that either the Polling Officer or the Returning Officer was in error on account of his failure to comply with the duties which were cast on him, but his contention, as already stated, is that the Electoral Registration Officer was in error in including the names. Now, once the name is included in the electoral roll, the provisions of s. 62 come into play. Sub-section (1) of s. 62 provides that no person who is not, and except as expressly provided by this Act, every person who is, for the time being entered in the electoral roll of any constituency shall be entitled to vote in that constituency. Mr. Gokhale has not been able to show to us that the Act makes any express provision which would have entitled the appellant to raise an objection either before the Polling Officer or before the Returning Officer that the votes cast by the members of the Notified Area Committees should not be accepted even though their names had been entered in the roll. In our opinion, therefore, we do not think that there has been any improper reception of any vote within the meaning of the first part of the aforesaid sub-cl. (iii) even assuming that all the 23 members of the Notified Area Committees had voted at the election. It is next to be considered whether the votes cast by these 23 persons could be termed as votes which were void. In view of the language of sub-s. (1) of s. 62 of the Act of 1951, it is not possible for us to hold that these votes were void votes. On the language of the said sub-section, an error in including the name would not by itself render a vote as a void vote. The position becomes clear when we turn to sub-ss. (2), (3) (4) and (5) of s. 62, and when we turn to these sub-sections it is clear that even when the name of a person has been entered in an electoral roll; he is debarred from voting or the vote cast by him is rendered void on account of certain circumstances mentioned in sub-ss. (2) to (5). Such votes alone, in our opinion, could be deemed to be void votes within the meaning of sub-cl. (iii) of cl. (d) of sub-s. (1) of s. 100.

It is next to be seen whether the aforesaid error would fall within sub-cl. (iv) of cl. (d) of sub-s. (1) of s. 100. It reads:

"That the result of the election, in so far as it concerns the returned candidates, has been materially affected by any non-compliance with the provisions of the Constitution or of this Act or of any rules or orders made under this Act, the Tribunal shall declare the election of the returned candidate to be void."

It has been held by the Supreme Court that the expression 'non-compliance' is wide enough to include any infraction of the Constitution or the Act or the rules or orders. In *Durga Shankar Mehta v. Thakur Raghuraj Singh*² their Lordships observed (p. 279):

"There is no material difference between 'non-compliance' and 'non-observance' or 'breach' and this item in clause (c) of sub-section (2) may be taken as a residuary provision contemplating cases where there has been infraction of the provisions of the Constitution or of the Act but which have not been specifically enumerated in the other portions of the clause."

As already observed, the appellant has no doubt established that in the inclusion of the 23 names of the members of the Notified Area Committees in the electoral roll. This no doubt is an infraction of cl. (a) of sub-s. (2) of s. 27 read with the Fourth Schedule of the Act of 1950. It is to be seen whether the said infraction would fall within the aforesaid sub-cl. (iv). It is the contention of Mr. Mandlekar, learned counsel for respondent No. 3, that the non-compliance contemplated in sub-cl. (iv) is the non-compliance of the provisions of the Constitution, or of the provisions of the Act of 1951 or of the rules or orders made under the Act of 1951. Non-compliance of the provisions of the Act of 1950 does not fall within the scope and ambit of sub-cl. (iv). This contention, in our opinion, has substance. The relevant provisions of s. 100 contained cl. (c) of sub-s. (2) of s. 100, prior to their amendment, were:

"(2) Subject to the provisions of sub-section (3), if the Tribunal is of opinion—...

(c) that the result of the election has been materially affected...by any non-compliance with the provisions of the Constitution or of this Act or of any rules or orders made under this Act or of any other Act or rules relating to the election, or by any mistake in the use of any prescribed form, the Tribunal shall declare the election of the returned candidate to be void."

The present provisions contained in the aforesaid sub-cl. (iv) and the provisions, as they were prior to the amendment of s. 100, when read together, it is clear that the former provision was wider in terms and the election was open to challenge on account of non-compliance of the provisions of all the Acts relating to election. The Legislature has amended this section and in the new provision has deleted the part so far as it related to the challenge to other enactments and has confined a right only to the infraction of the provisions of the Constitution, the Act of 1951 and the rules and orders framed under that Act. That being the position, it would be reasonable to assume that the intention of the Legislature was to debar a challenge to an election on account of the non-compliance with the provisions of the Act of 1950 which inter alia provides for preparation of electoral rolls. It is, however, the contention of Mr. Gokhale that in this case the electoral roll was not even published; his client had no opportunity to challenge the inclusion of the names of the aforesaid 23 members in the electoral roll; no finality to the electoral roll, therefore, could be attached. He further contends that that being the position, the election itself was void. He also referred us to the following decisions reported in *Kanglu v. Chief Executive Officer, Janapada Sabha, Durg*³, Vithaldas v.

*Sadanand*⁴ and *Vinayak v. Gopal*⁵ in support of his contention that no finality could be attached to the electoral roll when there had been no opportunity to get the electoral roll corrected. There is a good deal of force in this contention. In *Chief Commr. Ajmer v. Radhey Shyam*⁶, their Lordships of the Supreme Court observed (p. 308):

"It is of the essence of these elections that proper electoral rolls should be maintained and in order that a proper electoral roll should be maintained it is necessary that after the preparation of the electoral roll opportunity should be given to the parties concerned to scrutinize whether the persons enrolled as electors possessed the requisite qualifications. Opportunity should also be given for the revision of the electoral roll and for the adjudication of claims to be enrolled therein and entertaining objections to such enrolment. Unless this is done, the entire obligation cast upon the authorities holding the elections is not discharged and the elections held on such imperfect electoral rolls would acquire no validity and would be liable to be challenged at the instance of the parties concerned."

It must be conceded that this salutary rule laid down by their Lordships of the Supreme Court has not been observed. The Chief Electoral Officer had issued instructions to the Electoral Registration Officer only on November 4, 1957, for preparation of the electoral roll. It was also observed therein that the question of publishing the electoral roll either preliminarily or finally does not arise. The constituency was called upon to elect members by a notification appearing in the gazette of December 26, 1957. There is no material on record to show that in between these dates the electoral roll was, in fact, published or that any publicity was given to the publication of the electoral roll. By another notification, which appeared in the gazette of December 26, 1957, the date of nomination as fixed was December 27, 1957. The interval was only of a day. In these circumstances, it does appear that the appellant had no opportunity to get the electoral roll corrected. On behalf of the respondents, we were referred to the provisions of cls. (c) and (d) of sub-s. (1) of s. 27 of the Act of 1950 and the provisions of ss. 15, 16, 18, 22 and 23 as they stood prior to the amendment in the year 1958, and it has been argued on their behalf that it was not obligatory on the part of the Electoral Registration Officer to publish the electoral roll and it is also contended that it was not open to anybody under the provisions, as they then stood, to complain of erroneous inclusion of the name of any person in the electoral roll. The contention is well-founded. It appears there had remained a lacuna in the Act which had resulted in a denial of a very valuable right of objecting to the inclusion of a name in the electoral rolls on the ground of lack of requisite qualifications. This lacuna has, however, now been removed by amendment of s. 22 by Act No. 58 of 1958. We are here concerned whether this lack of opportunity to challenge the wrongful inclusion of the names of the 23 aforesaid members can afford a ground for setting aside the election and whether it would be within our competence to grant that relief in exercising appellate power under the Act of 1951. As already shown, on the construction put by us on sub-cl. (w) of cl. (d) of sub-s. (1) of s. 100, it cannot afford a ground to the appellant to get the election set aside. It, therefore, would not be within our competence in exercise of our appellate jurisdiction to set aside the election on this ground. The other decisions to which reference was made are also, in our opinion, not of any assistance to the appellant as they relate to the construction of the provisions of different statutes, and each case, therefore, turns on the provisions of the statute to which it relates. We have not been shown a case relating to the Act of 1951, as it now stands, where it is held that the lack of opportunity to get the election roll corrected would afford a ground for setting aside the election. On the other hand, the provisions of sub-s. (1) of s. 62 indicate that the Legislature intended to attach finality to the electoral roll subject to certain conditions mentioned in sub-ss. (2) to (5) of the Act.

Even assuming for a moment that the non-compliance with any of the provisions of the Act of 1950 would fall within the ambit and scope of the said sub-cl. (iv), there is another hurdle in the way of the appellant. It is to be noticed that it is not sufficient to establish that there had been non-compliance with any of the provisions. It has further to be established that the result of the election, in so far as it concerns the returned candidates, has been materially affected on account of that non-compliance. The burden to establish it lies on the appellant, and howsoever it may be difficult to discharge that burden, it is incumbent on him to discharge it. In Vashist Narain v. Dev Chandra,⁷ it has been observed by their Lordships (p. 515):

"This section indicates that an election is not to be declared invalid if it appears to the Tribunal that non-compliance with statutory rules or any mistake in the use of such forms did not affect the result of the election. This throws the onus on the person who seeks to uphold the election. The language of Section 100(1)(c), however, clearly places a burden upon the objector to substantiate the objection that the result of the election has been materially affected."

After considering the case law on the question, their Lordships further observed (p. 516):

"...That is a matter which has to be proved and the onus of proving it lies upon the petitioner. It will not do merely to say that all or a majority of the wasted votes might have gone to the next highest candidate."

It is to be seen whether the appellant has discharged this burden. The burden undoubtedly could have been discharged if a presumption that the result of the election has been materially affected could have been raised on the facts and circumstances. If the appellant had been able to establish his case in full and had been able to show that the names of as many as 212 members had been wrongly entered in the electoral roll, then it would have been possible to presume that the result of the election had been materially affected, but the position that is obtained on our findings is that the names of only 23 members had been wrongly entered in the electoral roll. It is not in dispute that the valid votes cast were 2001. In these circumstances, in the absence of any further evidence, it is not possible for us to hold that the result of the election has been materially affected.

Mr. Gokhale, however, contends that it was not necessary for the appellant to lead any evidence; he had made an application to the Tribunal to get the documents pertaining to the election brought before it; these documents were brought in the Court and amongst these documents is a marked voters' list, i.e. a voters' list on which remarks were made as and when it was found necessary. Referring us to r. 19 read with r. 27(3) of the rules framed under the Act, Mr. Gokhale argues that by referring to these documents, it is possible for the Court to ascertain as to whether the result of the election has been materially affected or not and the case should be remanded to the Court for that purpose. We find it difficult to accept this contention. No witness has deposed that even one out of these 23 voters has voted at the election. In our opinion, in these circumstances, it is not now open to the appellant to ask for a rambling enquiry involving scrutiny of documents requiring a special skill and take a chance on its result. We do not, therefore, consider it necessary to remand the case for this purpose. Appellant having failed to establish that the inclusion of the names of 23 members in the voters' list has materially affected the result of the election, the appeal must fail.

In the result, therefore, the appeal fails and is dismissed. The appellant shall pay 2/3 costs of the respondents throughout.

Appeal dismissed.

Presidency Small Cause Courts Act (XV of 1882), Secs. 41, 46, 47—Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act (Bom. LVII of 1947), Sec. 28—Defendant sub-letting premises to plaintiff before coming into force of Bombay Rent Act—Defendant in 1954 filing ejectment application against plaintiff under s. 41 of Act XV of 1882 and obtaining order in his favour—Suit by plaintiff against defendant filed in Bombay City Civil Court under s. 47 of Act XV of 1882 for declaration that defendant's ejectment application act of trespass—Plaintiff in plaint claiming protection under Bom. Act LVII of 1947—Jurisdiction of Bombay City Civil Court to entertain suit—Whether suit within ambit of s. 28 of Bom. Act LVII of 1947.

The defendant sub-let certain premises to the plaintiff in April 1945 on a monthly rent, and the plaintiff continued to be in exclusive possession and occupation of the premises and paid the rent to the defendant. In 1954 the defendant filed an ejectment application against the plaintiff in the Court of Small Causes, Bombay, under s. 41 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, 1882, to recover possession of the premises on the basis that they were given to the plaintiff under leave and licence and that the licence was revoked. The plaintiff contended that he was the lawful sub-tenant of the defendant. The Court, however, passed an order in favour of the defendant. The plaintiff then filed a suit in the Bombay City Civil Court under s. 47 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act for a declaration that the defendant's ejectment application was an act of trespass and that the defendant was not entitled to recover possession of the premises. In his plaint the plaintiff after describing himself as a lawful sub-tenant of the defendant stated that he was entitled to the protection of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947. The defendant later ad id contended that the plaintiff was not his sub-tenant but was in occupation of the premises as his licensee and that the suit as framed by the plaintiff could not be entertained by the Bombay City Civil Court—

Held, that as the order of possession obtained by the defendant was under the summary procedure provided under Chapter VII of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, the plaintiff was entitled to challenge that order by filing a suit as contemplated by ss. 46 and 47 of the Act, that merely because of the statement in the plaint that the plaintiff was entitled to the protection under the Bombay Rent Act, the suit did not fall within the ambit of s. 28 of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, and that, therefore, the Bombay City Civil Court had jurisdiction to entertain the suit.

GOKHALE J. This is an appeal by the original defendant against a decree passed in respondent's favour by the Bombay City Civil Court in Suit No. 1106 of 1956. The suit came to be filed in the following circumstances:

The premises in the suit consist of a room on the first floor of Bandukwalla Bungalow situated at first Hasnabad Lane, Santa Cruz. The present appellant was the tenant of the suit room as well as a room on the ground floor of the same building. According to the plaintiff in April 1945 the room in suit was sublet to him by the defendant on a monthly rent of Rs. 15 and a further amount of Rs. 3 was payable for electric charges, and it is the plaintiff's case that he was in exclusive possession and occupation of the said room and used to pay to the defendant the amount of Rs. 18 per month inclusive of rent and electric charges upto October 1950, but the defendant did not pass any receipts in his favour in respect of this payment of rent. In October 1950 the defendant threatened to evict the plaintiff and to throw out his belongings from the room and the plaintiff had to address a letter to the defendant through his advocate on November 20, 1950, recording as to how he got possession of the room, and he also sent a sum of Rs. 18 by postal money order in respect of rent and electric charges for October 1950. The defendant was also called upon to send all rent receipts which had not been issued in favour of the plaintiff, but the defendant gave a reply on November 25, 1950, through his advocate, denying that the plaintiff was a tenant but alleged that he was permitted to stay in the room under leave and licence of the defendant. The defendant also denied that he had received any rent from the plaintiff. According to the plaintiff in October 1950 he came to know that the defendant was paying rent of Rs. 15 only per month in respect of both the rooms, namely, the room in suit as well as the room on the ground floor and, therefore, the plaintiff approached him through one Kadarbhai for reduction of rent but the defendant insisted on his paying Rs. 18 per month as the plaintiff had been doing upto that time. In 1954 the defendant filed an application being ejectment Application No. 2102 of 1954 in the Court of Small Causes under s. 41 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act against the plaintiff for recovery of possession of the suit room on the basis that it was given to the plaintiff under leave and licence and that the licence had been revoked. This allegation was denied by the plaintiff who contended that he was the lawful sub-tenant of the defendant. However, the Small Causes Court passed an order on February 17, 1956, in favour of the defendant under which the plaintiff was required to vacate the premises by June 30, 1956. It is the case of the plaintiff that he was at all times the lawful sub-tenant of the defendant in respect of the suit room and was in exclusive possession and occupation thereof and was entitled to protection under the Bombay Rent Act. The plaintiff, being aggrieved by the order of ejectment obtained by the defendant in the Small Causes Court under s. 41 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, filed the present suit for a declaration that the said ejectment application was an act of trespass and that the defendant was not entitled to recover possession of the premises from the plaintiff. Without prejudice to these contentions, the plaintiff also stated that there being no notice of revocation of the leave and licence alleged by the defendant and the same not having been proved before the Small Causes Court, the defendant was not entitled to obtain the order of ejectment. On this basis the plaintiff filed the present suit under s. 47 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act which will hereafter be referred to as 'the Act' in this judgment. The suit was filed on April 26, 1956, and the plaintiff prayed inter alia for a declaration that the ejectment application No. 2102 of 1954 filed by the defendant against the plaintiff and the aforesaid order dated February 17, 1956, amounted to acts of trespass and the defendant was not entitled to recover possession of the premises in suit. He also claimed a sum of Rs. 100 by way of damages or compensation in respect of the said trespass.

This suit was resisted by the defendant on several grounds. He denied that the plaintiff was the sub-tenant of the room on the first floor of Bandukwalla Bungalow. According to him the suit premises were occupied by his son and daughter-in-law prior to 1945. The defendant's son is married to the daughter of one Kadarbhai Valliji, who was at one time employed with one Abdul Hussein Arsiwalla. The plaintiff is the son of the sister of Arsiwalla according to the defendant. In April 1945 the plaintiff approached Kadarbhai and stated that the sister of the plaintiff was coming down to Bombay and he had no accommodation in Bombay and requested Kadarbhai to arrange for some accommodation and Kadarbhai requested his son-in-law and the defendant to provide accommodation for a temporary period, and it was under these circumstances that the defendant permitted the plaintiff and his sister to reside in the room as his licencees. The defendant stated that at no time he recovered or received any amount from the plaintiff either as rent or compensation. He denied that the room was sub-let to the plaintiff; that he had agreed to receive Rs. 15 as rent and a further sum of Rs. 3 in respect of electric charges. The defendant also denied that the plaintiff was in possession of the suit premises as a sub-tenant or that the plaintiff paid to him rent at the rate of Rs. 15 per month or at any other rate or electric charges at the rate of Rs. 3 per month, from April 1945 to October 1950. The defendant further denied that the plaintiff was in exclusive possession of the suit premises but stated that when the plaintiff was allowed to occupy the room, several articles and things belonging to the defendant were left lying in the room and continued to be there even after the plaintiff began to occupy the room as a licensee. According to the defendant he never threatened the plaintiff that he would evict him or throw out his belongings in or about October 1950 as alleged by the plaintiff, but he stated that he had requested the plaintiff to remove himself and his belongings from the suit premises at about that time, as the plaintiff had been allowed to occupy the room for a temporary period but instead of complying with that request the plaintiff addressed the defendant an advocate's letter dated November 20, 1950, wherein he made a vain attempt to claim sub-tenancy in respect of the said premises. According to the defendant the total rent of the suit room as well as another room on the ground floor of which he was the tenant was Rs. 17 per month. He denied the plaintiff's allegation that at any time Kadarbhai had approached him to reduce the rent payable by the plaintiff. The defendant also denied that the plaintiff was his sub-tenant or that he was at any time in exclusive possession of the suit premises or that he was entitled to the protection of the Bombay Rent Act. He further stated that he was entitled to the possession of the room as he had revoked the licence of the defendant and denied that his act in filing the ejectment application was an act of trespass as alleged by the plaintiff. The defendant also contended that the suit as framed by the plaintiff could not be entertained by the Bombay City Civil Court.

On these pleadings several issues were framed and the trial Court held that the Bombay City Civil Court had jurisdiction to entertain the suit and the plaintiff was a sub-tenant of the defendant. The learned trial Judge also came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was at all material times in exclusive possession and occupation of the suit premises, and that he had paid to the defendant rent at the rate of Rs. 15 per month and Rs. 8 per month in respect of electric charges upto the month of October 1950. In accordance with these findings, he held that the defendant committed an act of trespass by filing the ejectment application No. 2102 of 1954 in the Court of the Small Causes at Bombay and the plaintiff was accordingly entitled to Re. 1 as nominal damages. The trial Court did not find it necessary to decide the question whether the plaintiff was entitled to the protection of the Bombay Rent Act and also took the view that it was not necessary to grant the injunction claimed by the plaintiff. A decree was passed in favour of the plaintiff in accordance with these findings. That is why the original defendant has come in appeal against that decree.

Mr. D. S. Parikh, the learned advocate appearing on behalf of the defendant-appellant, in the first instance contended that the learned trial Judge's view that the Bombay City Civil Court had jurisdiction to entertain the suit was erroneous. According to Mr. Parikh the plaintiff claimed to be a sub-tenant and he also claimed protection under the Bombay Rent Act. Though the defendant disputed the claim of the plaintiff to be his sub-tenant, Mr. Parikh contends that that would not change the essential nature of the suit, which, according to him, would fall within the provisions of s. 28 of the Bombay Rent Act. Mr. Parikh further contends that alternatively the plaintiff has also based his suit on the allegation that the leave or licence granted to him was not proved to have been validly revoked and that, says Mr. Parikh, is a claim which cannot be entertained in a suit filed in the City Civil Court because in granting the ejectment order the Bombay Small Causes Court had held that the plaintiff was not a sub-tenant but was a licensee of the defendant and that the licence had been revoked. That in short is the argument of Mr. Parikh on the question of jurisdiction.

Now, in order to examine this argument it is necessary to understand the real nature of the plaintiff's suit. According to the plaintiff in April 1945 the defendant sub-let the suit room to the plaintiff on certain terms and plaintiff occupied the premises as defendant's sub-tenant. Plaintiff, therefore, claimed to be a sub-tenant of the defendant long before the Bombay Rent Act came into force. It is obvious, therefore, that the plaintiff is claiming a title to sub-tenancy under the defendant not by virtue of the provisions of the Bombay Rent Act, but by virtue of an agreement between him and the defendant who was himself a tenant and which agreement, as it was entered into prior to the Bombay Rent Act, would not be rendered invalid by the provisions of that Act. This claim of the plaintiff is denied by the defendant according to whom the plaintiff was merely a licensee. Now the question whether the plaintiff became a sub-tenant in April 1945 or whether he was allowed to occupy the suit room as a licensee is not a question which arises out of the provisions of the Bombay Rent Act. Secondly, it is clear from the facts of this case that the plaintiff filed this suit under the provisions of ss. 46 and 47 of 'the Act'. It is necessary for the purpose of the arguments addressed to us in this appeal to examine the relevant provisions of Chapter VII of 'the Act'. Under s. 41 of 'the Act' when any person has had possession of any immoveable property situate within the local limits of the Small Cause Court's jurisdiction and of which the annual value at a rackrent does not exceed three thousand rupees, as the tenant, or by permission of another person, or of some person through whom such other person claims, and such tenancy or permission has been determined or been withdrawn, and such tenant or occupier or any person holding under or by assignment from him refuses to deliver such property in compliance with a request made to him in this behalf, an application may be made to the Small Causes Court for a summons against the occupant, calling upon him to show cause why he should not be compelled to deliver the property. Under s. 43 if the occupant does not appear at the time appointed and show cause to the contrary, the applicant shall be entitled to an order for possession of the property from the occupant if the Small Causes Court is satisfied that he was entitled to apply under s. 41. The explanation to this section says that if the occupant proves that the tenancy was created or permission granted by virtue of a title which determined previous to the date of the application, he shall be deemed to have shown cause within the meaning of this section. Section 45 provides that when the applicant, at the time of applying for any such order as aforesaid, was entitled to the possession of such property, neither he nor any person acting in his behalf shall be deemed, on account of any error, defect or irregularity in the mode of proceeding to obtain possession thereunder, to be a trespasser; but any person aggrieved may bring a suit for the recovery of compensation for any damage which he has sustained by reason of such error, defect or irregularity. Then comes s. 46 which provides that nothing contained in the foregoing provisions shall be deemed to protect any applicant obtaining possession of any property under Chapter VII from a suit by any person deeming himself aggrieved thereby, when such applicant was not at the time of applying for such order as aforesaid entitled to the possession of such property, and para. 2 of s. 46 provides that when the applicant was not at the time of applying for any such order as aforesaid, entitled to the possession of such property, the application for such order, though no possession is taken thereunder, shall be deemed to be an act of trespass committed by the applicant against the occupant. The first paragraph of s. 47 deals with the power of the Small Causes Court to stay proceedings under s. 41 on the occupant giving sureties, to bring a suit against the applicant. The second paragraph of s. 47 states that if the occupant obtains a decree in any such suit against the applicant, such decree shall supersede the order (if any) made under s. 43. Under s. 49 recovery of the possession of any immoveable property under Chapter VII shall be no bar to the institution of a suit in the Bombay City Civil Court for trying the title thereto.

It would be clear from these provisions that when an application for possession is filed under s. 41 the applicant is entitled to an order for possession under the summary procedure contemplated by these provisions. But the party aggrieved can still challenge the order by filing certain kinds of suits. Under s. 45 if there is any error, defect or irregularity in the mode of proceedings to obtain possession, that itself will not constitute a trespass though any person aggrieved by the order may bring a suit for recovery of compensation for damage sustained by him on account of any error, defect or irregularity. Under ss. 46 and 47 the party aggrieved may also file a suit for a declaration that the applicant was not at the time of applying for an order under ss. 41 and 43 entitled to the possession of such property, and the application for such an order constituted an act of trespass. If the applicant obtains a decree in such a suit, such decree is to supersede the order made under s. 43. Section 49, however, contemplates a suit instituted for trying the title which is claimed by the occupant and which suit is not barred even if recovery of possession of property is obtained by the occupant. The present suit filed by the plaintiff is obviously a suit under ss. 46 and 47 of 'the Act'. It is true no doubt that in para. 7 of the plaint the plaintiff, after describing himself as a lawful sub-tenant of the defendant, has stated that he was entitled to the protection under the Bombay Rent Act, but that, by itself, in our opinion, would not convert the suit into a suit contemplated under s. 28 of the Bombay Rent Act. Looking to the prayers of the plaintiff in the plaint, there can be no doubt that in substance the plaintiff has filed the suit under ss. 46 and 47 of 'the Act' for a declaration that when the defendant filed the ejectment application against him he was not entitled to do so and the order passed in his favour amounted to a trespass.

In support of his argument that the Bombay City Civil Court could have no jurisdiction to entertain the present suit, Mr. Parikh relied upon certain decisions of this Court. In *Govindram Salamatrai v. Dharampal*¹ it was held by this Court that s. 28 of the Bombay Rent Act did not deprive the High Court of its jurisdiction in all suits for possession wherever the defendant took up the contention that he was a tenant. It was held that the High Court was deprived of the jurisdiction in such suits where the landlord filed a suit against his tenant and the tenant sought the protection of the Rent Act and the High Court's jurisdiction was also deprived in those cases where, although the landlord might have filed a suit against a person alleging that he was a licensee or a trespasser, it might ultimately turn out that the defendant was not a licensee or a trespasser, but a tenant and he was entitled to the protection of the Act. It was further observed that whether a person was entitled to the protection of the Rent Act, whether a person was entitled to the benefit of any of the provisions of that Act, all these were questions which only the Small Causes Court could decide and determine, but whether a person was a tenant or a licensee or a trespasser were not questions which s. 28 had left to the determination of the special Court set up under the Act.

Now, it is the contention of Mr. Parikh in the first instance that in this case also in the plaint it is stated that the plaintiff is entitled to the protection of the Rent Act. As we have already stated, that by itself would not change the nature of the suit which is essentially one filed under ss. 46 and 47 of 'the Act.' It is also contended that the authority of the decision in Govindram Salamatrai v. Dharampal has been affected to some extent by a recent decision of the Supreme Court in Babulal Bhuramal v. Nandram Shivram.² Now, this argument has been considered recently in *Jaswantilal v. "Western Comp., India"*³ and we have taken the view that the authority of Govindram Salamatrai v. Dharampal has not been affected by the Supreme Court decision, but before we deal with Mr. Parikh's argument on the basis of the Supreme Court decision, it is necessary to refer to other cases to which also a reference was made before us.

In Madhavprasad Kalkaprasad v. Indirabai,⁴ the question arose whether in a suit filed by the plaintiff in the High Court for a declaration of his title that he was a sub-tenant of the defendant and possession was asked for by him merely as an ancillary relief, in view of s. 28 of the Bombay Rent Act, the High Court had jurisdiction to try the suit, and it was held by this Court that s. 28 of the Act only permitted the special Courts to try a question of title incidentally, but when the question of title arises substantially in the suit, the ordinary Courts are competent to try and dispose of the suits on title and, that, therefore, even though incidentally the plaintiff prayed for possession, that fact did not oust the jurisdiction of the High Court to try the suit for title. This case obviously does not support the contention of the defendant.

Then reference was made to the case of Harswarup Khannamal v. Nandram.⁵ It may be observed that the Supreme Court decision in Babulal Bhuramal v. Dharampal was given in the appeal against the decision of this Court in Harswarup Khannamal v. Nandram. Now, in this latter case, this Court affirmed its earlier view that in trying suits under s. 28 of the Rent Act, it might become necessary to a special Court incidentally to determine questions of title, but that such determination was not binding upon the party against whom the decision was given, and notwithstanding such decision a party could assert his title in a competent Court. But where the decision of the special Court was direct, where the decision was on the very question which had been left to the special Court to decide, such a question could not be re-agitated under s. 29A of the Bombay Rent Act. It was further observed that, the title contemplated by s. 29A was a title in a party de hors that Act and a title not arising out of any of the provisions of the Rent Act. If, on the other hand, the title which was sought to be established arose by reason of the provisions of the Rent Act, then it was a question arising out of that Act and that question could only be determined by the special Court set up under that Act.

Now in the decision of the Supreme Court in Babulal Bhuramal v. Nandram the view taken by this Court regarding s. 29A has been affirmed and it has been held that by enacting s. 29A the Legislature clearly intended that no finality should be attached to the decision of a Court trying a suit under s. 28 on a question of title de hors the Act. But Mr. Parikh contends that the observations of the Supreme Court regarding the ambit and scope of s. 28 of the Bombay Rent Act would go to show that a suit as the present one would be entertainable by the Bombay Small Causes Court only and not by the Bombay City Civil Court. We are not persuaded to uphold this argument. That case arose out of a suit filed in the City Civil Court by three plaintiffs, plaintiff No. 1 being the tenant of the premises under defendant No. 1, plaintiffs Nos. 2 and 3 being persons to whom the said premises were sub-let by plaintiff No. 1. The landlord defendant No. 1 had given a notice to quit to plaintiff No. 1 in 1947 and thereafter the landlord filed a suit in the Court of Small Causes, Bombay, in 1948 whereby he sought to evict plaintiff No. 1. To that suit plaintiffs Nos. 2 and 3 were also made parties on the allegation that they were trespassers and had no right to be on the premises. The Small Causes Court held that plaintiffs Nos. 2 and 3 were not lawful sub-tenants and the subletting by plaintiff No. 1 to them being contrary to law, the latter had deprived himself of the protection of the Rent Act. A decree for the eviction of all the plaintiffs was accordingly passed by the Small Causes Court. An appeal against this decree was unsuccessful as also a revision application to the High Court. Thereafter all the three plaintiffs filed a suit in the Bombay City Civil Court praying for a declaration that plaintiff No. 1 was a tenant of the defendant and was entitled to the protection of the Rent Act and plaintiffs Nos. 2 and 3 were lawful sub-tenants and were entitled to possession, use and occupation of the premises as sub-tenants thereof. The City Civil Court dismissed the suit on the ground that there was no lawful subletting by plaintiff No. 1 of the premises to plaintiffs Nos. 2 and 3 though on the question of jurisdiction it held that it had jurisdiction to entertain the suit. The appeal to the Bombay High Court was also dismissed and the decision is reported in Harswarup Khannamal v. Nandram. The High Court disagreed with the view of the City Civil Court that it had jurisdiction to entertain the suit and, therefore, confirmed the dismissal of the plaintiff's suit though on a different ground, but did not record any decision on the merits of the appellants' case as being unnecessary. Now, this view of the High Court was confirmed by the Supreme Court and it was observed that the suit filed in the City Civil Court raised in substance a claim that the plaintiffs were tenants of the premises within the meaning of the Rent Act and such a claim was one which arose out of that Act and was, therefore, within the ambit of s. 28. In dealing with the argument that the suit in the City Civil Court was not one between landlord and a tenant because the defendant to the suit did not admit that the plaintiffs were tenants of the premises in question, their Lordships of the Supreme Court observed as follows (p. 958) :—

"...Section 28 applies to a suit where admittedly the relationship of landlord and tenant within the meaning of the Act subsists between the parties. The plaintiff in the City Civil Court admits that the defendants were landlords of the premises at various stages and the plaintiffs were their tenants. The suit, therefore, was essentially a suit between a landlord and a tenant. The suit did not cease to be a suit between a landlord and a tenant merely because the defendants denied the claim of the plaintiffs. Whether the plaintiffs were the tenants would be a claim or question arising out of the Act or any of its provisions which had to be dealt with by the Court trying the suit. On a proper interpretation of the provisions of s. 28 the suit contemplated in that section is not only a suit between a landlord and a tenant in which that relationship is admitted but also a suit in which it is claimed that the relationship of a landlord and a tenant within the meaning of the Act subsists between the parties. The Courts which have jurisdiction to entertain and try such a suit are the Courts specified in s. 28 and no other."

It is the submission of Mr. Parikh that these observations would apply with equal force to the present suit. In our opinion this contention is not well-founded. The question whether the defendant is or is not entitled to an order for possession under the summary procedure under Chapter VII of 'the Act', cannot attract the exclusive jurisdiction of the Courts specified in s. 28 of the Rent Act. It is the case of the plaintiff that he became a lawful sub-tenant of the defendant in April 1945 before the Rent Act came into force and that he was not a licensee. It is on this basis that the plaintiff claims that the defendant was not entitled to recover possession under s. 41 of 'the Act' alleging that plaintiff was a mere licensee whose licence has been revoked. He, therefore, filed the present suit which is essentially one under ss. 46 and 47 of 'the Act' for a declaration that defendant's application for an order for possession under Chapter VII was an act of trespass and for damages. The fact that the plaintiff has stated in addition that he was entitled to protection under the Rent Act would not, as already stated, change the nature of the suit as framed. We are also not impressed by the argument of Mr. Parikh that since the plaintiff has claimed alternatively that the alleged licence given to him was not duly determined defendant was not entitled to obtain the order of ejectment against him, that would come in the way of the Bombay City Civil Court entertaining the present suit as the Small Causes Court had decided that point against him. The order of possession obtained by the defendant is under the summary procedure provided under Chapter VII of 'the Act' and the plaintiff is entitled, in our judgment, to challenge that order by filing a suit as contemplated by ss. 46 and 47 of 'the Act'. Such a suit will not fall within the ambit of s. 28 of the Rent Act. In our view, therefore, the learned trial Judge's finding that the Bombay City Civil Court had jurisdiction to entertain the suit is correct and must be upheld.

[The rest of the judgment is not material to this report].

Appeal dismissed.

Under Item 8 of s. 167 of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, the liability to pay penalty arises only when it is proved that the person proceeded against is concerned in the importation in India or exportation from India of goods contrary to the provisions of the law. The mere finding that the goods found in a person's possession were smuggled goods is not sufficient to impose a penalty.

The burden cast on a person under s. 178A of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, from whose possession gold is seized would be discharged by him either by proving that the gold seized from him was on the Indian soil prior to September 4, 1939, or that it was brought on the Indian soil subsequent to that date on the authority of a licence granted in that behalf by the Reserve Bank of India and duty thereon was paid, if any was payable.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

S. J. Sorabji, M. O. Chinoy, S. R. Vakil, G. L. Sanghi and A. S. Bobde, for the petitioner.

N. L. Abhyankar, Special Government Pleader, for the respondent.

TAMBE J. One of the questions raised in this application relates to the constitutionality of s. 178A of the Sea Customs Act (Act VIII of 1878) and, therefore, a notice was issued to the Attorney General. The contention is that it violates the constitutional guarantee to acquire, hold and dispose of property, and to practise any profession, or to carry on any occupation, trade or business enshrined in sub-cl. (f) and (g) of cl. (1) of art. 19 of the Constitution of India.

Petitioner Pukhraj Jain, a national and citizen of India, owns a gold and silver shop at Rajnandgaon and carries on business of a goldsmith under the name and style of "Champalal Pukhraj". The petitioner claims that his business is of buying and selling gold and that he was doing business both at Rajnandgaon and Tatanagar.

On October 25, 1956, while he was travelling in a train he was intercepted at Raigarh railway station at about 4.30 p.m. by the Customs Inspector (P & I) and he was found in possession of five bars of gold bullion weighing 290.6 tolas valued approximately at Rs. 29,835. The Inspector under a reasonable belief that the gold was smuggled, seized it from the petitioner. He also recorded statements of the petitioner on October 25, 26 and 30. On completion of necessary investigation, the Collector of Central Excise, M.P. and Vidarbha Area, Nagpur, respondent No. 1 hereto, served the petitioner with a show cause notice on May 20, 1957, which reads as follows:

"To

Shri Pookhraj Jain,
s/o Champalal Jain,
Sadar Bazar, Rajnandgaon.

Whereas Shri Pookhraj Jain s/o Champalal Jain of Rajnandgaon while travelling by train on 25-10-56 from Calcutta on interception by the Inspector (P & I) Raipur at the Raigarh Railway Station at 16.30 hrs, on 25-10-56 was found to be in possession of 5 pieces of gold bullion weighing tolas 290.6 (valued at Rs. 29,835/- approximately) which the said officer seized while acting on a reasonable belief, strengthened by the suspicious circumstances of his journey without a railway ticket, that it was smuggled into the State of West Bengal of the Indian Union in contravention of the Government of India's Notification No. 12(11)F.I/48 of 25-8-48 (as amended) issued under the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947, read with section 19 of the Sea Customs Act, VIII of 1878, and section 23A of the first mentioned Act.

And whereas it appears that the above action of the said Shri Pookhraj Jain prima facie amounts to the contravention of Government of India's Notification No. 12(11) F.I/48, dated 25-8-1948 (as amended) issued under the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947, read with section 23A of the said Act, and section 19 of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, and punishable under item (8) of section 167 of the Sea Customs Act, 1878.

Now, therefore, the said Shri Pookhraj Jain is hereby required to show cause to the undersigned why a penalty should not be imposed on him and why the said quantity of gold weighing tolas 290.6 in respect of which the offence appears to have been committed should not be confiscated under item 8 of the Schedule to section 167 of the Sea Customs Act, 1878.

2. Shri Pookhraj is further directed to produce at the time of showing cause all the evidence upon which he intends to rely in support of his defence, as per section 178A of the Sea Customs Act, 1878.

3. Shri Pookhraj should also indicate in his written explanation whether he wishes to be heard in person before the case is adjudicated.

4. If no cause is shown against the action proposed to be taken within ten days of the receipt of this notice or if he does not appear before the adjudicating officer when the case is posted for hearing, the case will be decided on the basis of evidence on record, assuming that Shri Pookhraj Jain has no defence to offer."

In reply to the notice the petitioner showed cause. His defence in short was that out of 290.6 tolas of gold found in his possession, 162 tolas of gold was purchased by him from various persons and remaining 128 tolas of gold formed part of 150 tolas of gold which he had received as his share at the time of the partition of the joint family property. He wanted to sell that gold. He, therefore, got it melted and converted into five bars. He had taken gold from Rajnandgaon to Tatanagar for selling it. He however was not successful in selling the gold at Tatanagar and while he was returning from Tatanagar he was intercepted. In support of his contention the petitioner also examined certain witnesses before the Collector of Central Excise, respondent No. 1 hereto. His defence was not accepted by the Collector. The conclusions reached by the Collector in his words are:

"In view of the foregoing discussions and examination of the case in all its aspects, I am fully convinced in that the party has failed to discharge his burden under section 178A of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, to prove that the seized gold is not the smuggled one. Even though there are no foreign marks on the seized gold, the irresistible conclusion from the evidence led before me and the serious contradictions and material factual discrepancies in the defence story is that the gold in question is obviously contraband as per information received by the Department."

The Collector, therefore, by his order dated July 26, 1958, ordered confiscation of 290.6 tolas of gold and also imposed a penalty of Rs. 25,000 on the petitioner under s. 167(8) of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, read with s. 19 ibid and s. 23A of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947. Against this order of the Collector the petitioner has preferred this application under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution of India and therein he prays for the issue of a writ of certiorari or a writ in the nature of certiorari or other appropriate writ and for quashing and setting aside the said order. The petitioner further prays for issue of a writ of prohibition or a writ in the nature of prohibition or other appropriate writ, direction or order under art. 226 of the Constitution of India against respondent No. 1 prohibiting him, his officers, subordinates, servants and agents from taking any steps in enforcement and/or execution of the said order dated July 24/26, 1958.

At this stage it would be convenient to refer to some of the provisions of the relevant Acts.

Section 19, which appears in Chapter IV of the Sea Customs Act, provides that the Central Government may from time to time, by notification in the Official Gazette, prohibit or restrict the bringing or taking by sea or by land goods of any specified description into or out of India across any customs frontier as defined by the Central Government.

Item 8 of section 167 of the Sea Customs Act runs as follows:

"167. The offences mentioned in the first column of the following schedule shall be punishable to the extent mentioned in the third column of the same with reference to such offences respectively:—

Offences	Section of this Act to which offence has reference.	Penalties.
8. If any goods, the importation or exportation of which is for the time being prohibited or restricted by or under Chapter IV of this Act, be imported into or exported from India contrary to such prohibition or restriction, or	18 & 19	Such goods shall be liable to confiscation; any person concerned in any such offence shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding three times the value of the goods, or not exceeding one thousand rupees."

Section 178 of the Act provides that anything liable to confiscation under this Act may be seized in any place, either upon land or water, by any officer of Customs or other person duly employed for the prevention of smuggling.

Section 183 provides that whenever confiscation is authorized by this Act, the officer adjudging it shall give the owner of the goods an option to pay in lieu of confiscation such fine as the officer thinks fit.

Section 8(1) of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947, provides that the Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, order that, subject to such exemption, if any, as may be contained in the notification, no person shall, except with the general or special permission of the Reserve Bank and on payment of the fee, if any, prescribed, bring or send into India any gold or silver, etc. In exercise of the powers conferred by sub-s. (1) of s. 8, notification No. 12(11) FI/48, dated August 25, 1948, was issued. The notification runs as follows:

"(1) Restrictions on Import of Gold & Silver.

In exercise of the powers conferred by sub-section (1) of section 8 of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947 (VII of 1947), and in supersession of the notification of the Government of India in the late Finance Department No. 12(11) FI/47, dated the 25th March 1947, the Central Government is pleased to direct that except with the general or special permission of the Reserve Bank, no person shall bring or send into India from any place outside India—

(a) any gold coin, gold bullion, gold sheets or gold ingot, whether refined or not; or

(b) any silver bullion, any silver sheets or plates which have undergone no process of manufacture subsequent to rolling, or any silver coin not current in the country of issue."

Section 23 of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947, provides for penalties and procedure in respect of contravention of the provisions of this Act or of any rule, direction or order made thereunder.

Section 23A provides that "without prejudice to the provisions of section 23 or to any other provision contained in this Act, the restrictions imposed by sub-sections (1) and (2) of section 8, ... shall be deemed to have been imposed under section 19 of the Sea Customs Act, 1878 (VIII of 1878), and all the provisions of that Act shall have effect accordingly, except that section 183 thereof shall have effect as if for the word 'shall' therein the word 'may' were substituted."

The combined effect of the aforesaid provisions of the Acts and the notification in short is that under notification dated August 25, 1948, restrictions are imposed on the import of gold in India and it can only be imported under general or special permission of the Reserve Bank. By virtue of s. 23A of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, the aforesaid notification has the force of a notifiction issued under s. 19 of the Sea Customs Act. Thus gold imported in contravention of the aforesaid notification is liable to be seized under s. 178 of the Act and renders the person in possession of such gold liable for being proceeded against by the authorities under the Sea Customs Act under Item 8 of s. 167 of the Act. The Customs authorities, however, are not under an obligation to give him an option to pay a fine in lieu of confiscation of the gold. It is within the discretion of the authority concerned to give him that option or not. The order of confiscation made under s. 167 of the Sea Customs Act after completing the inquiry has the effect of vesting the seized property in the Government (s. 184 of the Act).

The provisions of s. 178A of the Sea Customs Act come into play at the stage of inquiry. Relevant provisions of the section read as follows:

"178A. (1) Burden of proof: Where any goods to which this section applies are seized under this Act in the reasonable belief that they are smuggled goods, the burden of proving that they are not smuggled goods shall be on the person from whose possession the goods were seized.

(2) This section shall apply to gold, gold manufactures, diamonds and other precious stones, cigarettes and cosmetics and any other goods which the Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, specify in this behalf."

We are here concerned with gold. Mr. Sorabji, learned counsel for the petitioner, contends that the provisions of this section violate the rights guaranteed under art. 19(1)(f) and (g) of the Constitution of India. Under the aforesaid cls. (f) and (g) a citizen of India is guaranteed the right to acquire, hold and dispose of property and to practise any profession, or to carry on any occupation, trade or business. Gold is a commodity which is capable of acquisition. Trading in gold is also not prohibited. The aforesaid section makes it well-nigh impossible for a citizen to exercise these rights on account of the heavy burden that is cast on him by sub-s. (1) of s. 178A to prove that the gold in his possession is not smuggled gold. The burden cast is impossible to be discharged. By looking at gold it is not possible to tell whether it was imported in India or not and yet a citizen is called upon to prove the date of its being first brought in India. It affects a person's right to acquire, hold and dispose of gold and also to carry on trade and business in gold. A person would be afraid of purchasing gold in market. This also affects trade and business. The burden imposed is excessive and arbitrary. It is also contended by Mr. Sorabji that there is no connection between reasonable belief of the customs officer seizing gold and the burden which a citizen is called upon to discharge, viz. that the gold is not smuggled gold. Reliance is placed on the decisions of Mr. Justice K. T. Desai in *Amichand Vallamji v. M. G. Abrol*¹ and a Division Bench of the Madras High Court in Nathlla Sampathy Chetty v. The Collector of Customs.² These decisions, no doubt, support the contentions raised.

Mr. Abhyankar, Special Government Pleader, for respondent No. 1, on the other hand, contends that art. 19 of the Constitution has no application at all. Result of failure to discharge the burden on the part of a citizen is deprivation of gold under Item 8 of s. 167 of the Sea Customs Act. Apposite article that is attracted to this case is art. 31 of the Constitution. Section 178A is placed on the statute book for the purpose of imposing or levying penalty and the Legislature was, therefore, competent to make that legislation under art. 31(5)(b)(i). In the alternative, Mr. Abhyankar contends that even if the provisions of art. 19(1)(f) and (g) are attracted, the case falls under the provisions of cl. (5) of art. 19. The restrictions imposed are in the interests of the general public and are reasonable. There are also adequate safeguards provided in the Sea Customs Act itself against an arbitrary action of a Customs authority.

In our opinion, there is not much force in the contention of Mr. Abhyankar that the apposite article applicable would be art. 31 to the facts and circumstances of the case.

¹ (1958) O.C.J. Miscellaneous Application No. 21 of 1957, decided by K. T. Desai J., on May 15, 1958 (Unrep.).

² (1958) Writ Petitions Nos. 384 of 1957 and 660 of 1958, decided by Rajgopalan and Balakrishna JJ., on September 9, 1958.

Article 31 relates to the deprivation of private property of a person. On the language of s. 178A of the Sea Customs Act, it has no relation to the question of deprivation of property. It is not enacted for the purpose of taking the property of a person but is only a rule of evidence enacted for the purpose of ascertaining whether gold seized from the possession of a person is smuggled gold or not. No doubt the combined effect of ss. 178A and 167⁽⁸⁾ is deprivation of property but then the deprivation is on a footing that the person in possession had no legal right to hold that property it having been smuggled. It is well-settled that art. 31 deals with the field of eminent domain. In Dwarkanadas Shrinivas of Bombay v. The Sholapur Spinning and Weaving Co. Ltd.,³ their Lordships of the Supreme Court observed (p. 694):

"...In considering Article 31 it is significant to note that it deals with private property of persons residing in the Union of India, while article 19 only deals with citizens defined in article 5 of the Constitution. It is thus obvious that the scope of these two articles cannot be the same as they cover different fields. It cannot be seriously argued that so far as citizens are concerned, freedoms regarding enjoyment of property have been granted in two articles of the Constitution, while the protection to property qua all other persons has been dealt with in article 31 alone. If both articles covered the same ground, it was unnecessary to have two articles on the same subject. The true approach to this question is that these two articles really deal with two different subjects and one has no direct relation with the other, namely, article 31 deals with the field of eminent domain and the whole boundary of that field is demarcated by this article. In other words, the State's power to take the property of a person is comprehensively delimited by this article. The article has been split up in six clauses. Moreover, by the amendment of the Constitution certain kinds of laws have been exempted from the operation of the article or from the whole of Part III of the Constitution by the addition of articles 31A and 31B. Article 31(1) declares the first requisite for the exercise of the power of eminent domain. It guarantees that a person cannot be deprived of property by an executive fiat and that it is only by the exercise of its legislative powers that the State can deprive a person of his property. In other words, all that article 31(1) says is that private property can only be taken pursuant to law and not otherwise."

This contention of Mr. Abhyankar, therefore, fails.

It is next to be seen whether the provisions of s. 178A are violative of art. 19(1)(f) and (g) of the Constitution. Clauses (f) and (g) of art. 19 guarantee to a citizen the right to acquire, hold and dispose of property and to practise any profession, or to carry on any occupation, trade or business. There is no prohibition in any law for acquisition or holding or disposing of gold. There is also no law prohibiting a person from trading or doing business in gold. Gold is an article which could be possessed and over which the aforesaid rights could be exercised. It has to be seen whether the provisions of s. 178A in any manner restrict the exercise of these rights. In a given circumstance, i.e. when gold is seized by a Customs authority under a reasonable belief that it is smuggled, the section requires a citizen to prove that gold in his possession is not smuggled, and indeed it is difficult to discharge that burden. As observed by Mr. Justice K. T. Desai in Amichand Vallamji v. M. G. Abrol,

"It (gold) is an article which is capable of being split and there can be a fusion of diverse quantities of gold. It is easily changeable in form, size and shape. The gold available in the market hardly bears any identification mark. It is available in the form of lagdis, ravas, patlas and bars. It is available in the shape of coins. It was at one time a medium of currency."

A person purchasing gold has no means for ascertaining the year in which it was imported in India. It is common knowledge that there is very little indigenous gold in India and a large percentage of gold found in India is imported gold.

An innocent purchaser may bona fide acquire gold in the market and yet he will be required to prove that that gold is not smuggled gold. In *Babulal Amthalal Mehta v. The Collector of Customs, Calcutta*⁴ their Lordships observed (p. 1119):

"...No doubt the content and import of the section are very wide. It applies not only to the actual smuggler from whose possession the goods are seized but also to those who came into possession of the goods after having purchased the same after the same has passed through many hands or agencies. For example, if the Customs authorities have a reasonable belief that certain goods in the possession of an innocent party are smuggled goods and the same is seized under the provisions of this Act, then the person from whose possession the goods were seized, however innocent he may be, has to prove that the goods are not smuggled articles. This is no doubt a very heavy and onerous duty cast on an innocent possessor who, for ought one knows, may have bona fide paid adequate consideration for the purchase of the articles without knowing that the same has been smuggled. The only pre-requisite for the application of the section is the subjectivity of the Customs-officer in having a reasonable belief that the goods are smuggled."

This heavy and onerous duty imposed by the section on a citizen of India would undoubtedly act as a restriction on free exercise of the right of acquiring, holding and disposing of gold or of carrying on trade or business in gold guaranteed by art. 19(1)(f) and (g) of the Constitution. It has, however, to be remembered that the right conferred by art. 19(1)(f) and (g) is not an absolute right. The Legislature has been authorised to curtail that right, and impose restrictions on its exercise to a certain extent as provided in cl. (5) of art. 19 of the Constitution, and when we turn to cl. (5) of art. 19 it is clear that the power conferred on the Legislature to impose restrictions on the exercise of the right under art. 19(1)(f) and (g) are circumscribed by three limitations, the first limitation is that the restrictions imposed must be by enacting a law, the second limitation is that the law must be in the interests of the general public and the third limitation is that those restrictions must be reasonable. It is not in dispute that the restrictions imposed are by law. It is also not in dispute and indeed it cannot be disputed, that the restrictions imposed are in the interests of the general public. The question to be considered is whether the restrictions imposed are reasonable.

Now, the restriction imposed is in the shape of rule of evidence casting a burden of proof on the person from whose possession the gold is seized to prove that the gold was not smuggled. The expression 'smuggling' is not defined. The meaning given to that word in the words of their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Babulal's case is as follows (p. 1116):

"...Though the word 'smuggling' is not defined in the Act, it must be understood as having the ordinary dictionary meaning namely carrying of goods clandestinely into a country."

It would be convenient at this stage to consider various steps taken by the Government of India to restrict importation of gold. Upto September 4, 1939, there was no restriction on the import of gold in India. On that day a notification No. 53, dated September 4, 1939, was issued by the Finance Department (Central Revenues) of the Central Government. This notification was issued in exercise of the powers conferred on the Central Government by s. 19 of the Sea Customs Act. It prohibited bringing or taking by sea or land into British India from any place other than Burma or out of British India to any place other than Burma, gold coin, gold bullion or gold ingots, whether refined or not, except on the authority of a licence granted in that behalf by the Reserve Bank of India. On March 25, 1947, the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act came into force, and on the same day, in exercise of the powers conferred on the Central Government under s. 8(1), the Central Government issued a notification prohibiting import of any gold coin, gold bullion, gold sheets or gold ingots, whether refined or not except with the permission of the Reserve Bank of India. This notification superseded the aforesaid notification dated September 4, 1939, issued under s. 19 of the Sea Customs Act. The notification dated March 25, 1947, was also superseded by another notification issued on August 25, 1948. The contents of this notification are similar in effect to that issued on March 25, 1947. This notification of August 25, 1948, was in force at the material time. No duty was levied on the import of gold till April 1, 1946, but thereafter a duty has been imposed. The burden that falls on a person from whose possession gold is seized is that he must prove that the gold seized from him was not smuggled gold and not as contended for by Mr. Sorabji that he has to trace its history from the date on which it was for the first time brought on the Indian soil. In our opinion, the burden cast on him would be discharged by him either by proving that the gold seized from him was on the Indian soil prior to September 4, 1939, or that it was brought on the Indian soil subsequent to that date on the authority of a licence granted in that behalf by the Reserve Bank of India and duty thereon was paid if any was payable. It has to be considered whether this burden can be termed as reasonable. The approach to the question has to be in the light of the following observations of their Lordships of the Supreme Court in *State of Madras v. V. C. Row*⁵ (p. 607):

"...It is important in this context to bear in mind that the test of reasonableness, wherever prescribed, should be applied to each individual statute impugned, and no abstract standard, or general pattern, of reasonableness can be laid down as applicable to all cases. The nature of the right alleged to have been infringed, the underlying purpose of the restrictions imposed, the extent and urgency of the evil sought to be remedied thereby, the disproportion of the imposition, the prevailing conditions at the time, should all enter into the judicial verdict."

It has also to be assumed that the elected representatives of the people have in authorising imposition of the restrictions considered them to be reasonable. It is, therefore, first to be considered what conditions were prevailing when s. 178A of the Sea Customs Act was brought on the statute book and the evil it sought to be remedied. In other words, what was the underlying object or purpose of the Legislature in enacting s. 178A.

As already stated, import of gold was restricted in India since September 4, 1939. Section 178A, however, was brought on the statute book for the first time in the year 1955 by virtue of s. 14 of the Sea Customs (Amendment) Act, 1955 (21 of 1955). To understand the conditions that prevailed in 1955 and the evil which was sought to be remedied by the Legislature by enacting this section, reference to the Objects and Reasons of the Act and the Explanatory Note in the Bill would afford a useful guide and it is open to the Court to refer to them for this limited purpose.

In *State of West Bengal v. Subodh Gopal*⁶, Das J., as he then was, observed (p. 104):

"It is well settled by this Court that the statement of objects and reasons is not admissible as an aid to the construction of the statute... & I am not, therefore, referring to it for the purpose of construing any part of the Act or of ascertaining the meaning of any word used in the Act but I am referring to it only for the limited purpose of ascertaining the conditions prevailing at the time which actuated the sponsor of the Bill to introduce the same & the extent & urgency of the evil which he sought to remedy. Those are all matters which, as already stated, must enter into the judicial verdict as to the reasonableness of the restrictions which Art. 19(5) permits to be imposed on the exercise of the right guaranteed by Article 19(1)(f)."

These observations were affirmed by the Supreme Court in M. K. Ranganathan v. Govt. of Madras.⁷ In our opinion, these observations would apply with equal force to use of the speech made in Parliament by the sponsor of the Bill, for the limited purpose.

The Bill introduced in Parliament is Bill No. 48 of 1954. By this Bill it was proposed to amend the Sea Customs Act. Clause 14 thereof provided that the following clause be inserted in the Act as s. 178A after s. 178:

"Where any goods are seized under this Act on the ground that they are smuggled goods, the burden of proving that the goods are not smuggled goods shall be on the person from whose possession the goods are seized."

One of the objects for introducing this Bill was to take some additional power for controlling smuggling. Note to clause 14 reads:

"At present when action is taken against persons who are in possession of smuggled goods, it is not always easy for customs authorities to prove that the goods are smuggled goods. This clause places the burden of proof in such cases on persons from whose possession suspected smuggled goods are seized. Such a provision is necessary in order to safeguard the revenues of the State."

This Bill was introduced in Parliament by the Minister of Revenue and Defence Expenditure (Shri A. C. Guha) on March 12, 1955. The following observations in his speech at the time of making a motion for taking the Bill into consideration are material:

"The second point is to take some additional power for controlling smuggling. It may not be quite unknown to this House that smuggling has increased rather enormously. Previously there was not much economic incentive for smuggling, but due to so many restrictions and controls, and licences and prohibitions due to the development of indigenous industries and also due to our having long land borders after the partition of India, smuggling has become more rampant and has also become a paying proposition. Certain articles are prohibited for import and even for export, and if a smuggler can get them into or send them out of India, he can reap rich profits. This economic incentive for smuggling was lacking so long; now it has become necessary for the Government to take stringent measures and to take additional powers to stop smuggling."

In considering the genesis of s. 178A their Lordships of the Supreme Court observed as follows in Babulal Amthlal Mehta v. The Collector of Customs, Calcutta (p. 1118):

"The genesis of s. 178-A may now be considered. The Central Government had appointed a commission known as the Taxation Enquiry Commission which by its report recommended the adoption of the principles underlying section 178-A in order to minimize smuggling. In Vol. II of their report, Chapter VII deals with administrative problems in regard to customs and excise duties. At pp. 320 and 321 the Committee recommends the amendment of the Sea Customs Act, firstly to make smuggling a criminal offence and secondly empowering Customs officers to search premises etc. and the third recommendation is the one with which we are concerned. It is in the following terms:

"To transfer the onus of proof in respect of offences relating to smuggling to the person in whose possession any dutiable restricted or prohibited goods are found."

It is to implement this recommendation that s. 178A has been enacted."

It would be seen that this clause of the Bill as originally framed has not been accepted by the Parliament and material changes have been effected by Parliament in enacting s. 178A. The burden is imposed on a person only when gold is seized from his possession in the reasonable belief that it is smuggled gold and not when it is seized on the ground that it is smuggled as originally proposed. In the second instance, the amendment proposed was of general application to all smuggled goods. By enacting cl. (2) Parliament limited it only to gold, gold manufactures, diamonds and other precious stones, cigarettes and cosmetics and any other goods which the Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, specify in this behalf. Looking to the articles mentioned in cl. (2) the common feature that appears to be is that it relates to articles which can easily be smuggled. Thus considering all this material, in our opinion, the conditions prevailing in 1955 were that smuggling of articles including gold, had increased in dangerous proportions and was affecting the economy of the country. There was an incentive for the residents of India and others to smuggle articles including gold. On account of inherent characteristics of the articles there was difficulty in the way of the Customs authorities to prove that the seized gold was smuggled gold. This resulted in the smuggled gold getting distributed in the country and in adversely affecting the economy of the country. The primary object with which s. 178A was brought on the statute book was, in our opinion, to prevent certain smuggled articles getting absorbed in the country.

Keeping these aforesaid conditions and circumstances prevailing at the time s. 178A of the Sea Customs Act was brought on the statute book and the underlying object or the purpose of the Legislature in enacting this section in view, it has to be considered whether the restrictions imposed have a rational relation to the object sought to be achieved by the Act; or in other words, the restrictions imposed are in any manner disproportionate, arbitrary and excessive. Mr. Sorabji contends that the presumption raised is not founded on the proof of any fact as such but is founded only on the subjectivity of the Customs officer in having a reasonable belief that the goods are smuggled. There is no provision in the statute which entitles a person from whose possession gold is seized to know the reasons or grounds of his reasonable belief nor the subjectivity of the Customs officer made a justiciable issue. Powers conferred on the Customs officer are, therefore, arbitrary and there is no rational relation between the subjectivity of the Customs officer and the presumption raised. Reliance is placed by Mr. Sorabji on certain observations made in State of Madras v. V. G. Row and decisions in *Thakur Baghu-bir Singh v. Court of Wards, Ajmer*⁸, *Ebrahim Vasir Mavat v. The State of Bombay*⁹ and Tot v. United States.¹⁰

It must be conceded that there is no provision in the Sea Customs Act which entitles a person from whose possession gold is seized to know the facts on which the reasonable belief of the Customs officer that the gold is smuggled is founded. Section 181 no doubt provides that when anything is seized, or any person is arrested under this Act, the officer or other person making such seizure or arrest shall, on demand of the person in charge of the things so seized, or of the person so arrested, give him a statement in writing of the reason for such seizure or arrest. But when we turn to s. 178A it becomes clear that entertaining a reasonable belief that the gold is smuggled is a sufficient reason for the seizure of the gold, and if the Customs officer says so in the writing which he gives to the person concerned, it would amount to sufficient compliance with the provisions of s. 181 of the Sea Customs Act. It is also true that the grounds on which the reasonable belief is entertained by the Customs officer cannot be inquired into a Court of law.

It is, on the other hand, contended by Mr. Abhyankar that the information which a Customs officer receives regarding the smuggled gold has to be kept confidential, and if this information is disclosed either to the person from whose possession gold is seized or at the time of judicial inquiry, people will not come forward to give information to the Department and the very object of the Act would be defeated. There is considerable force in the argument of Mr. Abhyankar. In our opinion, there is good reason for not disclosing information giving rise to the reasonable belief of a Customs officer. This, however, does not mean that the facts on which the Customs officer seizing gold founds his reasonable belief are not subjected to any scrutiny at all. If we turn to the provisions of s. 182 of the Sea Customs Act, it becomes clear that the officer who holds an inquiry thereunder is usually not the same officer who has seized the gold. As already stated, s. 178A comes into play only at the stage of inquiry and it is for that officer to consider whether he should raise a presumption or not. It necessarily follows that it is open to that officer to consider whether on the material placed before him he could hold that the seizure made by the Customs officer was made in the reasonable belief that the gold was smuggled.

Mr. Abhyankar has placed on record instructions issued to the Customs officer by the Collector of Central Excise Collectorate, Nagpur, being Standing Order 4 of 1953. The procedure which has to be followed by the Customs officer according to this Standing Order in short is that the Customs officer making a seizure as a result of an information lodged with him, has to place on record substance of the information received. He has to disclose the names of the informers to his superior officers confidentially. Preliminary reports of searches and seizures are to be submitted to the immediate superior officer promptly. Seizure report which has to be made has to contain particulars of the date, time, place of seizure of the person from whom and the goods which are seized, of the rules for the violation of which the seizure has been effected and of the reasons why the seizing officer made the seizure. This report and its enclosures form the basis of the proceedings before the adjudication officer. Seizure report complete with essential documents is to be submitted within 7 days of the seizure. The officer receiving the seizure report has to scrutinise the papers and see whether a prima facie case has been made out and whether the case is within his competence to adjudicate and it is only when he is satisfied on both these points that he issues a formal show cause notice. If he is not satisfied and if he feels that a wrong seizure has been made and there was actually no prima facie case against the person from whom the goods are seized, the goods seized are ordered to be released. These instructions in the Standing Order further make it clear that the officer holding an inquiry has to apply his mind to the facts and circumstances which led to the seizure and has to satisfy himself that they in fact give rise to a reasonable belief that the gold seized was smuggled.

The next stage after the show cause notice is the inquiry by the adjudication officer. Here the person from whom gold is seized has an opportunity of showing that the gold was not smuggled gold. As already stated, no doubt, the onus is a heavy onus. After considering all this material on record the decision is arrived at by the adjudication officer. Now, if the adjudication officer orders confiscation of gold or imposition of any penalty the person from whose possession the gold is seized has a right to prefer an appeal against that order to the appropriate appellate authority under s. 188 of the Sea Customs Act. At this stage, again, the whole case including the facts giving rise to the reasonable belief of the Customs officer seizing gold comes under the scrutiny of the appellate authority. Apart from this, revisional powers are also conferred on the Chief Customs authority and the Chief Customs officer under s. 190A, and on the Central Government under s. 191, of the Act. There is no reason to assume that the various Customs authorities on whom the aforesaid powers are conferred will not exercise them honestly and fairly. The validity of a statute must be judged rather on the assumption that those who are called upon to exercise these wide powers will exercise them honestly and bona fide: Bapurao Dhondiba v. State of Bombay.¹¹ On this assumption and in view of the aforesaid safeguards contained in the Sea Customs Act itself, it is difficult to assume that a citizen of India would be called upon to bear the burden of rebutting the presumption on a mere arbitrary whim of a Customs officer. It must also be kept in view that the presumption raised is not that the person from whom the gold is seized under such reasonable belief is a smuggler or is in any manner concerned in smuggling of that gold, or that he is in possession of it knowing that it is smuggled. The presumption only is that that gold is smuggled. As already stated, the object of the Act is to prevent smuggling. The presumption raised is only limited to that extent and not for the purpose of holding the person from whose possession gold is seized criminally liable. Failure to rebut the presumption would only result in confiscation of gold and thereby prevent smuggled gold from getting absorbed in the country.

The presumption raised, in our opinion, has therefore, a rational relation to the object sought to be achieved by the Act.

Mr. Sorabji further contends that the restrictions imposed are manifestly excessive and are not necessary for the achievement of the object of the Act. They would affect a person who had bona fide acquired gold prior to the date this Act came into force. It is true that to discharge the burden raised under s. 178A it is not sufficient for the person from whose possession gold is seized to prove that he had acquired this gold bona fide prior to the date the Act came into force. He has further to establish that the gold is not smuggled gold. But to so limit the presumption would not achieve the object which the Legislature had in view, viz. confiscation of smuggled gold. We have already shown that the chances of gold being confiscated from innocent bona fide purchasers are very much minimised on account of the safeguards in the Act to which we have already referred. It is true that some instances may occur where bona fide purchasers may suffer on account of failure on their part to discharge the heavy onus cast on them. But hardship in few individual cases should not weigh in considering the constitutionality of an enactment.

The decisions to which reference was made by Mr. Sorabji also are not of much assistance to him and are distinguishable on facts.

The passage in State of Madras v. V. G. Row on which reliance was placed by Mr. Sorabji reads as follows (p. 608) :

"...The formula of subjective satisfaction of the Government or of its officers, with an Advisory Board thrown in to review the materials on which the Government seeks to override a basic freedom guaranteed to the citizen, may be viewed as reasonable only in very exceptional circumstances and within the narrowest limits, and cannot receive judicial approval as a general pattern of reasonable restrictions on fundamental rights." These observations are no authority for holding that the formula of subjective satisfaction cannot be viewed as a reasonable restriction in any case. Each case would depend on its own facts. On the facts of this case it was held that there was no adequate provision in the Act for the scrutiny of the subjective satisfaction on the basis of which the action was taken nor was there a real opportunity to the person to show cause against the action proposed to be taken against him. Such is not the case here. Confiscation of gold does not follow as a result of the mere subjective satisfaction of officer seizing it. It is open to scrutiny at the hands of his superior officer. A citizen has an opportunity of being heard at the stage of inquiry.

In Thakur Raghbir Singh v. Court of Wards, Ajmer a citizen was deprived of his right to enjoy his property on the mere subjective determination of the Court of Wards that he was a person who habitually infringed the rights of his tenants without any opportunity to show that he had not been doing so.

In Ebrahim Vazir Mavai v. The State of Bombay also subjective determination of the Central Government that the citizen has committed a particular offence resulted in his expulsion from the country without an opportunity to show that he had not committed that offence.

The American decision reported in Frank Tot v. United States of America, referred to by Mr. Sorabji, proceeds on the application of the American doctrine of due process clause of the American Federal Constitution. As observed by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Babulal's case and in *Gopalan v. State of Madras*¹² and State of West Bengal v. Subodh Gopal, the decisions of the American Courts relating to the application of the doctrine of due process clause are of little assistance in construing the provisions of the Constitution of India.

To summarize; At the time s. 178A was brought on the statute book importation of gold had become highly lucrative, it could easily be smuggled and was being smuggled in the country in large quantity for some years prior to the enactment of this section, this was largely affecting the economy of the country, detection was getting difficult, even on detection of certain cases proving that the gold seized was smuggled gold was difficult presumably because information received in confidence could not be put in evidence which in its turn resulted in getting the smuggled gold absorbed in the country. This mischief had to be remedied and, therefore, s. 178A, amongst others, was brought on the statute book principally to prevent smuggling or, in other words, to prevent getting smuggled goods absorbed in the country. Restrictions imposed come into play only when the seizure of gold is under the reasonable belief of a Customs officer that it is smuggled gold. In view of the safeguards provided in the Act, the power conferred on the Customs officer to seize gold is not likely to be exercised in an arbitrary or capricious manner and afford sufficient safeguard to a citizen of India against any arbitrary action being taken against him. In these circumstances the restrictions imposed under s. 178A of the Sea Customs Act have a rational relation to the object of the Act and, therefore, are reasonable restrictions in the interests of the general public within the meaning of cl. (5) of art. 19 of the Constitution.

For the reasons stated above and with utmost respect to the learned Judges, deciding Amichand Vallamji v. M. G. Abrol and Nathla Sampathy Chetty v. The Collector of Customs, in our judgment, we hold that the provisions of s. 178A of the Sea Customs Act do not infringe the constitutional guarantee afforded by art. 19(1)(f) and (g) of the Constitution so far as gold is concerned.

It is true that their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Babulal's case were considering the constitutionality of s. 178A in relation to art. 14 of the Constitution. But their following observations lend support to the conclusions to which we have reached (p. 1121):

"A cursory perusal of s. 178-A will at once disclose the well defined classification of goods based on an intelligible differentia. It applies only to certain goods described in sub-s. (2) which are or can be easily smuggled. The section applies only to those goods of the specified kind which have been seized under the Act and in the reasonable belief that they are smuggled goods. It is only those goods which answer the threefold description that come under the operation of the section. The object of the Act is to prevent smuggling. The differentia on the basis of which the goods have been classified and the presumption raised by the section obviously have a rational relation to the object sought to be achieved by the Act. The presumption only attaches to goods of the description mentioned in the section and it directly furthers the object of the Act, namely, the prevention of smuggling."

Now, when the presumption raised by the section has a rational relation to the object sought to be achieved by the Act and it directly furthers the object of the Act, namely, the prevention of smuggling, it is difficult to hold that the restriction imposed in the shape of this presumption is unreasonable.

Mr. Sorabji then contends that even if s. 178A of the Sea Customs Act is not ultra vires of the Constitution, it has no application in deciding questions relating to contravention of the notification issued under s. 8(1) of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act. He argues that by virtue of s. 23A of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act the provisions of the Sea Customs Act were incorporated in the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act in the year 1952. Section 178A of the Sea Customs Act was brought on the statute book in the year 1955 but was not incorporated in the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act and, therefore, in deciding the question of contravention of the notification issued under s. 8(1) of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, the Collector was not entitled to call in aid the provisions of s. 178A, he ought to have decided the case only in accordance with the provisions of the Sea Customs Act as they stood when s. 23A of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act was enacted. Reliance is placed on the following observations of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in *Secretary of State for India v. Hindusthan Co-operative Insurance Society*¹³ (p. 267) :

"It seems to be no less logical to hold that where certain provisions from an existing Act have been incorporated into a subsequent Act, no addition to the former Act, which is not expressly made applicable to the subsequent Act, can be deemed to be incorporated in it, at all events if it is possible for the subsequent Act to function effectively without the addition."

Reliance is also placed on the decision of a Division Bench of the Madras High Court (Nathila Sampathy Chetty v. The Collector of Customs). In our opinion, the aforesaid observations of their Lordships of the Privy Council have no application to the facts of the present case inasmuch as in our view the effect of s. 23A of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act is not to incorporate the provisions of the Sea Customs Act into the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act but the effect is of incorporating the restrictions imposed by the sub-s. (1) and (2) of s. 8, sub-s. (1) of s. 12 and cl. (a) of sub-s. (1) of s. 13 in the Sea Customs Act with certain modifications in s. 183 of the Sea Customs Act. With respect, it is, therefore, not possible for us to accept the view of the Division Bench of the Madras High Court in the aforesaid case. This contention of Mr. Sorabji, therefore, fails.

It is next contended by Mr. Sorabji that the inquiry held by respondent No. 1 in this case under s. 167(8) of the Sea Customs Act was a quasi judicial inquiry. Respondent No. 1 was, therefore, bound to follow the principles of natural justice in the conduct of that inquiry. He has failed to follow those principles inasmuch as he had examined three witnesses Anwar, Marotrao and his brother Rambhau behind the back of the petitioner and had considered their evidence in deciding the case against the petitioner. This contention also in our opinion has no force. The inquiry held under s. 167(8) is a quasi judicial inquiry: *Sewpujanrai I. Ltd. v. Collector of Customs*¹⁴ and respondent No. 1 was bound to follow the principles of natural justice in holding the inquiry. These principles are in the words of their Lordships of the Supreme Court in *Union of India v. T. R. Varma*¹⁵ (p. 507):

"...Stating it broadly and without intending it to be exhaustive, it may be observed that rules of natural justice require that a party should have the opportunity of adducing all relevant evidence on which he relies, that the evidence of the opponent should be taken in his presence, and that he should be given the opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses examined by that party, and that no materials should be relied on against him without his being given an opportunity of explaining them. If these rules are satisfied, the enquiry is not open to attack on the ground that the procedure laid down in the Evidence Act for taking evidence was not strictly followed."

In the first place, the arguments raised before us were not specifically stated in the petition filed before us. The plea is contained in para. 7 of the petition and it is in vague terms. A copy of the letter dated October 21, 1957, referred to therein is not placed on the record. Mr. Abhyankar stated before us that in the letter dated October 21, 1957, the request made by the petitioner was that these witnesses should be submitted for cross-examination. The Department produced Anwar on February 6, 1958. The petitioner as well as his counsel were present at that time. Anwar was examined in the presence of the petitioner's counsel. His counsel however did not cross-examine him. When this statement was made by Mr. Abhyankar, Mr. Sorabji accepted the statement of Mr. Abhyankar. Mr. Abhyankar further stated that the question of producing Rambhau and Marotrao for cross-examination did not arise because on February 6, 1958, the petitioner went back on his previous statement and stated that he had not melted gold through Rambhau and Marotrao. The statement of Marotrao and Rambhau was also to the same effect. That being the position, it was not necessary to produce Rambhau and Marotrao at the time of the inquiry, the inquiry officer having accepted the statement of the petitioner that the gold was not melted by him through Rambhau and Marotrao. In view of these facts, in our opinion, this contention of Mr. Sorabji must fail.

Last contention of Mr. Sorabji is that, at any rate, on the facts found by respondent No. 1, no penalty could be imposed on the petitioner and, therefore, the order of respondent No. 1 to the extent it imposes personal penalty of Rs. 25,000 on the petitioner is bad in law. At any rate, respondent No. 1 was acting beyond his jurisdiction in imposing penalty in excess of Rs. 1,000. In our opinion, the contention is well-founded. We have already reproduced the relevant provision of Item (8) of s. 167 of the Sea Customs Act and it would be seen that the liability to pay penalty arises only when it is proved that the person proceeded against is concerned in the importation in India or exportation from India of goods contrary to the provisions of the law. The mere finding that the goods found in a person's possession were smuggled goods is not sufficient to impose a penalty. In the instant case, respondent No. 1 has not found that the petitioner was in any manner so concerned in the importation of gold. The finding recorded is only that the gold found in the petitioner's possession is smuggled gold. Respondent No. 1, therefore, in our opinion, has erred in law in imposing the penalty of Rs. 25,000 on the petitioner. This error of law is apparent on the face of the record and, therefore, the order of respondent No. 1 to this extent is liable to be quashed.

Mr. Abhyankar, however, contends that though respondent No. 1 has not recorded a finding that the petitioner was concerned in the importation of this smuggled gold found in his possession, this is the necessary inference on the facts found by him. It is not possible for us to accept this contention. It is not for this Court to record any finding on a question of fact. The question was entirely within the jurisdiction of respondent No. 1. Respondent No. 1 having failed to record the necessary finding of fact his order is liable to be set aside to the extent stated above. On this finding of ours it is not necessary to consider the question as to the quantum of fine which could be imposed under Item (8) of s. 167 of the Sea Customs Act. We would, however, record our finding in view of the arguments advanced before us by Mr. Abhyankar. He contends that there is no limitation in the matter of imposing a penalty on the Customs authority under Item (8) of s. 167. In support of his contention he placed reliance on the decisions in *Mohandas v. Sattanathan*¹⁶ and Palriwala Bros. Ltd. v. Collector of Customs.¹⁷ The question, however, is no more open to debate and is concluded by the decision of their Lordships of the Supreme Court in *F. N. Roy v. Collector of Customs, Calcutta*¹⁸ where they observed:

"...The section (167, Item 8 of the Sea Customs Act) makes it clear that the maximum penalty that might be imposed under it is Rs. 1000. The discretion that the section gives must be exercised within the limit so fixed. This is not an uncontrolled or unreasonable discretion."

In view of these observations, it will have to be taken that the aforesaid two decisions stand overruled by necessary implication.

In the result, the petition partly succeeds. The order of respondent No. 1 so far as it relates to the imposition of penalty of Rs. 25,000 is quashed. Rest of the order including the order of confiscation of gold shall stand. In view of partial success of the parties, costs of this petition shall be borne as incurred.

Order accordingly.

*Before Mr. Justice K. K. Desai.JAYASHREE SHANTARAM VANKUDRE v. RAJKAMAL KALAMANDIR PRIVATE LTD.

Companies Act (I of 1956), Sec. 155—Application made under s. 155 involving questions of forgery and fabrication of deed of transfer of shares—Whether such questions can be tried under summary procedure of application under s. 155.

The summary procedure of trial by petition under s. 155 of the Companies Act, 1956, should not be allowed to be resorted to by the Court where discovery and inspection are necessary and complicated questions such as of forgery and fabrication of documents arise for decision in the petition.

Matheran Steam Tramway Co. v. Lang' and Shrimati Savitadevi Jhunjhunwala v. Harinagar Sugar Mills Ltd.,¹ referred to.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

M. R. Mody, for the petitioner.

P. P. Khambatta, for respondent No. 1.

J. C. Dias, for respondent No. 2.

K. K. DESAI J. On December 31, 1947, the petitioner and one Shantaram then being wife and husband floated respondent No. 1 company as a private limited company. The petitioner was registered as a shareholder in respect of 251 ordinary shares (of respondent No. 1 company) being the subject-matter of this petition. The petitioner and the said Shantaram both continued to act as and were directors of respondent No. 1 company on July 1, 1955.

From the deed of transfer dated June 28, 1955, a copy whereof is annexed as exh. 2 to the affidavit in reply made on behalf of respondent No. 1 company, it appears that the petitioner had signed the deed of transfer in respect of these 251 ordinary shares of the company. In the register of shares of respondent No. 1 company as on July 1, 1955, these shares were transferred and registered in the name of respondent No. 2. From the minutes of the meeting of the directors held on July 1, 1955, it appears that the petitioner and the said Shantaram were both present at the said meeting and the application for transfer of the shares from the name of the petitioner to respondent No. 2 was resolved to be accepted and the shares were resolved to be transferred to the name of respondent No. 2.

I understand from counsel that there have been disputes and differences between the petitioner and the said Shantaram since July 1, 1955. This petition appears to be one of the litigations arising in consequence of such disputes. In para. 7 of the petition the petitioner has referred to a suit which she has filed against respondent No. 1 company and the said Shantaram. In the written-statement in that suit the minutes of the meeting of the directors held on July 1, 1955, were referred to and annexed. It is the petitioner's case that she was never present at such meeting and that no such meeting of directors was held on July 1, 1955. The petitioner's contention is that the minutes are fabricated for the purpose of depriving the petitioner of the shares in question and of her position as a director of respondent No. 1 company. The petitioner denies having at any time executed a deed of transfer of the kind which is annexed as exh. 2 to the affidavit in reply made on behalf of respondent No. 1 company. The petitioner, however, does not deny the signature on the deed of transfer. The petitioner's case is that the contents of the deed of transfer which bears her signature are forged and fabricated. In the affidavit in reply made on behalf of respondent No. 1 company all these allegations are denied.

*Decided, January 19, 1959. O.C.J. I. O. No. 96 of 1958.

2 (1955) O. C. J. I. O. No. 67 of 1954, decided by Coyajee J., on March 23, 1955 (Unrep.).

Mr. Khambatta on behalf of respondent No. 1 company has contended that the procedure prescribed under s. 155 of the Indian Companies Act is a summary remedy and should not be allowed to be resorted to in matters involving complicated questions such as have arisen in this petition. He contends that questions of forgery and fabrication of documents are not proper to be tried under the summary procedure of an application under s. 155 of the Companies Act. He has in that connection referred me to various text-books. In Vol. VI of Halsbury's Laws of England the summary of the purport of the English decisions in this connection appears in art. 448. The relevant observations in that article are as follows (p. 218) :—

"The application may be made by the person aggrieved,...It may be by motion or summons or by action commenced by writ. If the Court thinks that the case, by reason of its complexity or on the ground that there are matters requiring investigation or otherwise, could more satisfactorily be dealt with by an action, the court will decline to make an order on a motion, without prejudice to the right of the applicant to institute an action for rectification. An action may, without any direction by the Court, be instituted for rectification of the register, a course which should be followed where there is much complexity, or where other relief is required."

Mr. Khambatta and Mr. Mody both have referred me to the case of Matheran Steam Tramway Co. v. Lang.¹ In that case the trial Court in its discretion heard on merits and decided a petition made under s. 38 (which is the same as the present s. 155) of the Companies Act. In the Appeal Court before the Division Bench one of the contentions raised was that a complicated matter requiring trial by evidence should not have been allowed to be heard by petition and a suit should have been directed to be filed. That contention was dealt with as follows (p. 196) :—

"It was next said that this was not a matter which could be determined under s. 38 of the Indian Companies Act and that the petitioners should be left to a separate suit, more especially as Mr. Dinshaw had threatened a suit to enforce his lien. But s. 38 is widely worded. At the most it is a matter of discretion for the Court whether in any particular case it will hear the petition or leave the parties to a separate suit. An express issue was raised on this point, and the learned Judge exercised his discretion by deciding to hear this petition. Under those circumstances, we do not think we ought to overrule him, and force the parties to begin de novo. Mr. Dinshaw's explanation as to why he did not bring a separate suit was because it would in effect be carried on at his own expense. There is the additional circumstance that a petition under s. 38 should be a speedier and cheaper process than an ordinary suit."

The effect of the above observations appears to me to be that the Appeal Court was not willing to interfere with the discretion that was used by the trial Court in refusing to refer the petitioner in that matter to an action. The Appeal Court also pointed out that the terms of s. 38 of the Companies Act were wide and the remedy was speedier and cheaper. The matter is, therefore, entirely in the discretion of the trial Court.

Mr. Khambatta has referred me to the case of *Shrimati Savitadevi Jhunjhunwala v. Harinagar Sugar Mills Ltd.*² In that case after considering the position as arising under the decision in Matheran Steam Tramway Co. v. Lang on the facts of that case Coyajee J. refused to allow the petitioner to proceed by the summary procedure prescribed under s. 38 of the Companies Act, and referred him to an action.

In all matters arising under the Companies Act the rules of this Court provide that the application must be by petition. It is not, however, that complicated questions of facts must be tried on a petition where remedy for action is available to a party. It appears to me that the observations made in English decisions in this connection are relevant and that where discovery and inspection are necessary and complicated questions such as of forgery and fabricated documents arise for decision the summary procedure of trial by petition under s. 155 should not be allowed to be proceeded. This is not a matter where remedy of action is not available. On the contrary it is admitted by both sides that the procedure of filing a suit for rectification is not unknown and is generally resorted to where rights of third parties are concerned. In the matter of petition before me it appears to me that the real disputes are between the petitioner and her erstwhile husband Shantaram and complicated questions of fabrication and forgery must arise. In my view this is not a petition which I should allow to proceed to a hearing. The petitioner may if she so chooses file a suit for the relief which is claimed in the petition.

The order which I therefore make is: the petition must stand dismissed with liberty to the petitioner if so advised to file a regular suit. Costs of this petition if the suit is filed by the petitioner within four months from to-day will be costs in the suit. In default of any suit being filed the costs of this petition will be paid by the petitioner. Counsel certified.

THE STATE OF BOMBAY v. DAVALBHAI NARANBHAI PATEL.*

Bombay Town Planning Act (I of 1915)†, Secs. 14, 30, 51, 51-A‡—Land Acquisition Act (I of 1894), Sec. 6—Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act (Bom. XVIII of 1925), Secs. 63, 66—Land included in sanctioned draft Town Planning Scheme awaiting final scheme—Whether such land can be acquired by Government under s. 6 of Land Acquisition Act—Word “land” in s. 51 of Bom. Act I of 1915 whether covers land within town planning area—Interpretation of statute.

A land included in a sanctioned draft Town Planning Scheme under the Bombay Town Planning Act, 1915, can be acquired by Government under s. 6 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894.

The word “land” used in s. 51 of the Bombay Town Planning Act, 1915, covers land situated within a town planning area or outside it.

If a statute is clear and unambiguous, then, subsequent legislation cannot affect its interpretation. It is the duty of the Court to interpret a statute and not for the Legislature to do so and this has to be done with reference to the language used in the statute itself. An amendment is not necessarily made to remove a lacuna. It may be introduced ex majore cautela.

The meaning of s. 66 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, read with s. 63 of the Act, is that, though a municipality may acquire land outside its limits, it must utilise that property for the purpose of the Act within the limits of the municipal borough only i.e., for the benefit of the citizens residing within the municipal borough.

*Decided, February 24, 1959. First Appeal No. 607 of 1954, against the decision of R. N. Kulkarni, Second Joint Civil Judge (Senior Division) at Ahmedabad, in Civil Suit No. 2431 of 1948.

†This Act is repealed by s. 90 of the Bombay Town Planning Act, 1954 (Bom. XXVII of 1955).

‡The relevant portion of the section runs thus:

“51-A. (1) If at any time the Provincial Government is of opinion that any land included in a town planning scheme is needed for a public purpose other than that for which it is included in the scheme, it may make a declaration to that effect in the Official Gazette in the manner provided in section 6 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894. The declaration so published shall, notwithstanding anything contained in the said Act, be deemed to be a declaration duly made under the said section....

(4) On the land vesting in the Crown under section 16 or 17 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, as the case may be, the scheme shall be deemed to have been suitably varied by reason of acquisition of the land.”

Town Planning Scheme No. 3. On the relevant date, this plot of land was outside the municipal limits of Ahmedabad. The State Government published a notification dated June 2, 1938, under s. 4, read with s. 17(4) of the Land Acquisition Act, for acquisition of this and some more surrounding plots. The notification declared that these lands were needed for public purposes, viz., for construction of an archaeological museum, a school and a playground. The notification also directed that, under sub-s. (4) of s. 17 of the Land Acquisition Act, the provisions of s. 5A of the Act shall not apply to the acquisition. It was followed by another notification, dated June 9, 1938, by which the Government declared that they were satisfied that the lands were needed for public purposes, and further declared under sub-s. (1) of s. 17 of the Act, that, as the said lands were urgently required, the Collector shall take possession, on the expiration of 15 days from the publication of the notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 9 of the Act, of all the waste and arable lands specified in the notification. The notification further stated that the Special Land Acquisition Officer, Ahmedabad, was empowered to perform all the functions of the Collector under the Act. On March 10, 1939, the Special Land Acquisition Officer took possession of Survey No. 199/4. After possession of the land was taken, it was handed over by the State Government to the Ahmedabad Municipality as the land was acquired for the purposes of the Municipality. Till November 18, 1948, when the present suit was filed, the Municipality had not made use of this and the other acquired lands for the purposes for which they were acquired, and they were being used for agricultural purposes and at the time when the notifications were issued, the lands under acquisition were included in a Town Planning Scheme, the draft of which was sanctioned by the Government on or about March 20, 1936. The plaintiff got compensation for the land of Rs. 6,495-10-9 in 1942. Thereafter the plaintiff filed a suit praying for a declaration that the acquisition of the land and all acts towards acquisition, beginning with the abovementioned two notifications, the act of taking possession of the land from the plaintiff and all acts of misfeasance, malfeasance and nonfeasance in not using the land for a public purpose and using the same for a non-public purpose of cultivation, be declared to be illegal, ultra vires, unwarranted and fraudulent and the State of Bombay and the Ahmedabad Municipality (defendants) may be ordered to hand over possession of the land to the plaintiff. The main allegations on which the plaintiff based his suit were: that the acquiring authority had no power to acquire the land in question, because the land was included in the draft town planning scheme, that the acquisition of the land was mala fide, that the urgency clause had also been applied mala fide, that the land being situated outside the municipal borough could not be acquired by the Municipality, and that the purpose for which the land had been acquired had been frustrated and that, therefore, the acquisition of the land was bad and that the plaintiff was still the owner of the same. The defendants denied all the allegations of the plaintiff and pleaded that the suit of the plaintiff was barred by the law of limitation. The trial Judge found that the acquisition of the suit land was illegal and that the suit was not barred by the law of limitation. He, therefore, held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover possession of the acquired land.

The State of Bombay appealed to the High Court.

MIABHOY J. [His Lordship after stating the facts, proceeded]. The main point, which arises for consideration in the appeal is whether acquisition of the suit land was bad on the ground that it was included in the Draft Town Planning Scheme. The submission of Mr. Gupta, learned counsel for the plaintiff, was that once a land was included in a draft scheme, the power of acquiring it under s. 6 of the Land Acquisition Act was lost to the State Government. His second submission was that though, under s. 6 of the Land Acquisition Act, the Government had power to acquire land needed for a public purpose, before such land could be acquired, the land must be capable of being so acquired. He argued that, if on account of the existence of another law, a land was rendered incapable of acquisition, then, the power of the acquiring authority to acquire the land was lost. He contended that the Town Planning Act of 1915 contained a number of provisions which showed that once land became the subject-matter of a town planning scheme, then, it could not be acquired under the Land Acquisition Act. It is, therefore, necessary, first, to examine the sections of the Town Planning Act on which Mr. Gupte relied for contending that the Act debarred the acquiring authority from exercising the power conferred on it by s. 6 of the Land Acquisition Act and which provisions, according to him, remove the suit land from the category of lands capable of being acquired. Section 3 of the Town Planning Act provides that a town planning scheme may make provision for certain matters, which are mentioned in that section. Then s. 8 of the Act provides that a town planning scheme may be made in accordance with the provisions of the Act in respect of any land, which is in course of development or which is likely to be used for building purposes. Sub-section (1) of s. 9 provides that the local authority may, by resolution, declare its intention to make a scheme in respect of the whole or any part of such land and of any land which is in the vicinity of such land. Sub-section (2) of s. 9 provides that, within twenty-one days from the date of such declaration, the local authority shall despatch a copy of the resolution to the Government for publication in the official gazette and, then, shall apply to the State Government for sanction for the making of such scheme. Then, sub-s. (6) of s. 9 provides that, after the receipt of such application and after making such inquiry as it may think fit, the State Government may by notification in the official gazette, either give sanction to make such scheme with or without modifications and subject to such conditions as it may think fit to impose or refuse to give sanction. Section 10 provides that, within 12 months from the date of the notification, sanctioning the town planning scheme, the local authority shall, in consultation with the owners, prepare and publish, in the prescribed manner, a draft scheme for the area in respect of which sanction has been given. Section 11 mentions what the contents of the draft scheme shall be. Then s. 15 imposes certain restrictions on the owners of lands situated within the town planning area. It provides that, after the declaration of intention to make a scheme, no person shall, within the area included in the scheme, erect or proceed with any building or work unless such person has applied for and obtained the necessary permission which shall be contained in a commencement certificate granted by the local authority in the form prescribed. Section 14 empowers Government to grant or withhold sanction for the draft scheme. Section 29 of the Act provides that, after a draft scheme has been sanctioned, the State Government shall appoint an arbitrator. Then s. 30 provides that, in accordance with the prescribed procedure, the arbitrator shall perform certain duties, which are mentioned in sub-ss. (1) to (10). Mr. Gupte especially drew our attention to the two provisos to sub-s. (10) of s. 30. The first proviso empowers the arbitrator to make variations from the draft scheme, but, enacts that any variation, estimated by the arbitrator to involve an increase of ten per cent. in the costs of the scheme, as described in s. 16, shall require the sanction of the Provincial Government. The second proviso, among other things, provides for an appeal to the Provincial Government from a decision of the arbitrator varying the scheme substantially. Then s. 31 provides that, except in certain matters, arising from some clauses of s. 30 and, subject to the provisos contained in cl. (10) of s. 30, every decision of the arbitrator shall be final and conclusive and binding on all persons. Then there are provisions for the appointment of a Tribunal. Then s. 40 provides that, after the Tribunal has decided all matters, which it is entitled to decide, the Government may, by notification in the official gazette, sanction the final scheme or refuse to give such sanction, provided that, in sanctioning the scheme, the State Government may make such modifications as may, in its opinion, be necessary for the purpose of correcting an error, irregularity or informality. Mr. Gupte's contention is that, if all these provisions are read as a whole, then, the legislative intent is quite clear that once a draft scheme is sanctioned by the Government, the only authority which has got the power of making any variation in the scheme is the arbitrator alone and nobody else.

Mr. Gupte's contention was that though the Act confers on the Government power to modify or vary a scheme, before it is sanctioned under s. 14(2), no such power is conferred on it after such sanction is given and that the power to vary or modify a scheme thereafter vests only in the arbitrator, the power of the Government being restricted only to sanction a variation made by the arbitrator involving increase in cost of ten per cent. or of hearing an appeal from a decision of the arbitrator to vary a scheme substantially. It is not necessary for us to examine the Act with a view to ascertain as to what powers the Government possess after a final scheme is sanctioned, because, the facts of the present case do not demand an examination of the Act from this point of view. In this case, we are only concerned with determining as to what is the effect of a sanctioned draft scheme which is awaiting preparation of a final scheme. After a draft scheme has been sanctioned, the Act provides by s. 29 that an arbitrator shall be appointed. The duties of the arbitrator are mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 30 of the Act. It is true, that, so far as the matters provided for in this sub-section are concerned, duty is cast upon the arbitrator only and the Government has neither any power nor is any duty cast on it in connection with the draft scheme, at this stage, except those which are mentioned in the provisos to sub-s. (1) of s. 30. The first proviso, as already mentioned, provides that, in case there is a variation which involves an increase in costs of ten per cent., then, the sanction of the Provincial Government is necessary. The second proviso provides for an appeal to the Provincial Government. Section 31 provides that, except in these two matters, the decision of the arbitrator, except in regard to matters mentioned in cls. (3A), (3B), (3C), (4), (5), (6) and (9) of s. 30, shall be final and conclusive. Therefore, Mr. Gupte is right in his submission that, after a draft scheme is sanctioned, the matter is mostly in the hands of the arbitrator and it is that Officer whose duty it is to consider and sanction a variation of the scheme and the Government has no power of variation, their powers being confined to sanctioning variation made by an arbitrator or hearing an appeal therefrom. But this conclusion does not touch the point which requires to be decided in the appeal. The question that requires to be considered is whether these provisions of the Act either curtail the powers of the acquiring authority to acquire land under s. 6 of the Land Acquisition Act and/or they affect the land situated in a scheme area in such a way that it ceases to be the subject-matter of acquisition. Mr. Gupte began his argument by submitting that s. 6 of the Land Acquisition Act contains within it a limitation as to the kind of land which can be acquired by the Government. We are not in agreement with this submission of Mr. Gupte. In our opinion, s. 6 of the Land Acquisition Act covers all lands and does not exclude any land. Of course, it is open to the Legislature to provide that certain types of land shall not be acquired. If any such provision is made, then, it would be binding, subject to such objections which could be raised under the law of the land. However, an examination of the provisions of the Bombay Town Planning Act clearly reveals that they do not deal with the question of transfer of lands before a final scheme is sanctioned. It is only after a final scheme is prepared that, under s. 41 of the Town Planning Act, all rights in original plots which have been reconstituted stand determined and the reconstituted plots become subject to the rights settled by the arbitrator. But, before a final scheme is sanctioned, there is nothing in the provisions of the Act which deal with the subject of transfer of lands. The main object of the Land Acquisition Act is to transfer ownership of land from private persons to Government or local authority or company free from all encumbrances. We are unable to find anything in the Town Planning Act nor is our attention been drawn to any provision therein, which would justify the submission that the power of the Government to acquire land was taken away the moment a draft scheme was sanctioned.

Mr. Gupte's further contention is that, when a draft scheme is sanctioned, then, the land, situated in the scheme area, becomes subject to certain restrictions and he submits that the acquisition of such land will interfere with such restrictions. We cannot agree with this submission also. Under s. 15 of the Town Planning Act, the restrictions are not absolute, but qualified. Under that section, it is true that all persons are prohibited from erecting or proceeding with any building or working or doing some other things on the lands situated within a Town Planning Area. But the section also makes it clear that such erection or other things can be made by obtaining a commencement certificate from the local authority in the prescribed form.

The main argument of Mr. Gupte which requires examination is that acquisition of land for a public purpose would vary a draft scheme and such a variation cannot be effected by the Government by the use of the machinery of acquisition. Under s. 30(1), a duty has been cast upon the arbitrator to demarcate areas allotted to, or reserved for, public or municipal purposes. If he so demarcates, then, his decision will become final, conclusive and binding under s. 31. But, in our opinion, this does not mean that, during the pendency of the draft scheme and before the final scheme is sanctioned, the Government is totally prevented from acquiring any land for a purpose other than that for which it may have been assigned in the draft scheme. All that these provisions mean is that the Government would have to approach the arbitrator and obtain his sanction for using the land for the intended purpose. But that does not take away the lands situated in a town planning scheme from the category of lands which are liable to be acquired under s. 6 of the Land Acquisition Act. In the present case, the correspondence shows that the local authority had consulted the arbitrator in the matter of the acquisition of this land and the arbitrator had given his approval. But, we do not propose to rest our decision on this approval. We do not propose to do so because the approval appears to have been obtained in private correspondence and not under the machinery devised by the Act. We propose to rest our judgment on the broad ground that the Act does not remove the lands situated in a town planning area from being acquired under the Land Acquisition Act. If the Legislature had intended such far reaching effect, it would have made a specific and clear provision on that subject and would not have left the same to be inferred indirectly from an examination of the provisions of the Act. It is true that an Act may be by implication amended, but, in order that such a result may be achieved, the implication must be inevitable and must necessarily flow from the language of the Act. For these reasons, we are not in agreement with the submission of Mr. Gupte that the provisions, to which he had drawn our attention, deprive the Government of its powers to acquire land situated in a town planning area or that such land had become incapable of being acquired under the machinery of the Land Acquisition Act.

Mr. Gupte has also relied on ss. 51 and 51A of the Town Planning Act. Now on the date when the suit land was acquired, s. 51A was not in existence. That section was introduced, for the first time, by the Bombay Amendment Act LV of 1948. Therefore, the question about the power of the Government to acquire the suit land or the land being taken out of the category of lands, which can be acquired, has got to be decided mainly with reference to the provisions contained in s. 51 of the Act. So far as this section is concerned, the argument, which appears to have been advanced in and accepted by the lower Court, was that this section implied that the Government had no power to acquire land situated in a town planning area. Mr. Gupte did not support this argument and finding. He conceded that the true meaning and scope of s. 51 was to provide for acquisition of land for the purpose of a town planning scheme. But the contention of Mr. Gupte was that this section did not cover land situated within the limits of a town planning area. His contention was that it covered only lands situated outside such limits. He submitted that the expression "land needed for the purpose of a town planning scheme" meant land situated outside the town planning area and not within it. He contended that this section was intended to cover those lands which were required for the town planning scheme but which lands were situated outside the area of the scheme. He contended that if the section were interpreted to cover land situated in a town planning area, then, it would mean that the Legislature was guilty of tautology as such lands could always be covered under the Act by the arbitrator allotting it for a public purpose. We do not agree with this submission. In our opinion, the contention of Mr. Gupte is against the plain language of the section itself. The word "land" used in s. 51 is intended to cover all lands and cannot be restricted to lands situated outside a town planning area. The view which we take about this section is that it was really intended to expand the definition of the expression "for public purpose" as used in ss. 4 and 6 of the Land Acquisition Act. The Legislature appears to have thought that a contention might be raised that acquisition of land for the purpose of a town planning scheme does not fall within the purview of the expression "for public purpose" used in ss. 4 and 6 of the Land Acquisition Act. To negative such a contention, a specific legal fiction is created in s. 51 that land needed for the purpose of a town planning scheme must be deemed to be land needed for a public purpose.

The learned Assistant Government Pleader canvassed for a wider proposition. He contended that if this section was read as a whole and, especially, in the light of the marginal note, then, it showed that the machinery of the Land Acquisition Act could be used for acquiring land, which was situated within a town planning area. It was this contention which was seriously opposed by Mr. Gupte. In our opinion, the learned Assistant Government Pleader is right. Having regard to our conclusion that the word "land" as used in s. 51 covers also land which is situated within a town planning area, it follows as a corollary that the Government has got power of using the machinery of the Land Acquisition Act for the purpose of acquiring such land. This conclusion is to some extent supported by the marginal note which shows the trend of the section and states that land needed for purpose of town planning scheme may be compulsorily acquired. Therefore, in our opinion, instead of s. 51 supporting the argument advanced by Mr. Gupte, it supports the argument of the Government that the Act does not deprive the appropriate authority of the powers to make use of the machinery of the Land Acquisition Act.

Mr. Gupte has strongly relied upon the fact that the Legislature had thought fit to introduce s. 51A. He submitted that the enactment of s. 51A supported his earlier proposition that, once a draft scheme was sanctioned by the Government, then, the Government had no power to vary the draft scheme. He submitted that the introduction of the new section implied that the Government had no power to vary a draft scheme. However, if a statute is clear and unambiguous, then, subsequent legislation cannot affect its interpretation. It is the duty of the Court to interpret a statute and not for the Legislature to do so and this has got to be done with reference to the language used in the statute itself. An amendment is not necessarily made to remove a lacuna. It may be introduced ex majore cautela. In this connection, we may refer to the observations in Maxwell on Interpretation of Statutes, 10th edn., at p. 316.

"Provisions sometimes found in statutes, enacting imperfectly or for particular cases only that which was already and more widely the law, have occasionally furnished ground for the contention that an intention to alter the general law was to be inferred from the partial or limited enactment, resting on the maxim expressio unius, exclusio alterius. But that maxim is inapplicable in such cases. The only inference which a Court can draw from such superfluous provisions (which generally find a place in Acts to meet unfounded objections and idle doubts), is that the Legislature was either ignorant or unmindful of the real state of the law, or that it acted under the influence of excessive caution. If the law be different from what the Legislature supposed it to be, the implication arising from the statute, it has been said, cannot operate as a negation of its existence..."

The task which we have to perform in this case is to examine the language of the Town Planning Act, 1915, as it existed before s. 51A was introduced, and if an examination of the relevant provisions show that the Legislature unequivocally and unambiguously intended that the machinery of the Land Acquisition Act could be used for acquiring a land which is situated within a town planning area, then, the introduction of s. 51A does not make any difference. If the new section was introduced by the Legislature under the belief that till then the acquiring authority had no power to use the machinery of the Land Acquisition Act for the purpose of acquiring a land situated within a town planning scheme, then, we cannot share that belief. If it did so without sharing such a belief, then, the Legislature must be taken to have introduced the new section ex majore cautela.

Examining the provisions of s. 51A, it appears that the section applies to a land which is needed for a purpose other than a purpose for which provision is made in the scheme. Therefore, the scope of s. 51A appears to be different from the scope of s. 51 so far as the purpose of acquisition is concerned. In s. 51, the purpose is the purpose of a town planning scheme and in s. 51A the purpose is de hors that scheme. This provision appears to have been introduced mainly for the purpose mentioned in sub-s. (4) of s. 51A. That sub-section provides that, when any land is vested in the Crown under s. 16 or 17 of the Land Acquisition Act, the scheme shall be deemed to have been suitably varied by reason of acquisition of the land. Therefore, the main intention of the Legislature was to provide for an automatic variation of the town planning scheme on the acquisition taking place. But, that again, in our opinion, does not mean that the Government was debarred from acquiring land situated in a scheme area. Even before the introduction of the new section, though the Act did not permit Government to vary a scheme, the Government could use land for a purpose for which no provision was made in the scheme by approaching the arbitrator under s. 30(1) of the Town Planning Act and thus getting the scheme varied. In our opinion, though it is only the arbitrator who can vary a draft scheme, this does not either take away the power of the Government nor does it in any way impress land in the scheme area with any disability in matter of acquisition. Therefore, in our opinion, neither any of the provisions contained in the Town Planning Act nor s. 51 of the Act can justify any of the two propositions urged by Mr. Gupte. In our opinion, the suit land was capable of being acquired by the Government under the Land Acquisition Act and the first objection of the plaintiff must be overruled.

[His Lordship after considering the question whether the acquisition was ultra vires and illegal on the ground that the declaration and the act of acquisition were mala fides, proceeded.]

The next contention, which requires to be examined, is whether the municipality was competent to acquire lands outside its own limits. The contention of Mr. Gupte is that the municipality had no such power. A clear answer to this contention is s. 63 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925. We may mention that though respondent No. 2 is now a Municipal Corporation and is now governed by the Municipal Corporation Act of 1948, it was, on the relevant date, a municipal borough and was governed by the provisions of the Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925. Section 63 of the said Act provides that a municipality may acquire and hold property both movable and immovable whether within or without the limits of the municipal borough. Therefore, this section provides in explicit terms that the municipality may not only acquire and hold property within its limits, but also acquire and hold property outside its own limits. The submission of counsel is based on the provisions of s. 66 of the said Act. That section states that the municipal fund and all property vested in a municipality shall be applied for purposes of the Act within the limits of the municipal borough. The contention, therefore, is that, as this section permits the municipality to use its fund only within the limits of the municipal borough and inasmuch as the acquisition of land outside its limits would mean utilization of municipal fund and property outside its limits, it had no power to acquire the land in question. In our opinion, s. 66 has nothing to do with the subject of the acquisition of property. It deals with a different subject altogether—the subject of utilization of municipal funds. In our opinion, if this section were to be construed, as contended for by Mr. Gupte, then, s. 63 of the Municipal Boroughs Act, would be rendered nugatory. These two sections should be construed in such a manner that both of them are made effective. The true meaning of s. 66, read with s. 63 of the Act, is that, though municipality may acquire land outside its limits, it must utilise that property for the purpose of the Act within the limits of the municipal borough only i.e., for the benefit of the citizens residing within the municipal borough. Therefore, we do not agree with the submission of Mr. Gupte that the municipality had no authority to acquire land outside its own limits.

cation came for preliminary orders, granted an ex parte order for attachment before judgment. This ex parte order was, however, vacated after the defendant put in his objections in that application. Thereafter, on February 4, 1957, the defendant filed the application under s. 95 out of which the present appeal arises complaining that there was no reasonable and probable cause for the plaintiff to get the properties of the defendant, which consisted of certain lands and houses, attached before judgment, and therefore he had suffered loss of reputation. The learned trial Judge held that under the circumstances of the present case, the defendant would be entitled to an amount of Rs. 500 for the loss of reputation and mental injury which he suffered on account of the attachment before judgment.

The plaintiff filed an affidavit stating that there were reasonable and probable causes which entitled him to get the order of attachment before judgment. He also filed an affidavit of one Bansilal Ambulal, who was his neighbour. Bansilal in his affidavit stated that when he had met the defendant in the Bazar of Dabhoi, the defendant told him that as the plaintiff was not allowing him to pay the amount by instalments and was not prepared to forego the interest, he would dispose of his properties and see how the plaintiff would recover any part of his claim. Sometime thereafter Bansilal went to the plaintiff and gave the information which had been given to him by the defendant. It was then that the plaintiff instituted his suit and made the application for attachment before judgment under the provisions of O. XXXVIII.

Now, in an application filed under s. 95, the applicant has to prove that the attachment was applied for on insufficient grounds. The decided cases have taken the view that the words "insufficient grounds" are equivalent to "without reasonable and probable cause", and, therefore, it is for the plaintiff who applied for attachment before judgment to prove that the attachment was applied for and got effected on reasonable and probable grounds. The learned Judge was not inclined to believe the evidence of Bansilal Ambulal, who had filed his affidavit in the case. He observed that Bansilal was a stranger to the defendant, and it was not probable that the defendant could ever have stated to Bansilal that in the event of no settlement being arrived at by the plaintiff with him he would dispose of his property and make it impossible for the plaintiff to recover his claim. In another place of his judgment, the learned Judge was inclined to hold that Bansilal was no better than a hireling. It appears that this Bansilal had also made an affidavit even at the time of the final hearing of the application. At that stage the learned Judge was inclined to hold that Bansilal had no relations whatever with the defendant and to reject his evidence. Under these circumstances, we do not find any fault with the learned Judge if he stated in the present application that he was not prepared to believe the affidavit of Bansilal. The learned Judge also took into consideration that the defendant owned as many as 235 acres of lands besides some houses at the village Tejgadh, and finally he came to the conclusion that there was no reasonable or probable cause for the plaintiff to make an application for attachment before judgment. On the whole, we are satisfied that his conclusion is right and no valid reasons are shown as to why we should differ, in appeal, from his appreciation of evidence.

This brings us to the next question whether when the defendant has proved that the attachment was applied for and got effected on insufficient grounds, he would be entitled to compensation on that account. Section 95(1), so far as material, is as follows:—

"Where, in any suit in which an attachment has been effected, it appears to the Court that such attachment was applied for on insufficient grounds, the defendant may apply to the Court, and the Court may, upon such application, award against the plaintiff by its order such amount, not exceeding one thousand rupees, as it deems a reasonable compensation to the defendant for the expense or injury caused to him:

Provided that a Court shall not award, under this section, an amount exceeding the limits of its pecuniary jurisdiction."

Sub-section (2) of the section states:

"An order determining any such application shall bar any suit for compensation in respect of...attachment..."

Now, Mr. Karlekar contends that the defendant has not proved that any expense or injury was caused to him by the attachment before judgment and, therefore, he would not be entitled to any compensation under the aforesaid section. The defendant contended that by the attachment he had suffered a heavy blow to his reputation and had also suffered mental pain. Mr. Karlekar says that there is no evidence of any loss of reputation or of any mental pain caused to the defendant by the attachment. Further, he contends that the words "expense or injury" used in the section do not refer only to the loss of reputation or mental pain. They refer to some damage caused to the defendant by the attachment of his property. It is contended that the word "expense" unquestionably indicates that the defendant, in order to be entitled to compensation, must show that he sustained some pecuniary loss or damage by the wrongful attachment, and that the words "expense" and "injury" being analogous words having been used in the same context, the word "injury" must also receive the same import.

In support of his contentions, Mr. Karlekar relied upon two cases of the Calcutta High Court. In Chandulal Siraogi v. Purna Chandra Paul,¹ it was held that damage to prestige or a feeling of humiliation is not an injury within the meaning of s. 95 of the Code of Civil Procedure for which compensation may be awarded under that section for attachment before judgment of the defendant applicant's property on insufficient grounds. The learned Judge who decided that case observed (p. 916):

"...The claim must be in respect of some damage caused to him as the proximate result of the attachment, arrest or injunction which had been applied for on insufficient grounds."

This was the view which had been taken by a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court in the case of Joharmull & Co. v. Iswardas,² and the learned Judge felt that he was bound to follow it in preference to the decision of the High Court of Madras. He observed (p. 917):

"...No doubt, the Madras High Court has given a very elastic interpretation to the word 'injury' as used in the section, but there being a decision of this Court expressly dealing with this point, I have to follow that decision."

The learned Judge also made a distinction between a claim for damages for malicious attachment in a suit properly framed and an application under s. 95 where the matter had to be summarily investigated. But it may be noted that under sub-s. (2) of s. 95 an order determining an application under s. 95 shall bar any suit for compensation for such attachment.

In the earlier decision to which he referred, a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court held that "In a motion for an inquiry as to the damages caused to the defendant by reason of the operation of an injunction restraining him from alienating or disposing of his immovable and moveable property except in the usual course of business he must show that he was prevented from doing something which he could otherwise have been free to do. It will not do to say that this kind of injunction is a reflection on his character and upon his business stability and that the moment this injunction was pronounced and as a consequence of it nobody entered into any dealings with him, that his friends on the contrary began to break their contracts and failed to do their duty. He must show that he suffered loss by his inability to do one or more of the things which the injunction restrained him from doing and until some sensible case of that sort is put forward, it is unnecessary to direct an inquiry."

In this case, it appears that in an earlier judgment it was arranged that the defendant should be at liberty to apply by motion for an inquiry as to the damages caused to him by reason of the operation of injunction obtained by plaintiff, and it was also directed that he should state his case for damages and his claim and that the matter should be heard on the original side. When the defendant made his claim, it seems that he did not make any claim that could be entertained as arising out of or caused by the injunction. It was, however, stated by the defendant that the kind of injunction served upon him amounted to a reflection upon his character and upon his business stability, and that the moment this injunction was pronounced and as a consequence of it nobody entered into any dealings with him, that his friends on the contrary began to break their contracts and failed to do their duty. The learned Judges, however, took the view that the claim that the defendant had made could not be regarded as the proximate result of the order of injunction served upon him. They observed (p. 696):

"...In order to get an inquiry as to damages, he would have to show that he had suffered loss by his inability to do one or more of the things which the injunction restrained him from doing and, until some sensible case of that sort is put forward, it is unnecessary... to direct an inquiry on materials of the character before us."

With great respect to their Lordships, it seems to us their Lordships were considering the case as it emerged from the order which had been passed at an earlier stage, and that order was that the defendant should be at liberty to apply by motion for an inquiry as to the damages caused to him by reason of the operation of this injunction, and so far as the facts mentioned in the case go it does not seem to us that it was a case under s. 95 of the Code of Civil Procedure and that the defendant had made out a case of "injury" as having been caused to him by the order of injunction. It is not clear whether their Lordships' attention had been drawn to the words "expense or injury" occurring in s. 95.

On the other hand, there are two decisions of the High Court of Madras which directly deal with the question arising in an application under s. 95. One is reported in Palanisami v. Kaliappa,³ where the learned Judge took the view that there was nothing in the language of s. 95 to justify the inference that special damage need be proved in application under s. 95 for damages for wrongful attachment. The words "expense or injury" in s. 95 indicate that either the particular damage upon which a monetary value can obviously be placed or the more general damage which the Court endeavours with difficulty to assess in terms of money, is contemplated by the section. This view was followed in a subsequent decision of the same Court reported in Srinivasa-raghavan v. Sundararajan,⁴ where it was held that it was enough if general damage is proved such as mental pain, general loss of reputation, etc. Damage to prestige and humiliation suffered do amount to injury. We prefer to follow the Madras decisions and hold that the word "injury" in s. 95 includes also injury to reputation and mental pain, and when attachment is got effected on insufficient grounds, such attachment itself without more must be regarded as having caused the defendant at least such "injury" as to entitle him to general damages. In Mudhun Mohun Doss v. Gokul Doss,⁵ their Lordships of the Privy Council held that in a case arising out of a suit filed by a third party for damages for wrongful attachment of his property wrongful attachment was actionable per se and that the plaintiff was entitled to ordinary damages although he did not prove any special damages.

In the present case, we have held, agreeing with the finding of the lower Court, that plaintiff got the attachment before judgment effected wholly on insufficient grounds. If so, it was a wrongful attachment for which defendant would be entitled to compensation as by way of general damages. The unauthorised attachment interfering as it did with the common law rights of the defendant was itself an injury, actionable per se.

Mr. Karlekar contends that "injury" as used in s. 95 must mean injury to the person or goods, and particularly so when the word "injury" follows the word "expense" in the same context. Now, injury, as is well-known in the law of Torts, not only means injury to the body but also injury to the reputation or mind. We cannot also accept the contention of Mr. Karlekar that the two words "expense" and "injury" being analogous words should be interpreted as having the same meaning. According to Maxwell

"where analogous words are used each may be presumed to be susceptible of a separate and distinct meaning; for the Legislature is not supposed to use words without a meaning." (Interpretation of Statutes, Edn. 8, p. 276).

Mr. Karlekar contends that there is no evidence to show as to what was the loss caused to the reputation, or what was the nature of the mental pain suffered by the defendant. In our view, we do not think that there is any need for further proof as to the nature of the injury which the defendant says he suffered on account of the wrongful attachment before judgment of his property. We have held that the illegal attachment itself constituted an injury within the meaning of s. 95.

The learned Judge has held that although there was also an attempt to effect attachment before judgment of all the lands, for some reason or the other such attachment was not effected in regard to the lands. But there was an attachment in regard to the houses, and if the houses were improperly attached, then we are of the view that the defendant had sustained an injury, so as to entitle him to general damages.

The learned Judge has awarded Rs. 500, though he has not given any reasons as to why he was inclined to hold that in the present case an amount of Rs. 500 as compensation would meet the ends of justice. If any reasons had been given, then in all probability we would have been reluctant to interfere with the quantum of compensation as awarded by the learned Judge. But in this case, it seems to us that the learned Judge overlooked the fact that the lands, though attempted to be attached before judgment, were not in fact attached, and there is also the evidence that the house property was not worth Rs. 39,000 and odd as stated in the Panchakyas which appears to have been made at the time when the attachment was effected, but was about Rs. 7,900. Under these circumstances, we are inclined to hold that the amount as awarded was a little excessive, and we, therefore, reduce it to Rs. 200.

With this modification, the appeal is dismissed. There will be no order as to costs.

The cross objections also fail and are dismissed. There will be no order as to costs in the cross objections also.

Appeal dismissed.

Before Mr. Justice Shelat.

THE SPECIAL LAND ACQUISITION OFFICER, BOMBAY CITY AND BOMBAY SUBURBAN DISTRICT v. J. H. KATRAK.*

Land Acquisition Act (I of 1894), Secs. 23, 24—Salsette Estates (Land Revenue Exemption Abolition Act (Bom. XLVII of 1951)—Facts occurring after date of notification under s. 4 and relevant for determination of value of land at date of notification—Whether evidence as to such facts relevant—Amount of compensation payable to Khot for loss of privilege of levying non-agricultural assessment on date of notification issued before coming into force of Bombay Act XLVII of 1951, how to be determined.

Section 23 or section 24 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, does not preclude the Court from considering facts, which, though occurring after the date when the right to compensation accrues, help the Court in estimating the value of the property at the relevant date. It would, therefore, be improper to discard facts which have actually occurred, even though after the date of notification, which throw light on the question of the value of the land in question at the relevant date and which assist the Court to a correct ascertainment of such value.

Bradberry In re: National Provincial Bank, Ltd. v. Bradberry; Fry, In re: Tasker v. Calliford,¹ applied.

Manmatha Nath Mitter v. The Secretary of State for India in Council,² referred to.

A Notification under s. 4 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, in respect of certain lands held by a Khot was issued on January 19, 1950, and the question was as to what amount of compensation was payable to the Khot for the loss of the privilege of levying non-agricultural assessment on the lands accruing on the date of the notification:—

Held, that in view of the Salsette Estates (Land Revenue Exemption Abolition) Act, 1951, (if the Act is held valid and applicable to the claimant Khot), compensation payable to him would be for the period between January 19, 1950, and March 1, 1952, when the Act came into force.

While arriving at the value of the right of compensation for the loss of the privilege of levying assessment accruing on the date of the notification, the Court is entitled to and must look into facts which have actually occurred in preference to mere hypothetical considerations.

Bullfa and Merthyr Dare Steam Collieries v. Pontypridd Water Works Company,³ applied.

These References arose out of acquisition of certain lands situate in the village Parjapur for the dairy farm at Aare. The notifications under s. 4 of the Land Acquisition Act were issued on January 19, 1950, in respect of all these lands. Possession of the lands was taken by the Milk Commissioner on April 5, 1950.

The total area of land, which was the subject-matter of Reference No. 7 of 1955, was 153 acres 13 gunthas out of which 19 acres 38½ gunthas were Kharif lands, 126 acres 30½ gunthas were Varkas land and 6 acres 24 gunthas were covered by a tank and a Nallah. The Kharif lands were not contiguous but small pieces of them were scattered in several survey numbers. Out of 126 acres 30½ gunthas of Varkas land, 41 acres 18 gunthas in Survey No. 18 and 6 acres in S. No. 17 were hilly lands forming part of the hill in the western part of the village Maroshi which continues in Parjapur.

Parjapur was a Khoti village and the Khots were the claimants in Reference No. 7 of 1955 who were the trustees under the will of the late Ardesahir Hormusjee Wadia. The lands fell into two classifications; 'Malaki' lands of which the claimants were the proprietors and 'Suti' lands which belonged to tenants who were subject to a certain land revenue assessment by the Khot.

Before the Special Land Acquisition Officer the acquired lands were, for the purpose of compensation, classified as Varkas, Kharif, quarrying lands and lands with building potentiality.

The Khot was levying until acquisition agricultural assessment on the lands held by the Sutidars and the aggregate amount of such assessment was Rs. 140-13-0. The Khot was likewise entitled to levy agricultural assessment on the 'Malaki' lands which was Rs. 391-15-3. No non-agricultural assessment on any of these lands was levied and none was fixed by the Collector.
